

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

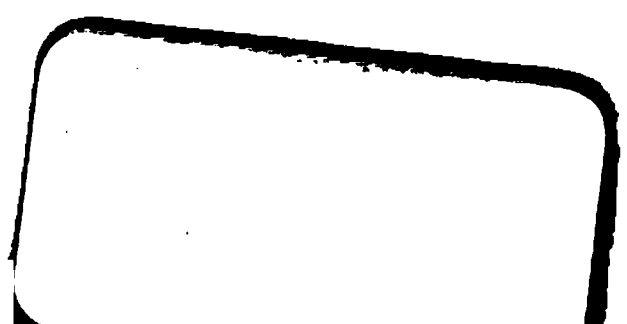

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

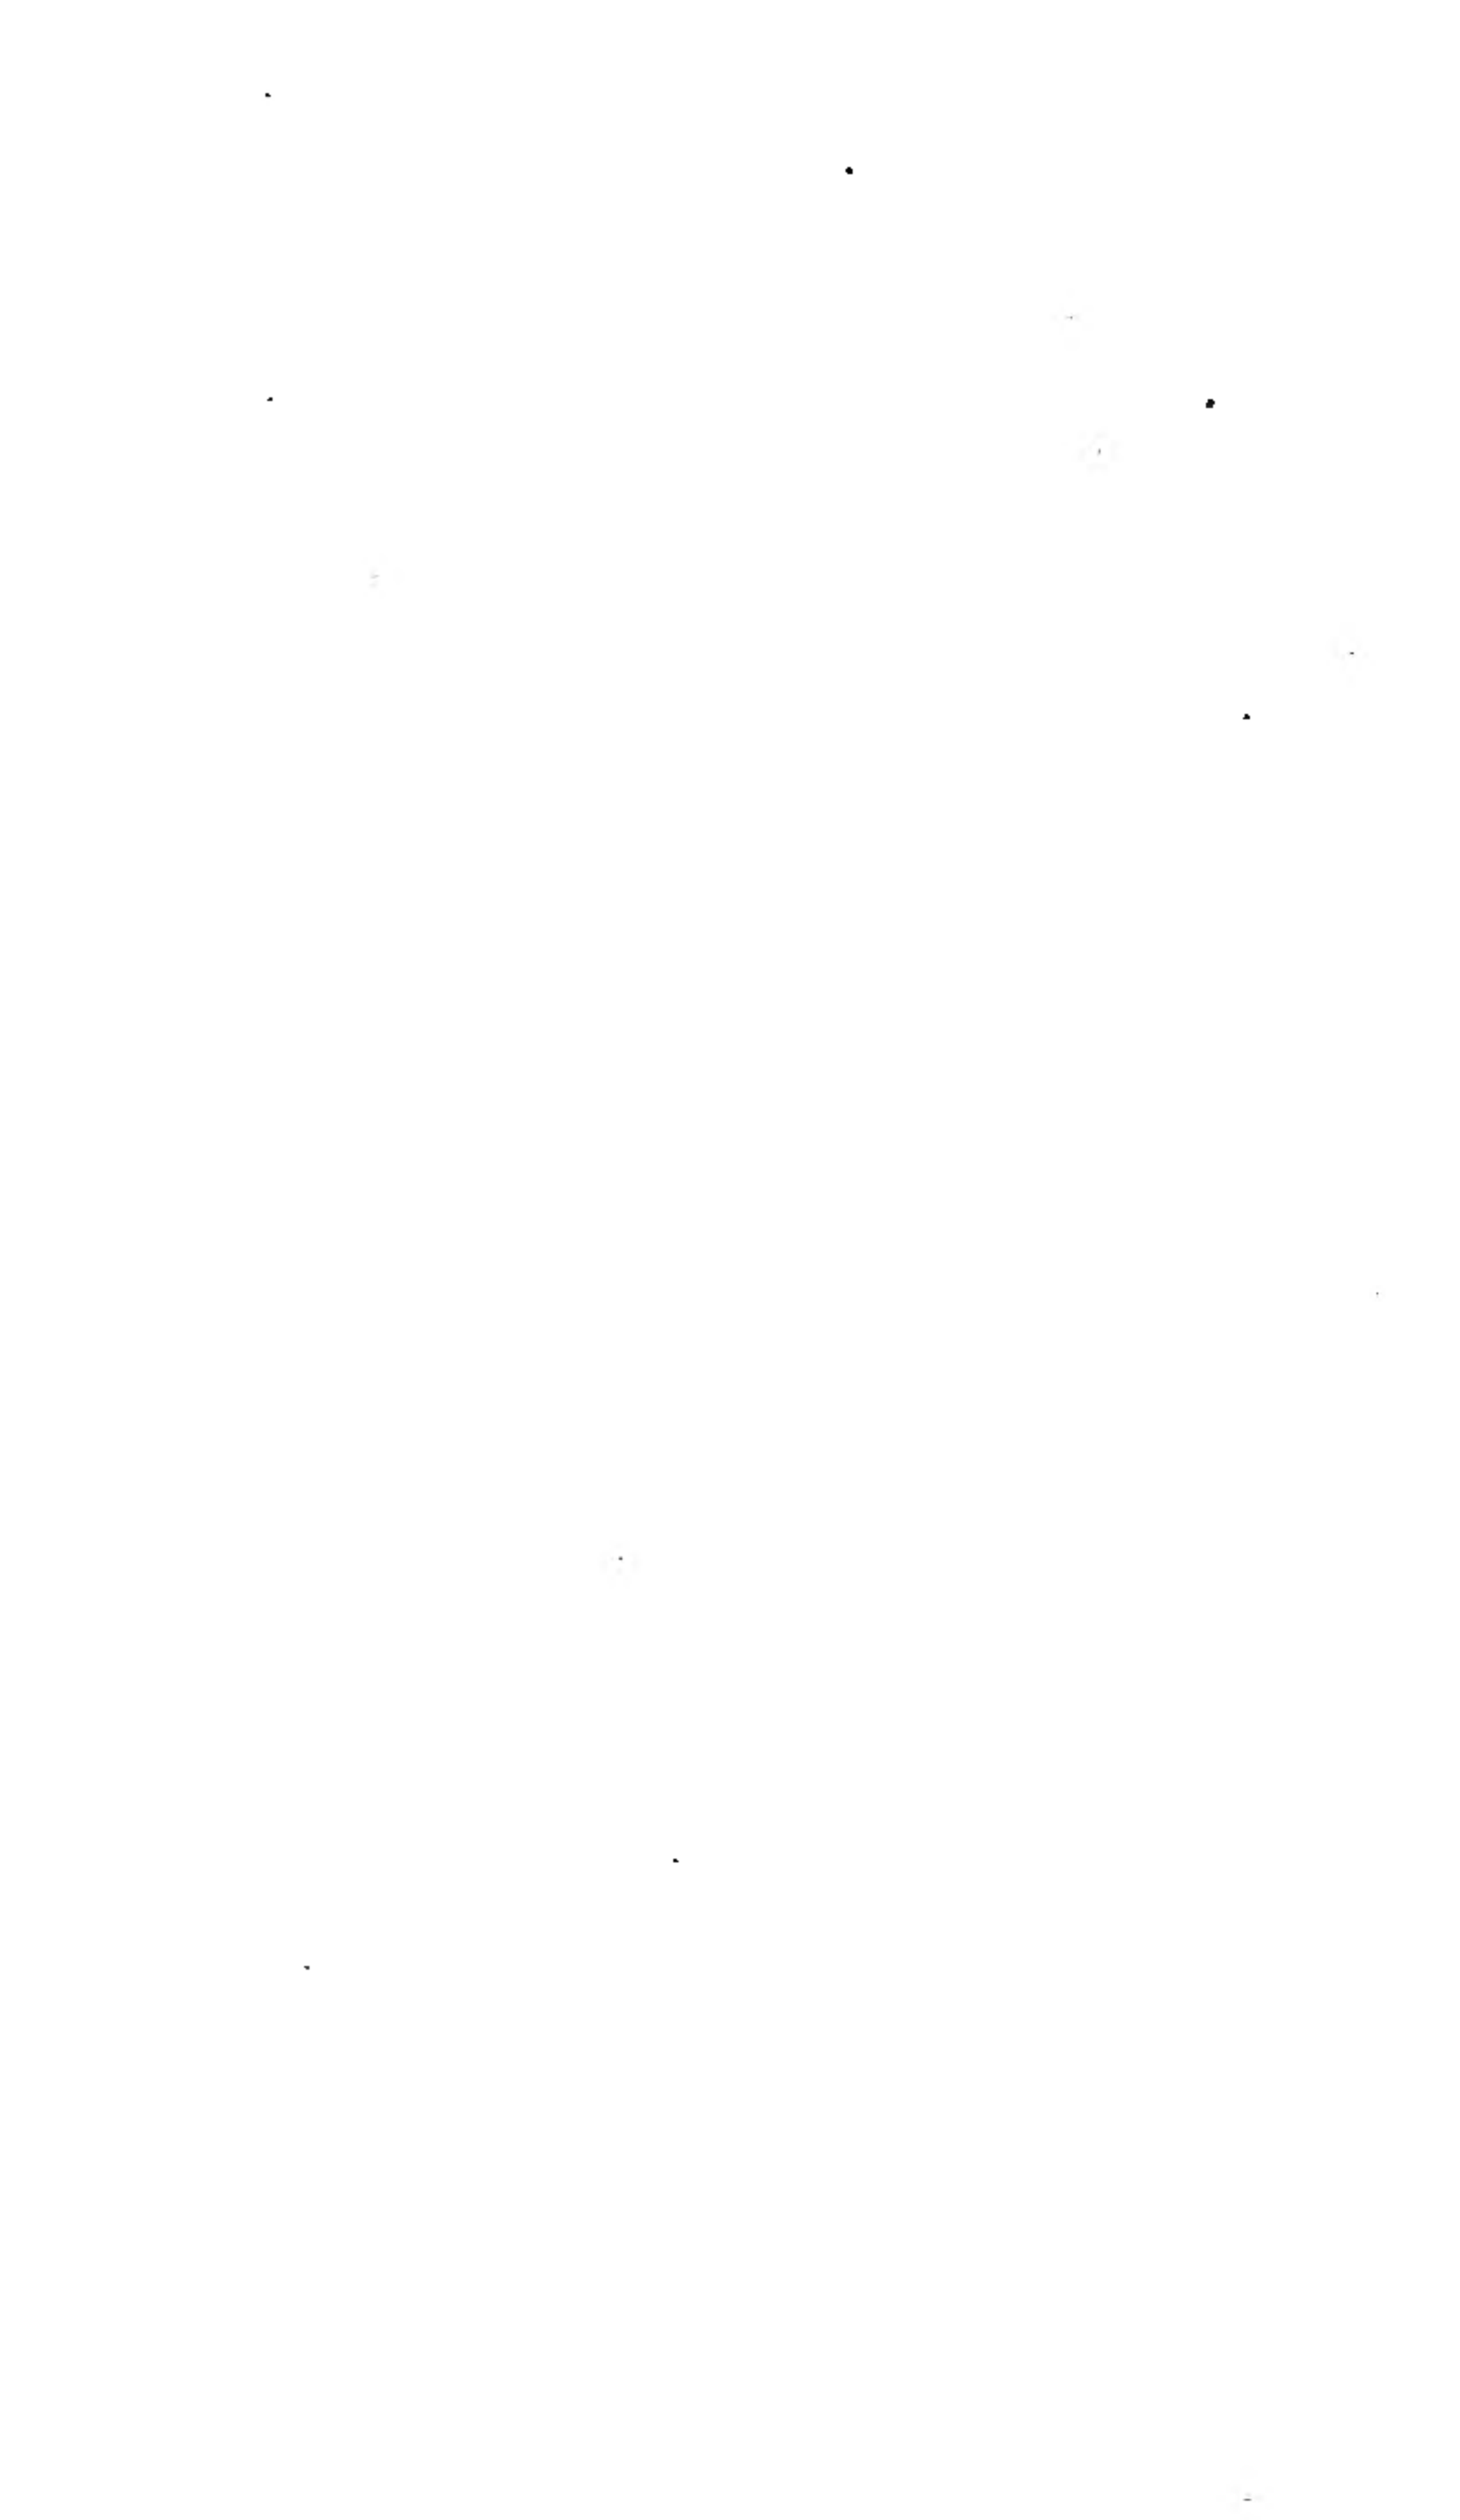

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

DANIEL MORGAN, (Claimant) Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Ure—Fenton. No. 1.
 WILLIAM DIXON, LIMITED, (Respondents) Respondents.—
D.-F. Dickson—Beveridge. Nov. 18, 1911.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule Morgan v.
 (4)—Medical examination of workman on behalf of employer—Workman's William demand for presence of his own doctor. Dixon,
 Limited.

Held that a workman has not an absolute right to insist on his own doctor being present when he is being examined, in terms of paragraph (4) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, by a medical practitioner on behalf of the employers; the question whether such a demand is reasonable or unreasonable, and, accordingly, whether the workman's insistence on it does or does not amount to a refusal to submit himself to examination, being a question of fact for the decision of the arbitrator in each particular case.

Diss. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, on the ground that in ordinary circumstances the workman has a right to demand the presence of his own medical attendant, and that, if the employers object, the burden is on them of showing exceptional circumstances which make the workman's demand unreasonable.

This was an appeal by way of stated case in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

The question of law was:—"Whether, apart from any special circumstances in a particular case, a workman is entitled to have his own doctor present throughout the examination by the medical practitioner on behalf of the employers, in terms of section 4 of the First Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and whether the workman's refusal to submit himself for examination unless his doctor is allowed to be present amounts to 'refusal' or 'obstruction' in terms of said section."

The Second Division answered the first branch of the question in the negative, and found, in answer to the second branch, that the workman's refusal to submit himself for examination unless his doctor was allowed to be present amounted, in the circumstances of the stated case, to refusal in terms of the section.

The claimant, Morgan, appealed.

The appeal was heard on 13th November 1911.¹

¹ The following case, which was not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session, was cited in the House of Lords:—Powell v. Main Colliery Co., [1900] A. C. 366, at p. 371.

Nov. 13, 1911.

Morgan v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question which is raised in this case is stated by the arbitrator in a way which may be a little embarrassing, but we must deal with it as it is stated. The fourth clause of the First Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act * confers upon the employer a right to have a workman, who has given notice of an accident, examined medically, and there is a duty on the part of the workman to submit himself to be examined; but the statute is silent, and the rules are partially, and I may say mainly, silent as to the time, the place, and the conditions of this examination. Under those circumstances practically the common rule of law applies and imposes upon both parties the duty of acting reasonably in obeying the statute.

Now it seems to me that the question whether or not one side or the other has acted reasonably in a particular case is a question of fact in that particular case. If I were an arbitrator I should say as a question of fact that in most cases—perhaps in nearly every case—it is quite reasonable on the part of a workman to desire the presence of his own doctor. That may be sometimes unreasonable because of inconvenience or expense or for other reasons which can be established, and which one cannot forecast. I should have been disposed to say if there were no special circumstances, if there were no proof of inconvenience or expense, why should not the doctor of the workman be present? I see no harm that he can do; and I can conceive that he might be very useful. But it is not the function of a Court of law, or of this House as a Court of law, to take upon itself the decision of questions of fact which by the statute are left to the arbitrator or to the Sheriff or County Court Judge as the case may be. It is a matter for the arbitrator to decide, who has been entrusted with the duty by law, and not for me to decide, who have not been entrusted with the duty of finding facts. Now, that being so, what are the questions of law which we are asked to determine? The first is whether, apart from special circumstances in a particular case, a workman is entitled to have his own doctor present throughout the examination by the medical practitioner on behalf of the employer. This question was raised by the appellant's own argument; it was the only contention which he did put forward before the arbitrator; it has been put as a question of law to your Lordships. In my opinion the proper answer is that we cannot say as a matter of law that the workman is so entitled—there is no absolute right of the kind claimed. It is a question for the Sheriff or the arbitrator in each case to determine whether the condition imposed by the workman is a reasonable or an unreasonable condition.

The second question seems to me practically to amount to the same as the first, and to be dependent on the appellant's contention before the Sheriff. It really is the same question, and it also is a matter of fact which must be decided in each case, the principle of law being that both sides should act reasonably. In short, if these are to be treated as questions of law, I cannot answer in the affirmative either the one or the other of them. I cannot answer the first in the affirmative, and the second question seems to me to be the same as the first. Accordingly I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed. I desire to observe that the question raised and decided by the Sheriff was not whether the condition was reasonable (which, I think, was the right question), but whether there existed a right in law, in the absence of special circumstances, as was contended by the workman before the arbitrator. Nov. 13, 1911.

Morgan v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur. I think the parties came here to establish an absolute legal right in every workman to require that the medical examination by his employer's medical man should take place in the presence of his own medical man. I concur with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that the law gives him no such abstract right, and that, therefore, that being the point raised, the appeal should be dismissed.

In my view the question whether there is a refusal or not under the Act to submit to examination is a question of fact, and any reasonable requirement that may be put forward by the workman, such as, for instance, having his own medical man present, ought not and would not by any reasonable arbitrator be held to amount to a refusal to submit to examination. I further think that it cannot be held that the request to have the workman's medical man present upon all occasions can be considered as prima facie reasonable. On the contrary I think, having regard to the wording of the statute, the burden of proving that the request is reasonable is thrown not upon the employer, but upon the workman who makes it. I concur with my noble and learned friend in thinking that in many cases,—indeed it would appear to me in most cases,—in the absence of any inconvenience or difficulty in getting the attendance of the person required, it is a most reasonable thing that the medical attendant of the workman should be present at the examination. I concur therefore that, your Lordships having no jurisdiction to decide issues of fact, and the appeal having been brought forward to establish this abstract legal right, it should be dismissed.

LORD GORELL.—I concur in the result of the judgments which have been pronounced.

I think that the question that was really contested in this case is made plain by reading one paragraph from the stated case, and that is this: "Parties were heard upon this minute, and it was conceded in argument by the appellant that there were no special circumstances in his case which called for the presence of his medical attendant at the examination, his contention" (and this is the real point of the matter) "being that it is the right of the workman in every case, without alleging any special reason, to have his medical attendant present at the examination, and to refuse to submit himself for examination unless and until his employers consented thereto."

I think that that paragraph states what was the real contest between the parties, which is expressed in a somewhat different way when you come to the statement of what is the question, at the end of the case, the question being stated as a question of law for the opinion of the Court. I think that what was really raised by that statement and contention was the right of the workman, independently entirely of the question whether it was reasonable or unreasonable (which it may have been), to have his medical man present at every examination in every case as it is here stated. That is a proposition which cannot, in my opinion, be maintained as matter of law, and I concur with what has fallen from the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me. It leaves out of consideration altogether what in these cases is practically a question of fact, whether it is reasonable or not for the workman to have his medical attendant present at the examination made on behalf of the employer. This contention is stated as amounting to a right wholly independent of whether there is any reason or not for another doctor being present—that is to say; that the workman shall have the right to have his own doctor present. I agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson. I think the burden is on the workman to show that there is some reason for the attendance of a further medical man, because, as I ventured to suggest in the course of the argument, prima facie under the statute the employer has the right to have the examination in order to see what his position is; the workman on the other hand, has to submit to it, and if he raises any objection by reason of his desire to have another medical man present, he raises a condition on his part, and I think it is for him to give the reason for raising such a condition.

For these reasons I concur in the view that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—Differing as I do so radically from your Lordships, I should naturally have desired time for further consideration as to the form of my judgment. But in the circumstances, my mind is so clear as to my own course that I cannot but hold it to be my duty to dissent, although I do so with diffidence. I am glad to be supported in the view which I entertain by the unanimous decision of the Court of Appeal, consisting of the Master of the Rolls and Farwell and Kennedy, L.JJ., in the case of Devitt.¹ Your Lordships have not referred to that decision, but in the Court below² the learned Lord Justice-Clerk referred to it thus: “There may have been many circumstances in that case as to which no inquiry or investigation was made, but which might have made the suggestion of the workman a perfectly reasonable and proper suggestion. It might have been most dangerous to the man himself to proceed without the practitioner being present who knew him and knew the state of his health and constitution, and who, if anything was being done in the course of the examination, could suggest that something ought to be done or something ought not to be done, as the case might be. That is not the kind of case we have here.” We were assured by the learned Lord Advocate, who had perused the papers in the case, and it was not denied, that this was a misapprehension on the part of the learned Judge, that there were no such special circumstances in Devitt’s case,¹ and that the case there presented stood entirely as the present case stands. And there can be little doubt accordingly that the helpfulness and value of the case of *Devitt*¹ was to some extent mitigated by his misapprehension. In my opinion the case of

*Devitt*¹ was rightly decided, and I desire to express my concurrence with the judgment of the learned Master of the Rolls. Nov. 13, 1911.

I have not heard from any one of your Lordships anything in the nature of an abstract consideration which would make the proposing of this condition unreasonable on the part of the workman. When section 4 of Schedule I. of the Act of 1906 was enacted it provided that "Where a workman has given notice of an accident, he shall, if so required by the employer, submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer, and, if he refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to compensation . . . shall be suspended." What has happened in this case is that the workman, being so requested by the employer to submit to an examination, has consented to that examination subject to his own medical man being present. Anything more unreasonable to my mind than the proposition that that is an out-and-out refusal does not occur to me at present, nor does it occur to me how that can be characterised as an obstruction. I do not find it in any way inconsistent with the statute that unless a refusal or obstruction shall be established the workman's reasonable rights should be respected equally with those of the employer. In this case it is said that the adjecting of this condition amounted to a refusal unless the workman was able to allege a reason in advance for having his desire gratified that his own doctor should be with him while his master's doctor was examining him. In the course of the argument I put the ordinary case: How can an injured workman allege such a reason in advance? He may have sustained injuries—in many cases he does sustain injuries—which produce not only direct but indirect effects, the latter especially being obscure.

It is of the utmost advantage to both parties that medical men representing adverse sides in what might turn out to be a contention should at the same place, at the same time, and under the same circumstances be parties to the one examination. It is, however, now, I presume, declared by law that, unless it is so found in advance as matter of fact that that is a reasonable thing, this House is to be debarred from saying that in point of law that is the workman's right. I put the proposition in point of law thus: that the right of the employer on the one hand to compel the submission of a workman to a medical examination has its correlative in the right of the workman to be protected and to have his interests seen to while that examination is conducted. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that there is a right on the one side and an obligation on the other, et e converso, and I further agree that it is the duty of both parties to have these rights and obligations reasonably respected and performed. But under those circumstances what has been asked by the workman here? He has been asked to submit to an examination, and on the contrary side he says,—“I shall do so, but observe, please, my right, which is that my doctor shall be there.” I submit the view to your Lordships, which, I regret, has not been accepted, that in so proposing the workman's right the workman has done that which put the legal situation thus—that it was for the employer, denying the right upon the side of the

Nov. 13, 1911. workman, to establish that his denial was a reasonable one. As I construe the case, and speaking for myself, it is not the fact that an abstract right of an absolute and universal character is sought to be established. What is sought to be established here is laid down in the proposition by the learned Sheriff. It is to this effect: "Whether, apart from special circumstances in a particular case, a workman is entitled to have his own doctor present." I have no hesitation, for my part, in saying that that proposition ought to be answered in the affirmative. I think it is the right of a workman, who has to submit his person for examination, to have his doctor present, apart from any special circumstances in a particular case which would negate and nullify such a right. In those circumstances I should have no hesitation in deciding the case in a contrary sense to that which has been proposed from the woolsack.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

Now, what are the facts of this case? There are none; there are no special facts found by the learned Sheriff at all. He has decided solely in the abstract that, special circumstances being absent, this right does not exist, or rather he has decided that apart from special circumstances the workman has no such right. As I say, there is no fact here to specialise this case at all and make the workman stand deprived of the right correlative to the examination to which I have referred. I bear in mind further, that in the ordinary case, which is the case we are dealing with here—a case admitted to be apart from specialty—no conceivable harm can be done either to the workman or to the medical adviser of the employer by having a second doctor on the spot. There is to be no charge to the employer, for it is to be done at the workman's own cost; and for my own part my recollection bears me out in saying that my experience of that great profession would be that ninety-five per cent of doctors would prefer another doctor being present so far as their own satisfaction and the ease of the situation and the settlement of the truth were concerned. But in the present case there is a special use attached to the presence of another medical man. Section 4 of the Schedule is not a section applicable to proceedings in foro. It is a section applicable to this situation where only notice of accident has been given, and where it must be the desire of both parties that an amicable and reasonable arrangement be come to. How desirable it is in those circumstances that this situation should be eased in the particular matter, that both doctors should agree as to what is wrong and what would be a suitable remedy. All the demand the workman has made here is that that agreement should be facilitated by the presence of his medical man. I cannot think that in its nature to be unreasonable. There are no facts proved or proceeded upon in this case to make it unreasonable or to suggest that it was unreasonable, and unless it is found in fact to be unreasonable owing to special circumstances, I do not think this House should be debarred from holding that the workman had that right.

As I have observed, I do not think the decision come to in the Courts below was a decision in fact. I do not think the Sheriff had addressed himself to it as a question of fact. He has treated the question as one of absolute right (conditioned in the sense I have explained), a right which he concludes not from fact, but from a construction of the Act of Parliament. In my view that is a matter of law. My whole view may be summed up in this proposition, that in the general case, in my humble opinion, it cannot be reckoned as a refusal if a workman makes the presence of his own medical man a condition of his willingness to submit to examination by the medical adviser of his employer. I cannot agree that the fact of the adjection of such a condition is ipso jure a refusal or obstruction. I hold it is nothing else than a reasonable thing, not displaced from its reasonableness by any fact proved. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the judgment proposed.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 16—
Accident happening before commencement of Act—Application of Act—Right of appeal to House of Lords—"Proceedings consequential" on medical reference.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (which provides for an appeal to the House of Lords that did not exist under the Act of 1897), enacts, sec. 16, that the Act shall not apply to cases where the accident happened before its commencement, "except so far as it relates to references to medical referees and proceedings consequential thereon."

In an arbitration with regard to an accident which had happened before the commencement of the Act of 1906, the arbitrator made a remit, under paragraph (15) of the Second Schedule to that Act, to a medical referee to examine and report, and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor which was appealed to the Court of Session.

An appeal having been taken from the judgment of the Court of Session to the House of Lords, held that the judgment of the Court of Session was not a "proceeding consequential" on the medical reference and accordingly that the provisions of the Act of 1897, and not those of the Act of 1906, applied, and excluded the appeal.

The claimant, Alexander Mackay, appealed in forma pauperis to the House of Lords. An objection to the competency of the appeal was taken by the respondent, George Rosie, and the question was reserved by the Appeal Committee for argument before the House of Lords.

Rosie v.
Mackay.

1897 (under which, admittedly, there was no appeal), except as regarded "references to medical referees, and proceedings consequential thereon," to which the Act of 1906 was applied by section 16 thereof. Here there had been no "reference" in the sense of section 16. The only "reference" in the purview of that section was the reference provided for in paragraph (15) of the First Schedule, which was a new, and in a sense an independent, procedure introduced by the Act of 1906. Section 16 did not apply to remits under paragraph (15) of the Second Schedule (the paragraph under which the Sheriff had proceeded), which provided only for an incidental remit for report, and not for a reference, and was in effect just a re-enactment of paragraph (13) of the Second Schedule to the Act of 1897. Further, even if the case was a case of a reference to a medical referee in the sense of section 16, it was absurd to maintain that the subsequent proceedings in the Court of Session, and this appeal to the House of Lords, were "proceedings consequential" on the reference. They were in fact consequential on the original application for review.

Argued for the appellant;—The appeal was competent. Section 16 of the Act of 1906 substituted the provisions of that Act for those of the Act of 1897 in all matters connected with medical references, and its effect was simply that, where the arbitrator had recourse to the machinery of a medical reference, he converted the process under the 1897 Act into a process under the 1906 Act, with the consequence that an appeal was competent to the House of Lords. The word "reference" had not the limited meaning which the respondent sought to give to it, but included a remit for a report under paragraph (15) of the Second Schedule. That was clearly the view of the framers of the Statutory Rules and Orders, 1907. "Proceedings consequential" on the reference was an expression wide enough to cover the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Second Division. In fact if the words did not cover these interlocutors it was exceedingly difficult to give them any meaning, as the reference was a proceeding complete in itself.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—We were promised an interesting discussion upon a point of law under the Act of 1897 which I am afraid we shall be debarred from the pleasure of hearing, because I think there is no jurisdiction in this House to entertain this appeal.

This was an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of an accident which happened before the Act of 1906 came into operation. Under the old Act of 1897 there was no appeal to the House of Lords at all, and therefore, if it had not been for the particular interval of time at which this question has arisen, there could have been no pretence for saying that there was an appeal to this House—that has been decided. But then comes the Act of 1906. Now, the effect of the Act of 1906 is that an appeal to this House is given in cases which come within that Act. But there is also something further in the Act of 1906. The Act of 1906 in effect provides that "so far as it relates to references to medical referees and proceedings consequential thereon," the Act of 1906 is to apply at once; that is to say, to apply to accidents happening before the month of July 1907, at which the Act came into effect.

In this arbitration a point did arise in regard to a reference to a medical referee; it was referred to a medical referee, who made his report and that report was acted upon by the Sheriff; and it is now said that because there was a reference under the Act of 1906 in the case of an arbitration which arose under the Act of 1897, the effect is to draw to that arbitration the power of appeal to this House which did not exist in respect of the arbitration as it originally was commenced.

I cannot entertain the view that that is right. In my opinion accidents which happened before the Act of 1906 came into effect were governed, and are governed, by the Act of 1897 in regard to all their incidents excepting "so far as relates to references to medical referees and to proceedings consequential thereon." I cannot think that "proceedings consequential thereon"—proceedings following upon a reference—include a judgment of the Court of Session; and accordingly, in my opinion, the contention that the power of appeal is constructively attached to a pending arbitration by virtue of those words in the statute of 1906, cannot be supported, and the jurisdiction of this House does not exist. Accordingly, this appeal will have to be dismissed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD ATKINSON.—I agree.

Compulsory Powers—Railway—Mines and Minerals—"Freestone"—Whether freestone a mineral a question of fact—Sufficiency of averments that freestone a mineral—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 70.

Whether "freestone" is or is not a mineral within the meaning of sec. 70 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, is always a question of fact to be determined in view of the particular circumstances of each case.

In defence to a suspension and interdict brought by a railway company to restrain a quarrymaster from working "freestone" under the property of the railway, in respect that the "freestone" was not a mineral within the meaning of sec. 70, and therefore was not excepted from the conveyance of the lands to the railway company, the respondent averred that the "freestone" was a mineral in respect (1) that it did not form the substratum of the soil, and was not the common rock of the district; (2) that it was of exceptional quality and fineness, and of great commercial value; and (3) that at the time when the land was purchased by the railway company it was universally regarded as a mineral, and was so regarded by the railway company and by those from whom they purchased the land.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the respondents' averments were relevant, and proof allowed.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

LORD GORELL.—I take the same view. I concur in the judgment proposed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—In this case the Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. It is pled by one of the parties that the stone in question formed an exception to the general rock of the district. That exception must be established by evidence, and the onus of doing so rests upon the person proposing the exception. In the pleadings of parties under the law of Scotland there is a wholesome rule to the effect that a proof will not be ordered or evidence taken upon a vacuous generality. The whole question in this case is whether this pleading can be so characterised. If so, a party would be prejudiced by the lack of sufficient notice of the other party's case.

I cannot, in view of the passages that have been cited from answer 11, hold that this is a mere generality in pleading. I think the specification is sufficient to entitle the Lord Ordinary to have allowed the proof, and I think the burden of proof should be where I have ventured to put it. I am accordingly of opinion that the appeal should be sustained and a proof allowed, the appellants to lead therein, as was provided by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Cullen, on 6th December 1910. That interlocutor appears to me to have been in all points correct, and should be restored.

ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed; that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor be restored; and that the respondents do pay to the appellants their costs here and below.

Heritable Office—Principal Usher in Scotland—Emoluments—Fees from Peers of the United Kingdom—Treaty of Union, 1706, Art. 20—Act of Union, 1707 (6 Anne, cap. xi.)—Statute—Usage.

The Treaty of Union, 1706, ratified by the Act of Union, 1707, provided:—"XX. That all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life be reserved to the owners thereof as rights of property in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland notwithstanding of this Treaty."

At the time of the Union the holder of the office of principal Usher within the kingdom of Scotland was, under a royal charter dated 21st Dec. 1, 1911. January 1686, ratified by Act dated 15th June 1686, entitled to fees from all Scotsmen receiving honours from the King as sovereign of Scotland, and from Englishmen in Scotland who received such honours. Walker Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

In an action of declarator brought in 1908 by the holders of the office, held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that, inasmuch as Article XX. of the Act of Union did not enlarge the rights of the office but merely reserved these rights unchanged, its holders were not entitled to fees from recipients of honours whose titles were not purely Scottish titles but were titles of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and that, as Article XX. was unambiguous in its terms, no consideration could be given to the fact that from 1766 to 1904 the holders of the office had claimed and received such fees.

The Lord Advocate and others, defenders, appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 10th and 11th July 1911.

At delivering judgment on 1st December 1911,—

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I have had the opportunity of reading my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson's judgment. I agree with it, and I do not think I can usefully add anything to his reasons.

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal against a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session whereby it was declared that the respondents, a body of trustees incorporated by a private Act styled the Walker Trust Act, 1877, and admittedly the proprietors and holders of the heritable office of His Majesty's sole and principal Usher within the Kingdom of Scotland, are, as such, entitled to recover certain fees and dues, claimed to appertain to this office, from the recipients from the Crown of the following honours, titles, and dignities of the United Kingdom, namely, upon the creation of a Duke, £21, 13s. 4d.; of a Marquis, £18, 6s. 8d.; of an Earl, £15; of a Viscount, £10; of a Baron, £6, 13s. 4d.; of a Knight-Baronet, £5; and of a Knight, £3, 6s. 8d.

The action out of which the appeal has arisen was instituted by the Walker Trustees to try their right to recover these fees on the conferring by the Crown of honours, titles, and dignities of this character. The defenders, other than the Lord Advocate, who represents the Crown and the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, are all persons resident in Scotland whose titles are titles of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Two of them, namely, Sir Charles Cayzer, Bart., and Sir Arthur Bignold, are Englishmen, and three, namely, Lord Leith of Fyvie, Sir John Wilson, Bart., and Sir Henry Cook, are Scotsmen. The last-named appellant and Sir Arthur Bignold were created knights by accolade at Buckingham Palace in the year 1904. The titles and honours of all the others were conferred about the same date by patents under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom. The right of the respondents to recover these fees is the sole question for decision.

This office of Usher or White Rod, as he is styled, is a very ancient one. It existed for centuries before the Union of the Crowns of England and Scotland on the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English Throne

Dec. 1, 1911. as James I. of England in the year 1603. It admittedly was, and has Walker never ceased to be, a Scottish office. Its duties, such as they were, were Trustees v. performed in Scotland, and did not, and could not, before the year 1707, Lord Advo- affect or concern the holders of English or Irish peerages, dignities, or cate. honours as such, who were not members of either of the Houses of the Ld. Atkinson. Scottish Parliament, did not attend either general councils or feasts at the Scottish Court, and were not resident in that kingdom.

The earliest document referred to in evidence dealing with the office is a grant of 1393, confirmed by a statute of the Parliament of Scotland, of the Barony of Langton to Alexander Cockburn of Langton, in consideration of certain services to be rendered by him, including those of Usher of Parliaments, General Councils, and Feasts. It is stated in the appellants' case, and apparently not disputed, that charters were granted by the Scottish Sovereign in the years 1510, 1542, and 1595 respectively, consolidating this Barony of Langton, and annexing to it, as a dependency, the office of Usher or White Rod, with all its rights and privileges. It is further stated, and not apparently disputed, that the taking of fees by the holder of this office is first mentioned in a charter, dated in the year 1642, which, however, is not printed in the record. About five years later, on 2nd January 1647, Charles I., describing himself as the King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, by charter under the Great Seal of Scotland, granted to Sir William Cockburn and Robert Cunynghame, therein described, this office, with the privileges and advantages belonging to it, to hold during their lives; and after their decease to the heirs-male and assignees of the said Sir William.

This charter contains a grant, the meaning of which was so much discussed, in the words following:—"Una cum omnibus feodis casualitatibus aliisque devoriis subscriptis solvendis per comites vicecomites Barones Majores Equites baronettos aliosque Equites quovis tempore affuturo creandos aut honores titulos et dignitates recepturos per nos nostrosve commissionarios per literas patentes aut quovis alio modo ab omnibus Scotis solvendis infra nostra dominia et similiter ab omnibus Anglis qui honores et dignitates infra dictum hoc regnum nostrum Scotiae a nobis recipiant, viz." Then follows a list of the fees.

The next charter necessary to consider is that dated 5th June 1674. It grants this office to Sir Archibald Cockburn, son of Sir Wiliam, the former grantee, the said Cunynghame having renounced. It contains a clause differing in no respect from that above quoted from the previous patent, save that after the word "recepturos" the words "per quondam clarissimum nostrum patrem" have been introduced, and the word "nos" omitted after the preposition "per."

Now, the first question one has to ask oneself is, what were the honours and dignities with which King Charles I. and King Charles II. respectively were dealing in these patents? At that period of time each of these monarchs could, as the Sovereign of England, confer English honours and dignities by patent under the Great Seal of England, as Sovereign of Ireland confer Irish honours and dignities under the Great Seal of Ireland, and as Sovereign of Scotland confer Scotch honours and dignities under the Great Seal of Scotland.

If either of these kings sought, in respect of their grants of English or Irish honours or dignities, to exact fees from the grantees, the exaction should be authorised by an Act of the Legislature binding upon the subject who received the grant, i.e., either a native of the particular country, or a person living or sojourning in it, and therefore under the protection of and subject to its laws.—(See Coke's Institutes, part 2, vol. ii., p. 533; Comyn's Digest, title Prerogative, vol. vii., p. 65.)

Whether the law is the same in Scotland as in England on this point, it is unnecessary to discuss, inasmuch as an Act of the Scottish Parliament of 6th September 1681, ratified and confirmed the charter of 5th June 1674, granted to Sir Archibald Cockburn. This statute recites at length the charter of 2nd January 1647, to Sir William Cockburn and Robert Cunyng-hame, and translates into English the clause in that patent, the meaning of which is in controversy, in the following passage:—"All and Sundry the fees, duties, casualties, and profits belonging to the said office within the kingdom of Scotland according to the custom thereof, viz., All and Sundry casualties, fees, and compositions accrescing and belonging to the said office of Principal Usher to His Majesty, and these who exercise the same within the said kingdom of Scotland, and which were in use to be paid to the said Usher for infeftments of lands passing the Great Seal within the said kingdom either by resignations, confirmations, or new gifts, with all fees, casualties, and other duties under written, payable by earls, viscounts, lords, knight-baronets and other knights to be made in all time coming, or who should receive honours, titles, or dignities from His Majesty's said father or His Majesty's Commissioners by patents or any other manner of way. To be paid by all Scotsmen within His Majesty's dominions, and also by all Englishmen who shall receive any honours or dignities from His Majesty within the said kingdom of Scotland."

I have modernised the spelling of the passage. It then sets out that in "corroboration" of all rights and securities granted to Sir Archibald Cockburn and his predecessors, His Majesty granted and confirmed to him, his heirs and assigns, amongst other things, "all fees, casualties, and other duties above written payable by dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, lords, knight-baronets, and other knights, made or to be made, and who shall receive any honours, titles, and dignities by patent or any other way, and payable by all Scotsmen who shall receive . . . dignities within any of His Majesty's dominions, and by all Englishmen who have already obtained and who hereafter shall obtain honours or dignities from His Majesty and his successors within the said kingdom of Scotland." By this patent a salary of £250 sterling per annum was granted to Sir Archibald Cockburn and his assigns, holders of this office, to be paid out of the "first and readiest of the rents duties and casualties payable to His Majesty within the said kingdom of Scotland." This is, if I may so call it, the first stage in the documentary history of the office of "White Rod." No mention is made of the Great Seals of England or Ireland, nor is any English or Irish statute referred to dealing with any of those charters or the fees granted by them. And it would certainly appear to me to be impossible to read over these ancient documents without coming to the conclusion that the honours, titles, and dignities dealt with by them are Scottish honours, titles, and dignities,—that is, honours, titles, and dignities each of the several monarchs as Sovereign of the kingdom of Scotland had power to grant, and to those honours, titles, and dignities alone. It was, as I understood, contended by Mr Clyde, in his ingenious argument, that, owing to the presence of the words “payable by all Scotsmen within our dominions,” the patent applies to honours, titles, and dignities conferred upon Scotsmen by the King, as Sovereign of England, under the Great Seal of England, or as Sovereign of Ireland, under the Great Seal of Ireland, and further that there would be nothing illegal or unconstitutional in the Scottish Parliament passing an Act requiring a Scotsman in whatever part of the three kingdoms he might receive one of those honours, titles, or dignities, or be domiciled, to pay to this Scottish official a fee upon receiving it, inasmuch as he, being a Scottish subject, wherever he might be, owed allegiance to his Scottish Sovereign and submission to the Scottish Parliament.

Mr Clyde may possibly be right upon this point, though legislation of such a kind as he suggests would be somewhat unjust and altogether anomalous. I cannot, however, adopt the construction for which he contends. I think the words “to be paid by all Scotsmen within His Majesty’s dominions” were introduced in order to make those fees recoverable from the Scottish grantee by reason of his nationality in whichever of the three kingdoms he might be resident, or might receive the honour, whereas the English recipient of Scottish honours and dignities could only be reached by a Scottish statute or by a judgment of a Scottish Court if he came within that kingdom. These provisions touching the payment of these fees do not alter the conclusion to which I have come as to the nature of the honours, titles, and dignities dealt with. That this was the view of the Crown and of the Scottish Legislature some few years before the Union is, I think, suggested by the wording of the charter of resignation in favour of Alexander Cockburn junior of Langton, dated 21st January 1686, and in the Scottish statute confirming it, passed on 15th June in the same year. The words in the charter dealing with those fees run thus:—“Una cum omnibus feodis casualitatibus aliisque censibus subscriptis solvendis per duces Marchiones Comites Vicecomites dominos milites Baronettos aliosque equites creatos et creandos ac honores titulos et dignitates a nobis vel successoribus nostris aut commissionariis nostris per literas aut quovis alio modo recepturas ac solvendis per omnes Scoticas (sic) dignitates intra quaecunque nostrorum dominiorum recipientes ac per omnes Anglos qui hactenus assiquiti sunt vel in posterum honores et dignitates a nobis vel successoribus nostris in dicto Regno nostro assequeuntur.” And the confirming statute, though it contains, near the end of it, a general clause of ratification of the patent, recites the charter intended to be ratified as granting all “new gifts with all casualties, fees, and other rents under written payable by dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, lords, knights-baronets, and other knights created, or to be created, and receiving honours, titles, and dignities from His Majesty and his successors within the said kingdom of Scotland.”

It certainly appears to me, therefore, that the rights of the Usher of the White Rod were at the time of the Union simply these:—(1) He was entitled to receive the stipulated fees from the recipients of honours conferred by the King as Sovereign of Scotland ; (2) he could recover those fees from a Scotsman in whatever part of the King's dominions he, the grantee, might be when he received the honour, dignity, or title ; and (3) he could recover the like fees from all Englishmen whenever they received those honours in Scotland, and could, therefore, be reached by the tribunals of that country.

Ld. Atkinson.

The next question is, Did the Treaty and Act of Union alter the White Rod's position, enlarge, or curtail his rights ? In my view articles 20 and 23 of the Treaty left his rights precisely as they were, though, no doubt, they made less lucrative the enjoyment of them. The 20th article runs as follows :—"That all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life be reserved to the owners thereof as rights of property in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, notwithstanding of this Treaty."

It left to this officer all the rights of property he then enjoyed by the law of Scotland by virtue of his office. The operation of this and the 23rd article may, so far as he is concerned, be harsh and oppressive in this, that, as peers of Scotland could not thenceforth be created, he lost the fees which but for the Treaty he would have received. This is undoubtedly so, but while such a consideration might possibly give the trustees a strong claim upon the bounty of the Crown, it cannot affect the question of the proper construction of the Treaty and the ancient documents of earlier date. That is a pure question of law, and is, moreover, the only question for the decision of your Lordships. The Lord Ordinary, the Judges in the Second Division, and, indeed, counsel in argument, have each and all failed, I think, to point out what is the alleged ambiguity in this article of the Treaty—or, indeed, in the earlier documents—which the usage or practice obtaining from 1766 downwards touching the payment through the Treasury of these fees by all recipients of honours, titles, and dignities of the United Kingdom was admitted in evidence to explain or to remove, and have also failed to show how it aided in determining the subject-matter to which any one of these documents applies, or in fixing the limits of the rights they confer.

As against a plain statutory law no usage can prevail—see Lord Brougham, *Magistrates of Dunbar v. Duchess of Roxburghe*¹ ; Lord Campbell, C.J., Gorham v. The Bishop of Exeter.² In *Herbert v. Purchas*³ Lord Hatherley is reported to have said : "It is quite true that neither contrary practice nor disuse can repeal the positive enactment of a statute, but contemporaneous and continuous usage is of the greatest efficacy in law in determining the true construction of obscurely framed documents." In *The Trustees of Clyde Navigation v. Laird & Sons*⁴ Lord Watson says : "When there are ambiguous expressions in an Act passed one or two centuries ago, it may be legitimate to refer to the construction put upon these expressions throughout a long course of years, by the unanimous consent of all parties interested, as evidencing what must presumably have been the intention of the Legislature at that remote period." And in a recent case in your Lordships' House,

Walker

Lord Advocate.

It may be doubted in the present case, however, whether the persons who paid these fees knew anything whatever of the right by virtue of which they were demanded, or whether the payment could be described, to use the language of Lord Watson, as having been made with the consent of all parties interested; but however that may be, the payment of the fees for even 150 years from the year 1766, though undoubted, is, I think, irrelevant, and cannot affect the meaning of the documents your Lordships have to construe, inasmuch as their language is plain and unambiguous. So that the question for decision, in my view, narrows itself down to this: Is an honour or other title or dignity of the United Kingdom, conferred since 1707, a Scottish title, dignity, or honour within the meaning of the foregoing charters and patents of the Scottish King and statutes of the Scottish Parliament?

Ld. Atkinson.

I concur with Lord Low, and, as I understand, with the other learned Judges in the Second Division, in thinking that a post-Union title or dignity or honour is a wholly different thing from the title, dignity, or honour conferred before the Union by the King of Scotland in the exercise of his Royal prerogative as Sovereign of that kingdom.

Where I differ from him and them is in the conclusion that the 20th article of the Treaty of Union is ambiguous in its language, and that because of that the usage of the last 150 years can be relied upon to secure to this officer fees in respect of the honours, titles, and dignities created since its date which are not Scottish honours, titles, or dignities in the sense I have indicated. In my view, the Treaty of Union left the office as it was, with the rights which under the law of Scotland the holder of it theretofore enjoyed in respect to the creation of Scottish honours, titles, and dignities properly so called, and nothing more.

The order of knighthood is not in any sense a local title. It is an order of chivalry recognisable in every part of the King's dominions, and differs in that respect altogether from an earldom conferred by the King as Sovereign of the Kingdom of Scotland—(See Sir John Douglas's Case, Y. B. 20 E. IV. 6, cited in Calvin's Case, 7 Coke's Rep. 15b, 16a).

In my opinion, therefore, the interlocutors appealed from are erroneous and should be reversed, and this appeal be allowed with costs.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with all that has been said by my noble and learned friend opposite, and I therefore think it unnecessary to detain your Lordships by stating my own reasons, which are entirely in accordance with his.

LORD GORELL.—I have had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson, and I fully concur with it.

Right in Security—Pledge—Transfer of Property—Delivery-Order—Appropriation of Goods—Sale—Reduction—Holder for value and in good faith.

A, by means of fraudulent misrepresentations as to his solvency, induced the owner of a cargo of timber to sell it to him. He accepted bills for the price, and in return received the bill of lading blank endorsed. The timber, on delivery, was stored with a firm of timber measurers subject to A's orders. A borrowed money from certain lenders (one of whom was aware that A was in great financial difficulties), and in security therefor he granted to the lenders delivery-orders for certain parcels of the timber. Shortly afterwards A became bankrupt. The sale, on the ground of A's fraud, was subsequently reduced at the instance of the unpaid vendor, who claimed the whole of the timber as being still his property. Claims were also made by the holders of the delivery-orders to the portions of timber covered by these orders.

The First Division held (1) that the holders of the delivery-orders had obtained them for value and in good faith; (2) that the timber transferred by the delivery-orders had been sufficiently identified and appropriated to the transferees; and (3) that consequently the holders of the delivery-orders had acquired a valid title to the timber good against the unpaid vendor.

In an appeal the House affirmed that judgment, with a variation as to a small portion of the timber, consisting of 300 logs, which the House held, on the evidence, had not been sufficiently identified and appropriated to the transferees.

(In the Court of Session, 15th June 1910—1910 S. C. 1095.)

The claimants Price & Pierce, Limited, appealed to the House of Lords.

The claimants T. & R. Duncanson acquiesced in the judgment of the Court of Session repelling their claim, and lodged no appeal.

After hearing counsel for the parties the House delivered judgment on 1st December 1911.

In their judgment their Lordships dealt solely with the effect of the evidence as to the dates when the various parcels of logs were identified and appropriated to the transferees. With regard to the parcels of 1166 and 416 logs, they concurred with the judgment appealed against, but with regard to two parcels of 200 and 100 logs, contained in a delivery-order in favour of the Bank of Scotland, they stated their reasons for adopting the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, who held that the Bank had failed to prove that these logs were Process—Sheriff—Removal to Court of Session for jury trial—Competency—Action of damages by father of deceased workman against son's employers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap 58), secs. 13 and 14—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), secs. 30 and 52.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, enacts, sec. 14, that where an injured workman raises an action in the Sheriff Court against his employer concluding for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or alternatively at common law or under the Act of 1880, the action "shall, notwithstanding anything contained in that Act, not be removed under that Act or otherwise to the Court of Session, nor shall it be appealed to that Court otherwise than by appeal on a question of law." Sec. 13 enacts that any reference to a "workman who has been injured shall, where the workman is dead, include a reference to his legal personal representative or to his dependants."

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, enacts, sec. 30, that cases above £50 in value originating in the Sheriff Court "(other than claims by employees against employers . . . for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or alternatively at common law . . .)" may be remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial, and sec. 52, that "all statutes . . . now in force so far as the same are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act," are repealed.

In an action in the Sheriff Court at the instance of a father, whose son had been accidentally killed, against his son's employers for damages under the Employers Liability Act or alternatively at common law, the pursuer averred that the deceased paid his earnings to his parents for the maintenance of the house. The cause having, on the motion of the pursuer, been remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial under section 30 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, the defenders objected to the competency of the remission on the ground that the pursuer, being a dependant of the deceased, or at anyrate his legal personal representative, was a "workman" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that accordingly, by section 14 of that Act, his right to have the cause removed to the Court of Session for jury trial was excluded.

Held that although it might be that the right of one in the position of the pursuer to have the cause remitted to the Court of Session had been taken away by sections 13 and 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the right, if taken away, had been restored by sections 30 and 52 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907.

Lawrie v.
Banknock

Argued for the appellants;—"Workman" was by section 13 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, defined as including "dependants"; and accordingly removal of this cause to the Court of Session was directly prohibited by section 14 of the Act, the pursuer in the action being a dependant of his son, and therefore, for the purposes of the Act, a "workman."¹ If he was not the dependant of his son, he was at any rate his legal personal representative, which had the same effect. It was true that this definition of workman seemed more appropriate when applied in questions of compensation pure and simple, but it was unlikely that the word was meant to have different meanings in different portions of the Act. Appeal to the Court of Session having accordingly been prohibited by the Act of 1906, it was improbable that it was meant to be restored, indirectly and by inference, by the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907; especially seeing that the main object of that Act was to simplify procedure and restrict appeal. Had it been intended to repeal section 14 of the Act of 1906, the repeal would have been explicit. But an examination of the Act of 1907 disclosed no such intention. That Act, by sections 30 and 31, divided cases into two classes—Employers Liability Act causes and other causes. For the former class of causes a new method of procedure was invented, viz., jury trial in the Sheriff Court without appeal to the Court of Session; for the latter, removal to the Court of Session under certain conditions more or less analogous to those prevailing before the Act. Section 52 of the Act clearly did not repeal the specific provision of section 14 of the Act of 1906.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent was entitled to have the action remitted to the Court of Session for trial by jury under section 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907. He was not an "employee" of the appellants, but the father of one who had been an employee, suing upon his own account an independent action for solatium (which differed in its nature from any other action for damages²), and his action was not an action against "employers" in the sense of the section, but an action against independent third parties who had done the pursuer a personal injury or wrong. This right of his to sue upon his own account for the wrong done to him was in no way affected by the Employers Liability Act of 1880. As soon as proof was allowed in his action he had a right to have the case removed to the Court of Session. This was his right before the Act of 1906.³ The Act of 1906 was not meant to, and did not, affect that right. Section 14 of the Act of 1906 was a Scottish procedure section pure and simple, foreign to the rest of the Act and dealing with actions at common law. It did not per se exclude the respondent's right; that was only effected, as the appellants argued, by the definition of "workman" contained in section 13. But the definition in section 13 obviously only dealt with the proper subject of the Act,

Dec. 12, 1911. viz., workmen's compensation, and did not affect section 14, for which, so far as a definition of "workman" was concerned, reference must be made to the definition of "workman" contained in the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Even, however, if the Act of 1906 had the effect contended for by the appellants, the right had been restored by sections 30 and 52 of the Act of 1907. Section 52 repealed section 14 of the Act of 1906 as being inconsistent with section 30, which directly conferred the right. The respondent's contention was supported by the undernoted cases.¹

Lawrie v.

At delivering judgment on 12th December 1911,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is our duty, as I understand it, to construe Acts of Parliament so as to give effect to what we are satisfied was the intention of Parliament, if the language used admits of that construction. But we are not at liberty to amplify an enactment so as to include within its ambit matters which upon the plain meaning of the language are not included, even if convinced that the omission was inadvertent and undesigned.

In the present case the question raised is whether or not the pursuer was entitled to have the cause remitted for trial by jury to the Court of Session. I cannot help thinking that it was probably intended in 1906 to preclude the remittal of a cause like this. Possibly it was not intended in 1907 to undo what was thought to have been done in 1906. But I also think that it was undone in 1907.

Upon this subject I agree with the reasoning of Lord Johnston. Taking sections 13 and 14 together of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, it seems to me that removal and appeal to the Court of Session are barred (save on a question of law) not only where the action is raised by the workman himself, but also where it is raised by his legal personal representative or his dependants, or other persons to whom or for whose benefit compensation is payable. No doubt this is expressed awkwardly by a mere definition clause; and in view of the contrary opinion expressed by the Lord President I cannot say it is free from doubt. I feel that this view leaves anomalies, and may make the right to appeal turn upon the dependency of a father upon a deceased son, which may be a disputed fact and may be irrelevant to the action, as pointed out by the Lord President. But I think upon the whole that these sections have the effect described by Lord Johnston, though I do not desire to rest my conclusion upon that ground.

I agree with the Lord President and the other Lords of Session that the right, if taken away by the Act of 1906, was restored by the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907, section 30. That section expressly gives the right to remit, as was done here, "in cases originating in the Sheriff Court (other than claims by employees against employers in respect of injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of their employment, and concluding for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or alternatively at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880)."

Here we have, in this case, an action by the father of a deceased workman claiming damages for the death by accident of his son against the employers of the son, resting upon common law or alternatively upon the Employers Liability Act, 1880. How am I to say that this is a claim by an "employee"? There is no definition clause which can be invoked to enlarge the meaning of the word "employee." I do not know whether or not Parliament intended that the employee's father should be in the same position as the employee himself, but it certainly has not said so. I feel that so to hold, as we are asked by the appellants to hold, would be to usurp the function of the Legislature.

 Lord
 Chancellor.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur, and I have only this to add: that though it is not necessary for the decision of this case, as I understand it, to decide what exactly is the meaning of the word "workman" as it occurs in the 14th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, still undoubtedly the present inclination of my opinion is that that section was meant to deal with all actions under the Workmen's Compensation Act which could be raised in Scotland, and that therefore the word "workman" must get the extended meaning put upon it by the definition clause. That certainly is the inclination of my opinion at present, but I hold myself quite free to reconsider the point should it again come before your Lordships' House for decision.

LORD GORELL.—The question in this appeal is whether the respondent, who brought an action for damages in the Sheriff Court, alternatively at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, has the right to remove the cause for trial to the Court of Session, or whether the action must be tried in the Court where it was brought. The respondent is the father of a workman who was killed in the appellants' mine on 21st September 1910. The respondent brought an action against the appellants as employers, concluding for damages, £500 at common law, or alternatively, £179, 8s. in the name of compensation under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and, inter alia, averred that the deceased was his only unfamilial son, and contributed all his earnings to his parents for the maintenance of the house. The appellants in their answer admitted the respondent's right as a dependant to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

The respondent removed the cause to the Court of Session, relying on section 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, which provides for such a remit except in certain specified cases. The appellants contended that the present case was one of those specifically barred not only by the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, but also by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, but the First Division of the Court of Session, on 17th March 1911, held that the cause had been competently remitted, and allowed issues for the trial of the cause in the Court of Session.

Leave to appeal to your Lordships' House was granted on 13th May 1911.

The contention on behalf of the appellants is that the remit was incompetent and contrary to law. Whether this contention is correct or not depends upon the construction of the two Acts last mentioned.

I preface the consideration of those two Acts by referring to two earlier

Dec. 12, 1911. Acts, namely, the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 90), and the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

Lawrie v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Lord Gorell.

The Act of 1875 was an Act the object of which was to enlarge the power of the County Court in England, the Sheriff Court in Scotland, and the Civil Bill Court in Ireland in respect of disputes between employers and workmen, and to give Courts of summary jurisdiction a limited jurisdiction in respect of such disputes. The expression "workman" in the Act was defined as not including a domestic or menial servant, but included other persons as therein expressed engaged in manual labour under a contract with an employer.

The Act of 1880 was entitled thus, "An Act to extend and regulate the liability of employers to make compensation for personal injuries suffered by workmen in their service"; and section 1 provided that where, after the commencement of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman in the five cases mentioned therein, "the workman, or in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work." Section 2 dealt with exceptions to amendment of the law, and section 3 limited the amount of compensation recoverable under the Act to an amount of three years' earnings estimated as provided.

Under section 6 every action for recovery of compensation under the Act is to be brought in a County Court in England, a Sheriff Court in Scotland, and a Civil Bill Court in Ireland, but might, on the application of either party, be removed into a superior Court in like manner and upon the same conditions as an action commenced in a County Court may by law be removed. This would be by certiorari or otherwise if the High Court or a Judge thereof should deem it desirable that the action should be tried in the High Court. In Scotland the action might be removed to the Court of Session at the instance of either party in the manner provided by and subject to the conditions prescribed by section 9 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877.

By section 8 of the Act of 1880 the expression "workman" means a railway servant and any person to whom the said Act of 1875 applies. The Act of 1880 has been continued from time to time and remains in force as amended by section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

In the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, section 13 gives, "unless the context otherwise requires," certain definitions. A fresh definition of "workman" is given among a number of other definitions, and "any reference to a workman who has been injured shall, where the workman is dead, include a reference to his legal personal representative or to his dependants or other person to whom or for whose benefit compensation is payable." Section 14 contains the special provision as to Scotland. According to it, in Scotland, where a workman raises an action against his employer independently of the Act, in respect of any injury caused by accident arising out of or in the course of the employment, the action, if raised in the Sheriff Court and concluding for damages under the Act of 1880 or alternatively at common law or under the Act of 1880, shall, notwithstanding anything contained in that Act, not be removed under the Act Dec. 12, 1911.

or otherwise to the Court of Session, nor shall it be appealed to that Court otherwise than by appeal on a question of law.

Lawrie v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

The last Act I refer to is the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907. Section 30 allowed of the removal by either party to the Court of Session of cases originating in the Sheriff Court (other than claims by employees against employers in respect of injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of their employment, and concluding for damages under the said Act of 1880, or alternatively at common law or under the said Act of 1880) where the claim is in amount or value above £50. Certain powers in the Court of Session to remit were given. Section 31 gave a right to either party to have a jury trial before the Sheriff in any action in the Sheriff Court of the kind excepted in the 30th section where the claim exceeds £50, and section 52 repealed the enactments mentioned in the Second Schedule to the Act to the extent therein mentioned, and all laws, statutes, Acts of Sederunt, orders and usages then in force so far as the same are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act.

Lord Gorell.

If the question depended solely on the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907, I think that it would be free from any doubt, because the action is not an action by an employee against an employer in any ordinary sense. But it is said that employee and employer must be read in a sense different from the ordinary because of the earlier legislation, especially sections 13 and 14 of the Act of 1906.

I think, however, though with considerable doubt, that it would be straining language to hold that the words "where a workman raises an action against his employer," in section 14 of the Act of 1906, include an action such as the present; and although the term "workman" may, according to the 13th section, include other persons where the context does not otherwise require, I am unable to read the 14th section as using the term in its wider signification. It looks to me as if the interpretation clause, section 14, had not been introduced with reference to the special provisions as to Scotland.

However this may be, I think that the express provisions of the Act of 1907 remove any difficulty or doubt, and I agree with the views on this point expressed by the Lord President.

It seems to me that when the 14th section of the Act of 1906 and the Act of 1907 were passed, it must have escaped attention that claims could be made otherwise than by an employee, but whatever may have been the intention, I do not see how the express terms of the Act of 1907 can be overcome.

In my opinion the decision of the First Division should be affirmed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor, and I largely share the views just expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson.

If the range of vision be narrowed to the meaning of the word "employee" the conclusion is inevitable. And I agree that in the interpretation of this Act it must be so narrowed. The words of the Legislature not being ambiguous, the duty of the Judiciary is not doubtful.

Dec. 12, 1911. The results may be unfortunate, unexpected; it may be, as was argued, that a scandal continues. If so, Parliament will note these things. But with regard to them it is beyond the function of a Court of interpretation to give relief, and perhaps even beyond its province to express views or to proffer opinions.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Profits of Trade—Deductions—Interest payable on short loans—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, First Case.

A financial and investment company obtained from bankers in New York sums on temporary and fluctuating loan for periods not exceeding six months in order to pay for securities purchased by it. In stating its profit for the purpose of income-tax the company claimed to deduct the interest paid on these loans, but the Commissioners, being of opinion that the sums borrowed were utilised as additional capital, disallowed the deduction.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the company were entitled to make the deduction, in respect that the sums borrowed were not "capital" within the meaning of the Income-Tax Acts, and the interest was in fact money paid for the hire of the instrument of the company's trade, and as such fell to be treated like any other similar outlay.

Argued for the appellant;—The deduction claimed by the respondents in respect of interest paid by them to the bankers in America upon the loans made to them by the bankers should not be allowed in arriving at the assessable profits of the respondents for the purposes of the Income-Tax Acts.¹ The sums borrowed by the respondents were borrowed for the purpose of being employed as part of their capital. It was immaterial that they were borrowed on short loans,² for that did not alter the circumstance that they formed additional capital in the business. This was clear on the facts of the present case, and it was in every case a question of fact whether or not the money which was borrowed was used as additional capital for the purpose of the business. The present case could not be distinguished from, and was ruled by, the Anglo-Continental Guano Works v. Bell.²

That was a case of borrowing money for the purpose of buying particular cargoes of guano; this was a case of borrowing money in order to buy bonds; but the principle was identical. If the Company had borrowed the money required by them upon debentures from persons resident abroad and not liable to income-tax, no deduction would have been allowed.¹ In the case of Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles,² which was distinguishable from the present, the society's business was to sell annuities, and the question was whether in arriving at its profits it might deduct sums paid in discharge of its annuity contracts. The House of Lords held that the grant of annuities was the business of the society; that it had to pay them out of profits and gains; and that consequently the society were entitled to deduct them. In the Court of Session Lord Johnston referred to a note by Dowell³ with regard to the Anglo-Continental Guano Works case,⁴ where he said that in practice such interest had always been allowed as a deduction, and had continued to be so allowed since that decision. That probably might be a correct statement of the practice where the bankers making the loan were English and not foreign bankers. Here the revenue authorities would not have raised the question had the loan been obtained from English bankers, because the interest paid to the bankers would have been taxed as profits of the bank. *Arizona Copper Company v. Smiles*⁵ was in favour of the appellant's contention. The matter might be illustrated as follows:—The company were anxious to purchase American railway shares, their business being to hold these shares for a rise and then sell them, and so make a profit. Not having enough money to buy the shares out of their existing capital they borrowed money; which was nothing more nor less than raising additional capital for the ordinary business of the company. The present case was quite different from the class of case in which a company borrowed a sum of money for a merely incidental purpose, e.g., where a company borrowed money to pay a dock warrant for the release and delivery of its goods which it desired to sell. In considering any illustrations, however, it must not be left out of sight that the question to be decided here was not how an ordinary business man would regard the matter, but whether the Income-Tax Acts allowed the deduction.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon, but drew the attention of their Lordships to their contention that Rule 3 of the First Case in section 100 of the Act of 1842 dealt with the deduction of a sum for "capital," and did not deal with the question of "interest" at all.

At delivering judgment on 14th December 1911,—

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session, as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, pronounced upon a case stated under the Taxes Management Act, 1880, by

The respondents were assessed to income-tax under the Income-Tax Acts for the year ending 5th April 1909, on the sum of £2404 in respect of the alleged profits of the business carried on by them.

This sum of £2404 was claimed by the appellant to be the average annual profit made by the respondents from the date of their incorporation on 27th July 1905 during two and a quarter years succeeding. In arriving at the sum of £2404 no deduction was allowed in respect of two sums of £80, 5s. 4d. paid during the period of trading up to 31st October 1906, nor of the sum of £4576, 13s. 4d. paid during the year ending 31st October 1907 as interest to bankers of the Company in America on loans made by them to the Company.

The respondent Company carries on an investment business. It has, under its memorandum of association, power to deal in investments and securities of all classes, and has also power to borrow and raise sums of money by way of loan, discount, cash-credit, overdraft, &c., and, further, to grant security for any sums of money so borrowed.

Its course of business during the years for which its alleged profits and gains are assessed is set forth in paragraph 4 of the case stated as follows : —“ 4. In the course of its business the Company purchased in New York certain bonds, stocks, and other securities of American railroad and other companies. The value of the purchases exceeded the amount of the Company's available cash, and certain of the securities which were lying in New York were pledged to Messrs Ladenburg, Thalmann, & Company, the Company's bankers in New York, in consideration of which the bankers allowed the Company's bank account in New York to be overdrawn. The amount of the overdraft fluctuated from time to time as the Company bought and sold securities, and the Company was charged periodic interest at current rates from day to day. In September 1906 Messrs Ladenburg, Thalmann, & Company opened a loan account, in addition to the ordinary overdraft with the Company in New York, on which they granted a loan not exceeding $200,000 to the Company for a period of six months at 6 per cent. When this loan fell due it was renewed for a further period of six months, after which the loan account was terminated, and the balance was transferred to current account. Messrs Ladenburg, Thalmann, & Company collected all the dividends and coupons upon the securities in their hands, paying the interest due to themselves out of the sums so collected, the difference or net amount being credited to the Company. In the event of the dividends and coupons collected not equalling the amount of the interest payable in any month, the interest was debited to the overdraft on the current account.”

It will be observed that the loan was not a loan of $200,000, but a loan up to $200,000. The sum lent, in fact, might fluctuate from day to day or week to week, from cipher up to this limit. The interest payable in respect of the sum lent was not annual interest or an annuity or annual sum payable out of profits and gains within the meaning of Rule 4 of section 100 of the Income-Tax Act of 1842 any more than was the interest paid on the periodical overdrafts fluctuating in amount. That is obvious.

In *Goslings v. Sharpe*¹ it had already been decided by Lord Esher, M.R., Dec. 14, 1911. and Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., in the Court of Appeal, that interest upon a loan by a banker to a customer for a period of less than a year did not fall within the words "any yearly interest of money or any annuity or other annual payment," occurring in 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34, sec. 40. These words are practically identical with the words of Rule 4. I am, therefore, at a loss to understand what possible application the decision in the case of Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave,² so much relied upon in argument on behalf of the appellant, has to the present case, inasmuch as the question decided in that case was whether the interest payable every half-year on such a permanent security as the debentures of the Company fell within the words of Rule 4.

The appellant, indeed, does not seek to ground on that rule this wholly unprecedented attempt of his to exact taxation. He rests it on Rule 3, a wholly different rule, on the ground (1) that the debit balances against the Company on their current account, as well as the loans made on the loan account, constitute "sums employed or intended to be employed as capital" in the respondents' trade or business; and (2) that the interest paid by the respondents to the bank in respect of these loans "comes within the words of the rule as deductions 'for' the sum so employed as capital."

The case of *Mersey Docks v. Lucas*³ decided that the general principle upon which the "profits and gains" of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern are to be ascertained for the purposes of the Income-Tax Acts is this: that the taxpayer is entitled to deduct from the gross profits of his trade or business the expenses necessary to earn them.

*Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles*⁴ establishes that if a taxpayer is trading in money, selling life annuities in consideration of a price received for them, either in a lump sum or by deferred payments, the annuities he sells are precisely in the same position quoad this Act as is the coal sold by a coal merchant or the corn sold by a corn merchant, and are no more to be treated per se as "profits and gains" of his business than are those material subjects of merchandise to be treated as the "profits and gains" of the business of the merchants who vend them.

The profits and gains of any transaction in the nature of a sale must, in the ordinary sense, consist of the excess of the price which the vendor obtains on sale over what it cost him to procure and sell, or produce and sell, the article vended; and part of that cost may consist of the sum he pays for the hire of a machine or the services of persons employed to produce, procure, or sell the article.

The second proposition established in the last-mentioned case is that in these Acts the words "profits and gains" are, where the context does not otherwise require, to be construed in their ordinary signification. I can see no reason for suggesting that this last-mentioned principle should not apply to the word "capital" when used in these statutes, and no reason why it too, where the context does not otherwise require, should not be construed in its ordinary sense and meaning.

Dec. 14, 1911. If one takes the case of an ordinary joint stock bank, whose business consists in the daily or hourly borrowing of money from the customer who lodges money with it either on deposit or current account, for which the bank becomes the debtor, or in lending money to those whose bills or notes it discounts, or whose securities it takes in pledge, and in daily, almost hourly, repaying in driblets, by the cashing of the lenders' cheques, the amount borrowed, then, according to the argument of the Attorney-General, the amount borrowed, fluctuating day by day, if not hour by hour, is to be treated as capital employed in the trade, adventure, or concern of the bank, within the meaning of Rule 3 of section 100 of the Income-Tax Act of 1842. No reduction, moreover, is to be made in respect of the sums lent by the bank on the discount side of its business. Indeed the Attorney-General, as I understood, admitted, as he was by the necessities of his argument obliged to admit, that the result would be the same in the case of a joint stock bank which by its charter or articles of association was absolutely prohibited from increasing its capital. That, it appears to me, simply amounts to this, that the word "capital" must, in this Rule, be held to bear a wholly artificial meaning, differing altogether from its ordinary meaning, though there be no context in the clause requiring that there should be given to it a meaning different from that which it bears in ordinary commercial transactions.

In Bryon v. Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company, Limited,¹ it was held that the borrowing of money for the purposes of the business of the defendants, a carrying company, was a mode of conducting their business within the meaning of the 33rd and 34th sections of the Joint Stock Companies Act of 1856; and the decision has been treated as having also determined that the borrowing by such a company of money by the issue of debentures does not amount to an increasing of the capital of the company. In *General Auction Estate and Monetary Company v. Smith*² the plaintiff company was established for the purchase and sale of estates and property. It granted advances on estates, on property intended for sale, loans on deposits of securities, discounted approved commercial bills, and received money on deposit; so that its business resembled to some extent that of the company in the present case. Under its memorandum and articles of association it had no express power to borrow money; but it was held that being a trading company it had, as such, implied power to borrow money for the purposes of its business. At p. 441 of the report, Stirling, L.J., dealt with the former of these authorities thus: he says, "Now, upon that it seems to me that the case of *Bryon v. Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company*¹ is a direct authority, because what was there done by the company was to raise money on debentures for the purpose of more effectually carrying on the business of the company, and that this is so is shown, I think, by the remarks of Lord Justice Lindley on that very case in Lindley on Companies" (5th ed., p. 191; 6th ed., p. 290). "He says, after discussing the subject of borrowing by companies, 'Connected with the subject of borrowing money is increasing capital. The difference between them is illustrated by Bryon v. Metro- politan Saloon Omnibus Company.¹ In that case the capital of a limited joint stock company had been expended, and a majority of shareholders proposed to borrow money on the credit of the company. A dissentient minority sought to restrain the majority from so doing, and reliance was placed on the doctrine that the capital of the company could not be increased by borrowing money without the consent of all the shareholders. But it was held competent for the majority to borrow money on the credit of the company, and that the doctrine relied upon had no application to the case; the capital of the company being one thing and that which was sought to be increased by borrowing (namely, the cash in hand) being a different thing.' ”

These authorities show that money borrowed by such a company as the respondent company in this case in the fluctuating temporary manner in which it has been borrowed by them—the daily borrowing and lending of money being part of their trade and business—is not to be treated under the Joint Stock Companies Act as “capital.” There is nothing to show that that word should bear a different meaning in the Income-Tax Acts when applied to the proceedings of joint stock companies. The interest is, in truth, money paid for the use or hire of an instrument of their trade, as much as is the rent paid for their office or the hire paid for a typewriting machine. It is an outgoing by means of which the company procures the use of the thing by which it makes a profit, and, like any similar outgoing, should be deducted from the receipts to ascertain the taxable profits and gains which the company earns. Were it otherwise they might be taxed on assumed profits, when, in fact, they made a loss.

It only remains to refer to the case of Anglo-Continental Guano Works v. Bell,² so much relied upon in argument in the Court of Session and before your Lordships. On close examination of this supposed authority it will, I think, be found that it does not apply to the present case so directly as seems to have been assumed. In that case a German company incorporated under the German law, carrying on the business of importers and manufacturers of guano, had its head office in Hamburg and branches in London and elsewhere. The London house was carried on as a separate business, with a separate capital, and conducted the whole of the company's business in the United Kingdom. Sometimes the London house purchased cargoes of guano direct, and in order to pay for them got advances (1) from the head office, and (2) from bankers abroad, sometimes directly, but usually through the central office. What was decided in the case was that the sum paid for interest on these loans could not be deducted under Rule 3, on the ground that the money borrowed was employed as capital, and that this interest was a sum deducted “for” this capital; but the case was treated as if it were a case between partners engaged in a partnership business, one or all of whom is or are trading with borrowed capital.

Mathew, J., as he then was, says, “It appears to me clear when you look at the language of the Act that what are intended to be assessed are the profits of the particular business, and that those profits are to be ascertained in the ordinary way without reference to whether or not a particular

Dec. 14, 1911. partner or all the partners are trading with borrowed capital.”¹ And further on he says, “It is perfectly clear that in the hands of the partners deductions of that class and character are not to be made, because, if made, you would not be ascertaining what really are the profits, not of the partners, but of the business.”² Precisely so. When each of the different members of a firm brings a certain sum of money into partnership, the thing which concerns the firm as a trading entity is the amount brought in, not what it cost each of the contributing members to procure what he brings in. That is a matter as unconnected with the business of the firm as a trading body, whose profits as such are to be ascertained, as is the loss a particular partner might sustain on the sale of the securities he might be obliged to dispose of to procure the money he brings into partnership. Cave, J., deals with the matter in the same way. He says, “It seems to me that that is not so—that the gains of the trade are quite independent of the question of how the capital money is found, that the gains of the trade are those which are made by legitimate trading after paying the necessary expenses, which you have necessarily to incur in order to get the profits; and that you cannot for that purpose take into consideration the fact that the firm or trader has to borrow some portion of the money which is employed in the business.”³ It does not appear to me that the reasoning on which this decision is based can apply to a bank whose business is the borrowing and lending of money, or to an investment company whose business is conducted as is that of the respondents in the present case. If it does apply, then I can only say I think it unsound as so applied, and am unable to concur in it. Moreover, the decision is not binding on your Lordships’ House.

Mr Atkin, though not called on, pointed out that the words of the rule are “no sum shall be deducted for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital,” and would have argued, I presume, that these words could not apply to interest paid by a trading company for the use of money borrowed for the purposes of their trade. It is not necessary to decide the point. He may be right, but I prefer to rest my judgment on the broader ground. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the decision appealed against was right and should be affirmed, and the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD GORELL.—I have had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment of my noble and learned friend which has just been read by him, and I fully concur in it.

MRS ELIZABETH BUTLER OR BLACK AND OTHERS, (Pursuers) Appellants. No. 8.

—Morison, K.C.—Munro, K.C.—MacRobert—Mair.

THE FIFE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, (Defenders) Respondents.—

Horne, K.C.—Beveridge.

Dec. 19, 1911.

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

Reparation—Negligence—Master and Servant—Management of mine—Responsibilities of owners—Competency of officials—Breach of statutory duty—Common employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 58), sec. 49.

The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, enacts, sec. 49 :—"The following general rules shall be observed, so far as is reasonably practicable, in every mine," and then follow, inter alia, rules that the ventilation is to be sufficient to render harmless noxious gas, and that competent persons are to make inspections for, and reports on, the presence of noxious gas, and to withdraw miners in case of danger.

An action of damages at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, was brought against the owners of a pit by the representatives of a miner who had lost his life through inhaling carbon-monoxide gas. The gas, which is a product of incomplete combustion, came from a neighbouring pit (the seams of which were particularly liable to spontaneous combustion), through a connection made about eleven months prior to the accident. The defenders' under-manager and their fireman, for some days prior to the accident, had observed a peculiar smoke in the pit, and knew that a number of the miners had suffered from symptoms which would have suggested the presence of the gas to persons with adequate knowledge, but they made no inspection or report, and did not withdraw the miners, as required by the rules.

It was proved that the managers and fireman were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices, but that they had had little experience of carbon-monoxide gas (which is of very rare occurrence in mines), and failed to realise that what had been observed in the pit indicated the presence of that gas. It was also proved that the defenders, at the time the connection was made between the two pits, took no steps to instruct these officials with regard to this gas, or to secure that their knowledge and qualifications were sufficient to enable them to deal with the dangers arising therefrom.

The defenders, who admitted that the accident was due to the breach of the rules on the part of their managers and fireman, maintained that, so far as the action was laid at common law they were not liable, and the Second Division sustained this contention.

In an appeal, the House (rev. the judgment of the Second Division) held that the defenders could not plead common employment but were liable at common law, in respect that (as they had failed to secure that the persons in charge of the mine were competent to deal with the dangers arising from the presence of poisonous gas), they had been guilty of a breach of the duty imposed on them of taking all practicable steps to secure observance of the statutory rules.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that the Coal Mines Regulation Act does not place upon mineowners an absolute duty of seeing that the statutory rules are observed, but that, if injury occurs through a breach of a rule, the onus is on the mineowners of proving that they have done all in their power to prevent such breach.

(In the Court of Session, 24th November 1908—1909 S. C. 152.)

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was first heard on 8th and 10th March 1910.

Argued for the appellants ;—The decision of the Court below was based upon an erroneous view of the law. The Court held, and

The Court, however, erred in thinking that these rules were imposed solely on the managers and fireman. That was not so. They were imposed absolutely and directly upon the mineowners, and if they were broken, the mineowners were ipso facto liable, even although they themselves had been in no way negligent. The doctrine of common employment could not be pleaded by a master where a statutory duty imperatively laid on him had been neglected. The doctrine of common employment was that the risk of negligence on the part of a fellow-workman was one of the risks accepted by a workman as an implied term of the contract of service, but the risk involved in an employer's failure to discharge a statutory duty absolutely imperative on him was not a risk which the workman must be assumed to have accepted. The absolute character of the statutory duty was supported by the undernoted authorities.¹ There was no distinction between rules imposing duties to be delegated to servants and rules imposing duties to be performed directly by the owner. The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, expressly made the owner of the mine liable for breach of all rules, no matter by whom committed.²

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—The only duty which at common law was laid on a mineowner, in the event of his not personally superintending and directing the work, was to select proper and competent persons to do so.³ It was a new suggestion that the breach of these statutory rules displaced the plea of common employment.⁴ The rules which had been infringed in this case were rules laid upon the managers and fireman. They were the persons who had to perform the duties. It was not disputed that where a duty was specifically laid upon an owner he could not delegate it. The defenders admitted liability under the Employers Liability Act, and the only question was whether they were liable at common law.

The House took time for consideration.

On 25th July 1910 the House remitted the case to the Second Division to pronounce a finding upon the following question:—
“When the connection was made with the old mine in which smouldering fires, followed by the giving off of carbon-monoxide gas, had previously occurred, did the defenders take all practicable means to secure that the persons engaged in supervision, and the fireman appointed as a competent person under the statute, were possessed of the knowledge and qualifications required to deal with the special danger of the presence of noxious gases arising from the connection made?”

On 12th July 1911 the Second Division answered the question by Dec. 19, 1911. pronouncing an interlocutor containing certain findings in fact.*

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

* The findings in the interlocutor appealed against and in the above-mentioned interlocutor were as follows:—

In the interlocutor appealed against, of 24th November 1908:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the defenders' appeal against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of Fife, dated 30th July 1907, sustain the appeal, and recall the said interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact in terms of the first five findings in fact in the said interlocutor appealed against. [These were:—(1) The deceased Alexander Hynd Black, the husband and the father of the pursuers, was on 27th April 1906, and for some time prior thereto, in the employment of the defenders as an oncost worker in their No. 11 pit, Lumphinnans. On the night of Thursday, 26th April, he and Thomas Serrie were sent to repair the main brae in that pit. Early on the morning of Friday, 27th April 1906, while they were so engaged, they were overcome by carbon-monoxide gas and lost their lives: (2) At the time of the accident the air current for ventilating No. 11 pit was brought down the shaft of No. 1 pit, being thus the downcast shaft, and after passing through the Lochgelly Splint and Parrot Seam of No. 1 pit ventilated all parts of No. 11 pit, the shaft of which was the upcast for the return air. The Lochgelly Splint and Parrot Seam is universally recognised to be specially liable to spontaneous combustion, and part of this seam in No. 1 pit was on fire in 1901. This outbreak was treated by sealing up the fire area with stoppings, but it was not possible in long wall workings as these were to be sure that the fire was quite extinguished. The air course from No. 1 pit to No. 11 pit passed near some of these stoppings, and any fumes which might escape from leaking stoppings must be carried with the air through all the workings of No. 11 pit: (3) On Tuesday, 24th April 1906, John Gray, who was manager of both pits, was informed by Hunter, an oversman in No. 11 pit, that there was a strange smell in the air coming to No. 11 pit, and he instructed Hunter to examine the workings. Hunter found some smoke issuing from stoppings not far from the seat of the old fire in No. 1 pit, and set men to repair them. Gray then formed the opinion that the smell came from the seat of the old fire in No. 1 pit: (4) On Wednesday, 25th April, and Thursday, 26th April, there was smoke or haze with a peculiar smell in the workings of No. 11 pit, and several of the miners, including the deceased Black, were affected with headache and vomiting. Some of the men complained of the air to Gibbons, the fireman, who himself felt the effect a little in his head. The air on the Thursday was rather clearer in appearance. The men were allowed to work in the pit as usual on both days, and Black and Serrie were sent down on Thursday night to do repairing work: (5) After the first discovered leak in the stoppings was repaired, smoke and fumes were found to be issuing from another leak, and men began to repair this second leak on Thursday, 26th April. On Friday, 27th April, about 3 A.M., a squad of men resumed work at this stopping; but in two or three minutes some of them were overcome, and they had to abandon the work of repair for the time. It was probably at this time that the deceased Black lost his life in No. 11 pit.] Find further in fact (6) that the cause of the death of Alexander Hynd Black was the escape of carbon-monoxide gas from the fire in No. 1 pit; (7) that John Gray, the manager, John Hunter, the under-manager, and John Gibbons, the fireman, all at No. 11 pit, were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices; (8) that there was no negligence on the defenders' part in appointing and continuing to employ the said manager, under-manager, and fireman; (9) that the said John Hunter and John Gibbons, having duties of superintendence in No. 11 pit, were guilty of negligence in respect that, although for two days prior to the accident they were aware that a haze, having a peculiar smell,

Dec. 19, 1911. employers are not responsible except in terms of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The Court below has rejected the first alternative and has found in law that the pursuers, the appellants, have no claim against the defenders, the respondents, at common law, but only under the Employers Liability Act. This finding in law which your Lordships are asked to review is based upon a series of specific findings in fact which, by the statute regulating appeals of this description, this House is bound to accept as "finally and conclusively fixing the several facts so specified." The interlocutor appealed against was pronounced by the Second Division of the Court of Session, on reviewing a judgment of the Sheriff Court of Fife proceeding on a proof taken upon a record made up in that Court. The Court of Session had full power to review the Sheriff's judgment both in fact and in law, and for that purpose the learned Judges were bound to consider the proof and determine the facts for themselves. But their judgment is appealable to this House "only in so far as the same depends on or is affected by matter of law." This House, therefore, as Lord Watson puts it in Mackay v. Dick & Stevenson,¹ "has no concern with the proof led in the Sheriff Court"; and although a remit may be made to the Court below to pronounce further findings if it can be shown that there are material questions of fact left undetermined, "that can only be shown," says Lord Watson, "by a reference to the record and not to the proof." In this case, accordingly, your Lordships, being precluded from looking at the proof, made a remit to the Court of Session in order to obtain their determination of a material question of fact fairly raised upon the pleadings and the opinions of the learned Judges, but which had not been explicitly answered in the interlocutor under appeal. We now have their answer, which is perfectly clear and explicit, in the interlocutor of 12th July; and the whole determining facts are therefore to be found in the two interlocutors read together.

From these interlocutors it appears that the deceased miner was killed by a poisonous gas while working in the defenders' colliery on 27th April 1906. The pit in which he was working, No. 11 pit, was at the time ventilated by an air current brought down the shaft of another pit (No. 1), with which it had been brought into connection in the previous year, and the accident was due to the formation of this connection. No. 1 pit contained a seam, called the Lochgelly Splint and Parrot Seam, which, according to the finding of the Court, is universally recognised to be specially liable to spontaneous combustion, and part of it was on fire in 1901. The fire area had been sealed up, but it was impossible, from the character of the workings, to be sure that the fire was quite extinguished; and in fact it was still smouldering when the connection with No. 11 was made. It appears that an underground fire in this condition may give off a gas called carbon monoxide, which is so poisonous that the presence of a very small quantity of it in the atmosphere will cause death. It is, however, a gas of very rare occurrence in mines; and the learned Judges say in their opinions, although it is not expressly so found in the interlocutors, that it is very difficult to detect its presence except by its effect on the system, since it has neither colour, taste, nor smell, and cannot be perceived by the senses. It was an escape of this deadly carbon-monoxide gas from No. 1 into No. 11 pit which caused the death of the miner. Dec. 19, 1911.

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

These facts being ascertained, the Court had next to inquire whether the death was imputable to the fault of any person or persons employed in the mine; and on this question they found that the gas escaped into No. 11 pit through leaks in the stoppings which surrounded the whole area of the fire in No. 1 pit. I do not understand that the mere existence of leaks is imputed to negligence. But the possibility of their occurrence, and the necessity for repairing them when they occurred, were known to the manager, under-manager, and fireman; and it is found that "John Hunter, the under-manager, and John Gibbons, the fireman, were guilty of negligence in respect that, although for two days prior to the accident they were aware that a haze having a peculiar smell had appeared in the pit and that several workmen had been seized with headache and sickness, they took no steps, by withdrawing the workmen or otherwise, to guard against injury to those employed in the pit, until the cause of the haze and smell were discovered and removed"; and further, they found that John Gibbons failed to observe the provisions of Rule 4 (1) and Rule 7, enacted by section 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and also of special Rule 37 passed in terms of the powers conferred by section 51 of the said Act, and that the said John Hunter failed to observe the provisions of the said Rule 7. The grounds in fact and law for these findings are expressed very concisely and forcibly by the Lord Justice-Clerk when he says: "Upon the question whether there was conduct on the part of the responsible persons in charge involving liability under the Employers Liability Act, I have no doubt whatever. I cannot hold that either Hunter, the under-manager, or Gibbons, the fireman, fulfilled their duty of due inspection, or of moving the men out of danger in the circumstances. The account given of the exceptional state of things that was found on the day in question convinces me that there was sufficiently strong ground for not allowing the ordinary work to go on, until it was made clear, by proper means being taken, that there was no danger." I take it that the learned Judges thought that the two men in question neglected a duty imposed upon them by the circumstances, independently of special enactment, as well as by the statutory rules cited in the interlocutor. But for the present purpose it is more important to attend to the specific duties imposed by the statute. The general Rule 4 (1) provides for a daily inspection of the mine before the miners go to work; and, in particular, it prescribes that "a competent person" shall inspect the mine, "and shall ascertain the condition thereof" in certain respects, and in particular "so far as the presence of gas . . . and general safety are concerned," and that a report specifying where noxious or inflammable gas, if any, was found present, and what, if any, other source of danger was observed shall be recorded without delay in a book to be kept at the mine for the purpose and accessible to the workmen. Rule 7 prescribes that if at any time it is found by the person for the time being in charge of the mine or any part thereof that by reason of inflammable gases prevailing in the mine or that part thereof, or from any cause whatever, the mine or that part is dangerous, every workman shall

Lord Kinnear.

Dec. 19, 1911. be withdrawn and a competent person appointed for the purpose shall inspect the mine, and make a true report of its condition ; and a workman shall not, except in so far as is necessary for inquiring into the cause of danger or for the removal thereof, be re-admitted into the mine or part found dangerous, until the same is stated by the person appointed as aforesaid not to be dangerous. The special Rule No. 37 required the fireman to record without delay, in a book to be kept at the mine for the purpose and accessible to the workmen before commencing work, where noxious or inflammable gas, if any, was found present. For the application of these rules to the case it is proper to add that "the person for the time being in charge of the mine" was Hunter, the under-manager, because the manager was unwell at the time and unable to go down the pit ; and that Gibbons, the fireman, was the competent person required to make the daily inspection, and to make and record the reports specified in Rule No. 4 (1) and the special rule. The learned Judges impute to these two persons, therefore, that they failed to observe rules which are perfectly clear and explicit and obviously of the utmost importance for the protection of the workmen. For two days before the accident they had observed the presence in the workings of a peculiar haze or smoke, and at the same time they knew that some of the men had been suffering from headache and sickness. They might not be sufficiently instructed to connect these symptoms with carbon monoxide, but there was evidence enough of the presence of a poisonous gas of some kind to make it their plain duty to keep the men out of the pit until the leakage from No. 1 pit had been discovered and stopped. This plain duty they failed to perform, and the fireman Gibbons failed also to perform the special duty incumbent upon him of recording these things in a book accessible to the workmen, and so affording them an opportunity of refusing to go into the working places until the haze had been got rid of.

Now the judgment is not impugned in so far as it imputes to these two men negligence for which the respondents are liable under the Employers Liability Act ; and the grounds on which it has been so decided, so far as we are in a position to judge of them, appear to me irresistible. But the question remains whether the judgment is right in so far as it finds that the respondents are liable only under that Act and not otherwise.

This finding in law is based upon two specific findings in fact : (7) that the manager, the under-manager, and the fireman "were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices" ; and (8) that "there was no negligence on the defenders' part in appointing, and continuing to employ, the said manager, under-manager, and fireman." If this last finding were an exhaustive statement of fact, and of fact only, it would be conclusive of the whole case, because your Lordships have no jurisdiction to review the decision of the Court below on matter of fact. But it involves matter of law, because it means that no ground of liability in respect of negligence has been established against the respondents. But negligence is not a ground of liability, unless the person whose conduct is impeached is under a duty of taking care ; and whether there is such a duty in particular circumstances, and how far it goes, are questions of law. If a definite duty has been ascertained, a finding that it has been duly performed or neglected is a mere finding in fact which your Lordships will not review. But a finding as to negligence, Dec. 19, 1911. which implies the existence of a duty without explicitly defining it, is a proposition of mixed fact and law. Your Lordships must therefore disentangle as well as you can the facts from the law in order that you may decide the question which the parties are entitled to bring to this House by way of appeal. In that duty I think there is little difficulty in the present case, because the learned Judges have explained very clearly the legal liability which in their view attaches to the respondents. In so far as the eighth finding "depends on or is affected by" the law so expounded, it is unquestionably subject to appeal.

The main ground on which the judgment on this point was impugned by the appellants' counsel was that the statute imposes the duties, which are found to have been neglected, absolutely and directly upon the mineowners; and, therefore, that they have a good ground of action independently of negligence. I agree that if an absolute duty is imposed upon mineowners by statute, they must be liable absolutely to those for whose benefit it is imposed; and that if the things so required to be done are not done, it will be no answer to say that the failure is not owing to any fault or omission of theirs. That such an absolute duty may be imposed by statute I have no doubt whatever, and probably there may be some such duties imposed upon mineowners by the statute in question. But I find no such absolute duty in the statute with reference to the two rules which are said to have been infringed. The table of rules in which they occur is introduced by the general enactment that the following general rules are to be observed, not absolutely and in any event, but "so far as reasonably practicable in every mine." Nor are the two rules in dispute addressed directly to the mineowners. Section 49 imposes a variety of obligations upon a variety of persons, some upon managers and inspectors, some upon working colliers, some upon owners, and some upon anybody who goes down into the pit; and the particular rules with which we are concerned are imposed expressly and directly, not upon the owners themselves, but upon the manager in charge for the time being, or upon the person specially appointed by him or the owners for a certain specific purpose. But it is unnecessary to argue whether rules so qualified and so directed import an absolute duty on the respondents or not, because the point is decided by the judgment of this House in David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company.¹ In that case an action was brought by the widow of a miner who had been killed by an explosion in a mine caused by blasting operations conducted in contravention of the statutory rules, and the learned Judge by whom the case was tried directed the jury that the duty of the owners in respect of the rules was, in the first place, to publish them, and, in the next place, to enforce them to the best of their power as rules for the working of the mine, and that if they did so to the best of their power they would not be responsible if one of their servants by a breach of the rules caused damage; and with these directions he left to the jury the questions, first, whether the shot was fired in contravention of the rules, and, secondly, whether the contravention was brought about by the defendants not taking reasonable means

The learned Judges impute to these two persons, therefore, that they failed to observe rules which are perfectly clear and explicit and obviously of the utmost importance for the protection of the workmen. For two days before the accident they had observed the presence in the workings of a peculiar haze or smoke, and at the same time they knew that some of the men had been suffering from headache and sickness. The main ground on which the judgment on this point was impugned by the appellants' counsel was that the statute imposes the duties, which are found to have been neglected, absolutely and directly upon the mineowners; and, therefore, that they have a good ground of action independently of negligence. I agree that if an absolute duty is imposed upon mineowners by statute, they must be liable absolutely to those for whose benefit it is imposed; and that if the things so required to be done are not done, it will be no answer to say that the failure is not owing to any fault or omission of theirs. ¹ [1909] 2 K. B. 146, [1910] A. C. 74.

Dec. 19, 1911. to prevent it by enforcing the rules to the best of their power. But with reference to this last question he further directed them that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to give evidence that the mineowners had neglected their duty of enforcing the rules. The jury answered the second question in the negative; and the Court of Appeal, by a majority, ordered a new trial on various grounds, as to which there was a great diversity of judicial opinion. The judgment was affirmed in this House, but on one ground only, to wit, that the learned Judge had misdirected the jury as to the onus of proof. Lord Halsbury pointed out that the Act required certain precautions to be taken, none of which were taken; that this circumstance obviously called for some explanation; and that on the question whether the authorities of the mine had done their duty in taking proper care for the safety of the miners, the burden of proof lay upon the defendants. The noble and learned Earl expresses no disapproval of the charge in so far as it explains the duty of the mineowners, nor does he indicate that the question whether they had not taken all reasonable means to prevent the accident was not a proper one for the jury; for in stating the effect of the misdirection, his Lordship says, that although the learned Judge left the question to the jury, which I think implies that he left the proper question to the jury, he left it in such a way and with such a direction that it was hardly possible for them to find any other verdict than that which they did find.

It appears to me that by ordering a new trial on these grounds this House has negatived the absolute statutory liability for which the appellants contend. For if each of the rules contained in section 49 imposes on the mineowners an absolute duty irrespective of negligence, it would have been no answer to say that they had taken all reasonable means to prevent contravention, and no question of onus could have arisen. But then the case decides at the same time that, although it be not an absolute duty, there is still a duty cast upon the mineowners in respect of the performance of the statutory rules even when these are to be actually carried out by other persons than the mineowners themselves, and further, that if an injury be caused by a breach of the rules, the burden of proving that they have done all in their power to prevent such breach lies upon the mineowners themselves. I confess to thinking that the learned counsel for the appellants put their case unnecessarily high when they argued so strenuously for an absolute liability. The judgment of which they complained finds that the respondents are not liable, because the accident which caused this miner's death was due to the negligence of persons in their employment. The true question appears to me to be, not whether the statute imposes an absolute duty with reference to each and every one of the specific rules which the 49th section contains, so that in every case of contravention and in all circumstances the owners must be liable for any consequent injury; but the question is whether it imposes such a duty upon the mineowner personally as to preclude him from putting forward the defence of common employment. This is, of course, a perfectly well-established exception from the ordinary rule of law which makes a master responsible for his servants, because it is held to be an implied term of the contract of service that the workman takes the risk of injuries arising from the negligence of other servants in the same employment. But that goes no further than to relieve the master of liability to his servant unless there be negligence on his part in that which he personally undertakes, or is required by statute to do, for the benefit of the servant.

Dec. 19, 1911.
Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

The question which is raised by the judgment, therefore, is whether there was any statutory duty incumbent upon the respondents themselves which will exclude the plea of common employment, notwithstanding that the direct cause of injury has been found to be the negligence of their under-manager and fireman. I think that that question again is decided by the case of David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company.¹ But to apply that decision to the present case it is necessary to see what is the precise statutory duty in which the respondents are said to have failed. The judgment in *David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company*¹ does not expound in detail the particular clauses of the Act upon which the question arises; and I cannot express with confidence any opinion of my own as to the exact construction of the 49th and 50th sections, because it is hardly possible to do so without finding oneself at variance with one or other of the very eminent Judges who have already given conflicting opinions upon that point. I venture to say, however, that to my mind the preferable way of interpreting the Act is to take these two consecutive clauses together, to consider how they are related to one another, and so to get at the true meaning and intent of the whole enactment.

Now the 49th section, as I have already said, imposes certain specific duties upon particular persons, but it begins with a general imperative enactment that the rules which are thereafter to be stated in detail shall be "observed so far as is reasonably practicable in every mine." I think that is an enactment expressly directed not only to people who are charged with the actual performance of specific duties, but also to the owners who have the ultimate control of the mine. There is nothing in the form of the language to limit its application to particular persons. It is addressed to all whom it may concern; and I think it impossible to suppose that the mineowners are outside the scope of that general enactment. But the particular rules which are covered by it are for the most part addressed not to the owner, but to the working miners and managers underground. For example, I think it out of the question to hold that if a working collier neglects a specific direction as to the use of a safety lamp, or if he is found in particular parts of the mine with lucifer matches in his possession, that is a breach of an absolute duty imposed upon the mineowner. It may be that certain of the other rules of a different character directly affect the mineowner, as was held by the Court of Session in Bett v. Dalmeny Oil Company.² But the two with which we are now concerned are not among these, because mineowners are absolutely debarred by the statute from interfering personally with the management of the mine. They are bound by very stringent regulations to appoint certificated managers and under-managers, whose authority completely displaces their own. It is nothing to the purpose to say that employers, and in particular joint stock companies, must act through their servants; because the point to be established is that the defence of common employment is excluded by reason of a

Dec. 19, 1911. statutory duty imposed on the employers personally, which they cannot throw over upon their servants. But I think the appellants make that point good when they appeal to the general enactment that the rules shall be observed, because in so far as it is addressed to the mineowners that provision, in my opinion, imposes upon them a duty to use due care and diligence to secure that the rules shall be obeyed. If this is a duty of diligence, it follows that the mere breach of a rule addressed directly to a servant will not of itself fix the employer with an absolute liability, but on the other hand it follows equally that the occurrence of an accident through a breach of rule, which it was his duty so far as possible to prevent, raises a presumption against him which he is called upon to rebut. If the rules are broken and mischief follows, there is prima facie evidence of failure of duty, and although the employer may have a complete defence if he has done his best, the burden of proving it lies upon him. This involves no departure from the general rule that, where the balance is even as to the existence of negligence, the party who founds upon the negligence of another must prove his cause of action, because the scale is turned when it is proved that an accident has happened which the employer was bound to prevent.

Black v.

Lord Kinnear.

I come to this conclusion upon the 49th section alone, but I am confirmed in my reading of it by the provisions of the 50th section, which make every contravention of, or non-compliance with, the general rules an offence against the Act punishable by a fine. I agree that the imposition of a penalty as for a statutory offence does not prove that there is also a civil liability. But the 50th section does not define the offence, which it makes punishable, otherwise than by reference to the 49th. It assumes that there are duties already created, and recognizes that they are incumbent in different ways upon different persons. For it begins by enacting that every person who contravenes any of the general rules shall be guilty of an offence, and that is as directly applicable to owners and managers as to anybody else; and then it goes on to show that there is another and different duty imposed upon owners and managers as such, and not upon persons engaged in the daily work of the mine. For it says that in the event of a contravention by any person whomsoever "the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power of enforcing the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance." I cannot read this last clause as the remission of a penalty which it assumes to be already imposed. It is an essential part of the definition of the offence. If any person whosoever, other than the owner himself, has contravened a rule, the owner has committed no breach of duty and is guilty of no offence, provided he can prove that he has taken all reasonable means to the best of his power to prevent such contravention. If he has not taken such means he is in breach of duty and is therefore guilty of an offence. I do not go to the penalty clause for the purpose of inferring a civil liability. But I think it of material importance to the question of construction because, while the duty had been already laid down, it became necessary to determine its scope and extent with more precision when non-performance was to be made a punishable offence.

If the duty be established, I do not think there is any serious question as to the civil liability. There is no reasonable ground for maintaining that a proceeding by way of penalty is the only remedy allowed by the statute. The principle explained by Lord Cairns in Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Company,¹ and by Lord Herschell in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board,² solves the question. We are to consider the scope and purpose of the statute, and in particular for whose benefit it is intended. Now the object of the present statute is plain. It was intended to compel mineowners to make due provision for the safety of the men working in their mines, and the persons for whose benefit all these rules are to be enforced are the persons exposed to danger. But when a duty of this kind is imposed for the benefit of particular persons, there arises at common law a correlative right in those persons who may be injured by its contravention. Therefore I think it is quite impossible to hold that the penalty clause detracts in any way from the prima facie right of the persons for whose benefit the statutory enactment has been passed to enforce the civil liability. I think this has been found both in England and Scotland in cases in which the point was directly raised, the case of *Groves v. Lord Wimborne*³ in England, and *Kelly v. Glebe Sugar Refining Company*⁴ in Scotland.

Then, if that be so, the only question that remains is whether the duty so imposed upon the mineowner of using all due care and diligence to prevent the contravention of the rules by anybody in the mine, is or is not a duty that precludes him from putting forward the plea of common employment. I think it is very clear that it is such a duty. The negligence of the persons in the employment of the respondents is the very cause of liability which the statute creates. They are to do their best in order to prevent persons in their employment from contravening the rules, and it is out of the question to say that it is a good defence to show that the direct cause of the injury was the negligence of their servants, which is the very thing they were bound to prevent, if they did not do what was in their power to prevent it. But I am afraid I ought not to have detained your Lordships so long by an examination of the statute or its legal consequences, because I say again I think this point, like the former, is directly decided by the case of David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company,⁵ for your Lordships in that case held that, when an action had been brought for an injury caused by a contravention of the rules, the question as between the plaintiff and the mineowners was whether the contravention had happened notwithstanding that the mineowner had done all in his power to prevent its happening, and that the burden of proving that he had performed that duty, which was cast upon him for the safety of his workmen, lay upon the mineowner.

The only question that remains then is whether upon the findings in fact, which form the only basis upon which your Lordships must apply the law to the particular facts of this case, it is shown that the respondents

Dec. 19, 1911. have discharged the burden laid upon them by proving that they have formed their duty towards their workmen. I should have thought very doubtful if it had to be determined by reference to the interlocutory judgment first appealed against, as explained by the opinions delivered in the cases below. It is evident in the first place that the learned Judges treated the case as an ordinary action for negligence, in which it was for the pursuers to prove the negligence that they alleged. And, since the injury was due to the fault of fellow-servants, the Court held that this could only be done by showing that the master had failed to use due care and diligence in the selection of competent persons to superintend and carry on the work. That is the meaning of the judgment. This is clearly brought out in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, where he says,—“On a consideration of the evidence in this case I am not satisfied that the defenders have been proved to have been negligent in making the appointment.” This is the point of view which the statute requires to be taken. But a difficulty was created by the terms of the interlocutor finding that the defenders were not negligent. It is preceded, as your Lordships are aware, by a finding that the persons whose conduct is impugned as negligent were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required in persons holding their office. If the succeeding finding, that there was no negligence, meant only that the employers were not negligent in respect to the appointments they made, it would mean that they had satisfied themselves that the qualifications and experience of these two men were those of ordinary under-managers and firemen, who might be without the knowledge and experience which would enable them to detect and guard against danger from carbon monoxide, your Lordships, I think, would have required to consider whether that was not a finding “affected” (to use the phrase in the Judicature Act) by an erroneous view of law. But then there might be quite a different question if the terms of the finding, that there was no negligence in continuing to employ these persons, were intended to mean that when a new danger was brought into existence by the connection of No. 11 pit with No. 1, so as to expose the persons working in the former pit to injury by the escape of poisonous gas from the latter, the respondents had directed their attention to the question of the skill and experience which was required for dealing with the emergency and had continued to employ the men originally appointed because they were then satisfied that they possessed such skill and experience. I apprehend it might very reasonably be said that mineowners, who are themselves precluded from interfering with the working in the mine, could do no more than take due care to see that the people whom they employed were competent and had qualifications adequate to meet the particular danger which they had to consider; and therefore your Lordships thought it necessary that we should obtain from the Court a more specific statement as to what they held that the respondents had really done in order to satisfy themselves of the competency of the men employed to deal with this particular emergency. Your Lordships have received an answer, and I think it necessarily follows from all I have said that the answer actually given by the Court to this question is conclusive against the respondents, for the answer is, “That it would have been practicable”—and I pause to remind your

“That it would have been practicable (had such a danger been anticipated) ^{Black v.} for the defenders to cause instructions to be given to Gray, Hunter, and ^{Fife Coal Co.,} Gibbons as to the symptoms and dangers of an outburst of carbon monoxide, ^{Limited.} and that the defenders did not take any means at the time when the con- Lord Kinnear. nection between No. 1 and No. 11 pits was made, or thereafter, to secure that the knowledge and qualifications of the persons engaged in the supervision, and of the fireman, were sufficient to enable them to deal with the special danger which might arise from a sudden outbreak of carbon-monoxide gas.”

I think that is conclusive of the whole question. But then the learned Judges in the Court below have thought it necessary or proper to accompany this answer to the question which was put to them by your Lordships by a series of findings in fact which were not before the House when the case was first argued. I think, if I may respectfully say so, the Court was perfectly right in taking this course, because I think it was for them to make it clear to the House what the specific determining facts really were, and if they had omitted from their first interlocutor, for reasons which might be perfectly sufficient in the view which they took of the law, any specific fact which they thought material to the question put to them by this House, it was right and proper that they should now state it and bring it under your Lordships' notice. But then I think the only question which arises upon this specific statement of new facts is whether anything in that statement modifies or detracts from the legal effect of the final statement, that the respondents took no means to secure that the knowledge and qualifications of the persons engaged in supervision were sufficient to enable them to deal with the special danger which arose. This might not have been conclusive if it had been found that no such means were practicable. But the contrary is found in the preceding sentence. I think this amounts to a finding in fact that the respondents failed to perform the duty imposed upon them for the safety of their workmen, inasmuch as they failed to take all reasonable means to the best of their power to prevent the contravention of rules which brought about the accident.

I am therefore of opinion, and I so move your Lordships, that the interlocutor appealed from should be reversed. I presume, unless the parties agree as to damages, the case must go back to the Court of Session in order that they may assess damages upon the ordinary rules of common law liability and not upon the limited scale provided by the Employers Liability Act.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—On the position of this House, in view of the findings of the Second Division, I agree entirely with the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear. It appears to me that on pure questions of fact the findings must be here accepted as final. But (1) it is not so in regard to any findings which are findings in law or on mixed fact and law; (2) nor is it so as to the legal results implied in or following from any findings whether of law or of fact.

The case on its merits and facts is one of such general importance in the

Dec. 19, 1911. mining and industrial world, and has been so fully and anxiously pressed and considered, that I have thought it right to resume them as follows

Black v. Fife Coal Co., Limited. Alexander Hynd Black and a fellow-workman, Serrie, both oncost workers in the defenders' No. 11 pit, Lumphinnans, on 27th April 1906 lost lives in the mine by inhaling carbon-monoxide gas. The learned Sheriff-substitute (Hay Shennan) has detailed the circumstances in the first findings in fact by him,¹ which are adopted in the interlocutor of the Second Division. No one can peruse these without being satisfied that, if it is possible to impute personality and knowledge to a limited company, the defenders must have been well aware that the particular coal measures then being worked were of a specially dangerous character, owing to the occurrence of fires and the escape of noxious and deadly gases. Three men, George the manager, Hunter, the under-manager, and Gibbons, the fireman, were employed at the pit. The Second Division find "(9) that the said John Hunter and John Gibbons, having duties of superintendence in No. 11, were guilty of negligence in respect that, although for two days prior to the accident they were aware that a haze having a peculiar smell had appeared in the pit, and that several workmen had been seized with headache and sickness, they took no steps, by withdrawing the workmen, or otherwise, to guard against injury to those employed in the pit until the cause of the haze and the smell were discovered and removed." The learned Sheriff-substitute in the adopted findings shows that this was not a mere case of withdrawing the workmen, but a case on two, and possibly three successive days of readmitting workmen to parts of the mine in which the most noxious and dangerous gas, known as carbon monoxide, was apt to operate with fatal effect.

It is extremely difficult to understand how, in such a situation, men could be supposed to be competent who had no knowledge of the dangerous properties of the gases in these pits, or of the peril to human life involved in the non-withdrawal or readmission of workmen in the circumstances described. I share to the full, accordingly, the view expressed by the learned Lord Justice-Clerk, when he says: "I have found this case to be not unattended with difficulty, particularly in view of the fact that the Sheriff-substitute who evidently gave the case great attention, has held that the defenders are liable in damages at common law on the ground that they did not exercise due care in appointing persons of sufficient skill to take charge of the work in their mine." I think it incredible that if men had had such knowledge without which it is manifest that the lives of those who had to obey their orders were put in hourly peril, they should not have complied with vigour and alacrity to the statutory obligations prescribing imperatively for the withdrawal and non-admission of men from and to the dangerous area.

As the case originally came to your Lordships' House it was a matter for consideration whether the Second Division did find, or did not, that the persons "put in charge of the works" by the respondents knew these essential facts—essential, that is, if the intention of the Legislature to afford those workmen protection from the perils which surround them were to receive anything like attention and effect. Lord Low remarks that it is

"proved that the death of the miner, Black, was caused by carbon monoxide having found its way into No. 11 pit along the air passage from the old fire, and that the managers and fireman were not alive to the danger, having had no previous experience of carbon monoxide." What then—this being—was the actual finding of fact upon which your Lordships' judgment could proceed? It is in these terms: "(7) That John Gray, the manager, John Hunter, the under-manager, and John Gibbons, the fireman, all at No. 11 pit, were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices." And then followed upon that a mixed finding of law and of fact, viz.—"(8) That there was no negligence on the defenders' part in appointing and continuing to employ the said manager, under-manager, and fireman."

What did this mean? Did it mean that they knew what do appear to be the essentials of their business in so far as the protection of human life is concerned and so were competent? It seemed to be clear, from the opinions of the learned Judges of the Second Division, that their view was that these men did not know these essentials. Or did it mean that they were ignorant thereof, and yet, nevertheless, were competent for their business, because their ignorance was consistent with the possession of the "qualifications and experience usually required"? If so, I find it difficult to figure a finding more hazardous to the pit workers of this country, and more inconsistent with the spirit of those protections which the Legislature thought fit to provide in the Coal Mines Regulation Acts. I may say that I hold it to be not entirely satisfactory that after an express finding of incompetency made with care, and on apparently strong and sound reasons, by the Sheriff-substitute, the Court of Session should, recalling these findings, simply tender the proposition that these men had the qualifications and experience usually required. But further consideration of that proposition, standing by itself, may be foregone in view of the further findings made in answer to the supplementary question remitted by this House on 25th July 1910, to which I shall afterwards refer.

By their tenth finding the learned Judges of the Second Division find "that the said John Gibbons failed to observe the provisions of Rules 4 (1) and 7 enacted by section 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and also of special Rule 37, passed in terms of the powers conferred by section 51 of the said Act, and that the said John Hunter failed to observe the provisions of the said Rule 7." The last finding is, "That the pursuers have no claim against the defenders at common law, but only under the Employers Liability Act."

None of the findings of the Second Division deals with what appears to me to be one of the most important rules directly applicable to the present case, namely, Rule 1. It is in these terms: "An adequate amount of ventilation shall be constantly produced in every mine to dilute and render harmless noxious gases to such an extent that the working places of the shafts, levels, stables, and workings of the mine, and the travelling roads to and from those working places, shall be in a fit state for working and passing therein." That rule is expressly founded upon by the pursuers and appellants, and, indeed, is quoted at length in article 10 of their condescendence in the action.

Dec. 19, 1911. Rule 1, thus founded on, is the first of a series, following words which, so far as they themselves are concerned, are absolute and imperative, namely, "The following general rules shall be observed, so far as is reasonably practicable, in every mine." It is admitted that protection in the present case from noxious gases was reasonably practicable, and so the unconditional imperative both of the words of the section and of the specific language of Rule 1 remains. This unconditional imperative, dealt with in further passages in my judgment, is, I repeat, one which arises on the assumption that the prescribed protection under the rules was "reasonably practicable." Rule 1 appears very clearly, indeed, to throw around workmen pursuing the hazardous calling of coal mining these two elementary protections: that the air of the workings shall be fit to breathe, and the roads fit to travel, without peril.

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

The question as to roads was tried in Scotland in Bett v. Dalmeny Oil Company,¹ and another rule (21), also providing for the same protection, was founded on, namely, "the roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure . . ." A road had not been properly supported while the operation of cutting away certain pillars was being conducted, and this in consequence of the negligence of the manager or oversman. It was strongly contended that, notwithstanding the statutory obligation for safety the pursuers could not recover under the common law, but that the sole remedy lay under the Employers Liability Act, the accident having been caused through the fault of the manager or oversman as fellow-employees. A verdict was given for the pursuers.

Lord M'Laren delivered the judgment of the First Division, consisting of himself, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear. He used these words: "It follows, then, that the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless the defenders are in a position to say that this is a case falling within the rule as to common employment. Now, the principle of that rule is that it is an implied term of the contract of service that the workman takes the risk of such misfortunes as may result from the negligence of persons who are engaged in the organisation of labour of which he is a member, and that the master is only responsible for the performance of such duties as he can reasonably be supposed to undertake in person—such as the provision of a competent staff of men, adequate material, a proper system, and effective supervision. But in the case under consideration the duty of supporting the roof is a statutory duty, and stands on a different plane from those duties which a master undertakes as implied conditions of the contract of service. The duty is not merely to provide a competent underground manager, and to supply him with material for supporting the roof of the mine where necessary. The statutory duty of the mineowner is to give necessary support to the roof, and in my opinion it is not an answer to a case of neglect of that duty to say that the employer had delegated the performance of the duty to a competent manager."²

In Groves v. Lord Wimborne,³ a case founded upon the neglect to keep machinery properly fenced in accordance with the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act, the same view on the point of principle was taken,

A. L. Smith, L.J., remarking: "In the present case, which is an action founded upon the statute, there is no resort to negligence on the part of a fellow-servant or of anyone else. There being an unqualified statutory obligation imposed upon the defendant, what answer can it be to an action for breach of that duty to say that his servant was guilty of negligence, and therefore he was not liable? The defendant cannot shift his responsibility for the performance of the statutory duty on to the shoulders of another person."¹ The language of Rigby, L.J., is, if possible, still more unambiguous. It is in the following terms: "There has been a failure in the performance of an absolute statutory duty, and there is no need for the plaintiff to allege or prove negligence on the part of anyone in order to make out his cause of action. That being so, the doctrine of common employment is out of the question."²

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

When to the dicta of these learned Judges there are added those of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., and Buckley, L.J., in the case of David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company,³ it cannot be denied that a powerful body of authority stands on the books in favour of the proposition, in its absolute sense, that the defence of common employment is not pleadable to an action based upon the neglect of statutory duty. I desire for myself to say that I appreciate the force and cogency of the opinion of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in the case of David.³

There are three views:—(1) Either the imperative declaration of Parliament that the air of a pit should be fit to breathe by the workman must be read in, what is ex facie, its absolute and peremptory sense, subject to no exception; (2) or this declaration is subject to exception in every case where personal fault cannot be established against the mineowner, and the defence of common employment is one so imbedded in the law that it must be assumed to have been left open unless expressly excluded by the terms of the Act; (3) or a third situation may be figured, of which David's case³ is indeed an example. The Court of Appeal in David's case,³ notwithstanding the judgments referred to, did not apply the rule in its absolute sense, but remitted the case for new trial, leaving the burden of proof upon the mineowner to establish the defence that he had done everything possible to obey the terms of the statute, and that what happened had occurred by reason of some disregard of the rules, in defiance of the owner's regulations and efforts. This view was acquiesced in by the House of Lords,⁴ but I desire to put on record that I do not for myself express any dissent from the main proposition laid down by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., which is in line with those already cited from Lord M'Laren, A. L. Smith, L.J., and Rigby, L.J., that the defence of common employment is out of the question where a statutory duty imperatively laid has been neglected. I repeat that it was not treated as necessary to decide that question in David's case.³

The case may be figured of the most careful superintendence, the most complete compliance by the mineowners, so far as they were concerned, with every obligation resting upon them under the statute, of the settled

Dec. 19, 1911. order and management of the mine being in such a position that, unless disturbed, the statute would have been in all points complied with; and yet that such a disturbance took place by reason of something which,—to put it in the language of another Act of Parliament,—might be called the serious and wilful misconduct of some person engaged in the employment. I take that case to be reserved, and I treat the point of whether responsibility in such cases would attach to the mineowner as not one which is necessary to be here decided. But when I come to this present case I find it in no respect whatever to be a case of the disturbance of the settled order and management of this mine; but, upon the contrary, it is a case in which the Judges have found that what did occur happened not by reason of any person interfering with the management, interposing something which caused the accident, in spite of all that the owners and the management had done, but simply and solely in consequence of the equipment of the mine, in the sense of the staff charged with the performance of the statutory duties, being insufficient; because the staff was entirely ignorant of what was necessary in gassy mines for the protection of human life. I cannot bring myself to think that such a state of matters as that is permissible without civil responsibility at common law, in face of a statute which has declared for the protection of the lives of the workmen in mines in this country that the air in which they work and travel shall be fit to breathe.

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.
Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

Rule 7 makes stipulations for the withdrawal of workmen in case of danger; it confirms, in my judgment, the need for the knowledge of noxious gases on the part of the management, and in no respect abates or shifts the obligations upon the owner arising under Rule 1. It appears from the judgments of the Judges of the Second Division that the manager was appointed in 1902, and the under-manager and fireman in 1904. At these dates this pit was not known to be gassy, and although, for myself, I should hold it to be a dangerous thing, some excuse might be tendered for the proposition that the staff did not then need to be acquainted with gas dangers. In 1901, however, in an adjoining pit several men lost their lives by the escape of carbon-monoxide gas, and in 1905 a connection was made of that gassy and dangerous pit with the pit now in question, the latter being thus rendered, as is now lamentably clear, liable to the presence of the fatal gases. What was done to equip the officials of the latter pit with the knowledge necessary to cope with the changed and dangerous conditions? It rather appears that nothing was done. They remained as ignorant as before.

It is at this point that reference can appropriately be made to the procedure of this House in the cause on 25th July 1910. On that day it was adjudged "That with a view to the further hearing of the cause, the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted to the Second Division . . . in order that the learned Judges of that Division may pronounce a finding of fact upon the following question, viz.:—When the connection was made with the old mine in which smouldering fires, followed by the giving off of carbon monoxide gas, had previously occurred, did the defenders take all practicable means to secure that the persons engaged in supervision, and the fireman appointed as a competent person under the statute, were possessed of the knowledge and qualifications required to deal with the special danger of the presence of noxious gases arising from the connection made?" Dec. 19, 1911.

The learned Judges have given in answer a careful series of eight findings dealing with the history of the pit and other matters, but the reply to the specific question remitted by the House is answer 8, which is in these terms: "That it would have been practicable (had such a danger been anticipated) for the defenders to cause instructions to be given to Gray, Hunter, and Gibbons as to the symptoms and dangers of an outburst of carbon monoxide; and that the defenders did not take any means at the time when the connection between No. 1 and No. 11 pits was made, or thereafter, to secure that the knowledge and qualifications of the persons engaged in the supervision, and of the fireman, were sufficient to enable them to deal with the special danger which might arise from a sudden outburst of carbon-monoxide gas."

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

This matter being thus cleared up, I now recall the situation as described in the findings of the Second Division. Three men, the manager, the under-manager, and the fireman, have been found incompetent by the Sheriff-substitute on account of their ignorance of the knowledge which would appear to be elementary if human life is reckoned of value in such circumstances. The Court of Session do not pronounce, notwithstanding these express findings of incompetency, that the men so failing in the equipment of knowledge were competent (it is manifest that that could not be done, it would not be a finding, but a flat contradiction, of fact), but they find that they were "possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices." A pronouncement has been made that the staff of a mine is possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required, although the officials are men who do not know the elementary necessities for the protection of the lives of the workmen who are under their orders.

The great gravity and general importance of an acquittance of the mineowners from common law responsibility, an acquittance which is furnished on any such finding, is only too obvious. And still more serious may be the effect in destroying, or tending to destroy, those safeguards which Parliament had set up in the case of those working in the coal mines of the country. It is admitted that if the mineowner had been an individual managing his own pit—had been, as I suppose is possible, his own certificated manager—and ignorant of the requirements or dangers attending the working of those gas-bearing seams which formed part of the workings, his plea of ignorance would have availed him nothing as a civil defence to a common law claim, and that the plain imperative of the statute bound him in the responsibility of providing his workmen with those protections which had been prescribed. But it is said that the owner can escape the responsibility of his own dangerous ignorance by organising the mine with a staff labouring under the same dangerous ignorance, and that, although the former case would fall under the plain peremptory rule of the statute and its consequences, the latter case forms an exception thereto.

When one considers that nearly the whole, if not all, of the mines of this country are under delegated management, then this alleged exception to the imperative statutory rule is seen to be no mere exception, but to be equiva-

Dec. 19, 1911. lent to a destruction of the rule as a safeguard of life. It is argued law Courts must consent to this destruction because the exception is fruit of legal doctrine, and the decision of the Second Division is defeated on that ground. The commanding principle in the construction of a statute passed to remedy the evils and to protect against the dangers which front or threaten persons or classes of His Majesty's subjects is that, consistently with the actual language employed, the Act shall be interpreted in the sense favourable to making the remedy effective and the protection secure. This principle is sound and undeniable.

Dunfermline.

But the Court below hold that the Company are not responsible at common law, because these men were fit when appointed, Lord Shaw remarking on the fact that the connection between the two pits "was made till early in 1905, a considerable time after the appointment of the men."

With much respect to the Court below, it humbly appears to me that they have not attached the proper significance to these facts. When the pit was turned, or possibly turned, into a gassy pit, then—if not before—certainly from that time onwards—the permitting of men without requisite knowledge of gases and their dangers to be on the managing staff of the mine was an inexcusable neglect on the part of the owners, and I fail to understand what a reference to some previous date and a different set of conditions has to do with abating this serious responsibility.

But this point is made, unhappily, clearer by another, namely, by considering what Rule 7 requires as to the inspection when gases are found in any part of the mine. "A competent person appointed for the purpose is to inspect and make a report, and no person is to be admitted, & until he, the competent person, declares that it is no longer dangerous, the mine is free from noxious or deadly gases.

Not one of these things was done in the present case. For who was the "competent person"? The owners had recognised their duty to appoint a competent person, and he had accordingly been named as such by the 43rd special rule of the pit. He was the fireman, the man possessed of the theoretical or practical knowledge on the subject of pit gas, and appointed before the connection with the gassy pit was made. This was the man who was ticketed by the owners as the "competent person" under the statute. In my opinion this proceeding was, on the part of the owner, the most highly reprehensible and dangerous, and it led to these two men's deaths. It constituted, what, in my opinion, was a defiance of those protections which the Coal Mines Regulation Act had, after scrupulous care by Parliament, thrown around the coalworkers of this country.

In my opinion the judgment should be reversed, and the decree giving for the sums brought out by the learned Sheriff-substitute as due at common law should be restored.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—The question in this case is whether there is a liability at common law or under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, or whether the damages can be assessed only under the Employers Liability Act.

Your Lordships cannot review the findings of fact in the Second Division which were originally before the House, but your Lordships are at liberty Dec. 19, 1911. to consider whether, taken in connection with the further findings on the remit ordered, a question of law is raised which calls for examination.

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.

It is found that there was negligence on the part of the assistant manager and the fireman, but that the respondents are not liable, as those officials were in a common employment with the deceased, and were appointed by the respondents after they were satisfied that they "were possessed of the qualifications and experience usually required of persons holding these offices."

Lord
Ashbourne.

I do not think this is a very satisfactory statement that they were believed by the respondents to be entirely competent, but I believe, from the language used by Lord Low, that that was the opinion of the Second Division.

The gas that produced the fatal effects was carbon-monoxide gas, a deadly but obscure gas of slow and insidious action, not very familiarly known in ordinary mines, but likely to be generated in and likely to escape from a pit, part of which had a smouldering fire, being the product of imperfect or incomplete combustion. The respondents were acquainted with the risks of this gas. They had themselves an unextinguished or smouldering fire in one of the neighbouring pits, and this so attracted their attention to the risks of monoxide gas that they in 1901 circulated a pamphlet on the subject amongst their officials and employees, drawing attention to its dangers.

In the year 1905 a connection was actually made from the pit, the seat of danger, to the pit where the death was caused, and in the words of Lord Low, "The death of the miner was caused by carbon-monoxide gas having found its way into pit No. 11 along the air passages from the old fire, and the managers and fireman were not alive to the danger, having no previous experience of carbon monoxide." This connection created a new and dangerous position in pit No. 11, which cast upon the defenders the onus of seeing that the manager, assistant manager, and fireman were competent to deal with this new peril, alive to its reality, and duly warned as to the observance of the rules 1 and 7 so often referred to. The case of *David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Company*¹ quite supports this view, and Lord Halsbury there said that "the burden of proving that the authorities of the mine had done their duty in taking proper care of the safety of the miners" was on the defendants. Their Lordships deemed it right, after the first hearing here, in July 1910, to remit this case to the Second Division to answer the question, "When the connection was made . . . did the defenders take all practicable means to secure that the persons engaged in supervision and the fireman appointed as a competent person under the statute were possessed of the knowledge and qualifications required to deal with the special danger of the presence of noxious gases arising from the connection made?"

The reply of the Second Division (after findings on the general case) was to the effect that it would have been practicable, and that the "defenders did not take any means at the time when the connection was made, or there-

Dec. 19, 1911. after, to secure that the knowledge and qualifications of the persons engaged in the supervision and of the fireman were sufficient to enable them to deal with the special danger which might arise from a sudden outbreak of carbon-monoxide gas."

Black v.
Fife Coal Co.,
Limited.
Lord
Ashbourne.

It will be noticed that the finding in the remit mentions "sudden outbreak," which was not mentioned in the question remitted to them and cannot narrow the duty of the defenders.

Whatever may have been the statutory duty of the respondents as to ventilation adequate to dilute and render harmless noxious gases, I think that when this connection was made with pit No. 11 the steps in the question remitted should have been taken, and it is to be regretted special warning was not circulated amongst their officials, drawing their attention to the new and deadly danger which might be thus introduced by the possible and insidious presence of this monoxide gas. I think that the question needed closer examination than the Second Division gave it at the first hearing and required the remit to ascertain a crucial fact. What is the effect of the finding in the remit? We must not allow ourselves to be hampered or embarrassed by other findings. Is it shown that it is now open to the House to consider whether the defenders are liable? I think it clearly is; and that your Lordships are quite justified in holding that the defenders were guilty of neglect of their statutory duties in not taking any steps to deal with the special danger of the presence of noxious gases arising from the connection made.

I therefore think that the appeal should be allowed.

The parties then intimated that they were agreed that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be restored.

ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed: that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute be restored: and that the respondents do pay to the appellants their costs in this House and in the Courts below.

Shipping Law—Bill of Lading—Through bill of lading—Construction—Acknowledgment that goods in good order at place of departure—Goods found damaged at place of arrival—Claim against last carrier—Onus.

A quantity of flour in bags was consigned from Minneapolis, U.S.A., to Glasgow on a "through" bill of lading signed by an agent on behalf of the various carriers on the route (including the steamship company carrying from New York to Glasgow), and bearing that the goods were "received at Minneapolis in apparent good order, except as noted." The bill of lading provided that no carrier should be liable for damage not occurring on his portion of the route, and, in particular, that the steamship company should not be liable for inland damage; the steamship company, on the other hand, agreeing to present promptly to the inland carriers any claim for damage to the goods before delivery at New York. The bill of lading also incorporated the ordinary ocean bill of lading of the steamship company, which proceeded, "Received in apparent good order and condition, . . . " and further provided that the shipment was subject to the provisions of an American statute which made it obligatory upon shipowners to issue to shippers a bill of lading stating the condition of the goods at the time of shipment. No bill of lading, other than the through bill of lading, was signed on behalf of the ship. On receiving the cargo the steamship company notified a few bags as damaged, but on the discharge of the cargo at Glasgow a large number of bags were found to have been "caked," i.e., damaged by fresh water. The consignees thereupon brought an action of damages against the steamship company.

Crawford &
Law v. Allan
Line Steam-

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that (except as regarded the small number of bags which had been notified as damaged) the defenders were bound by the admission in the through bill of lading that the flour had been received in apparent good order, and the onus was on them to prove that the damage had been sustained before the flour came into their possession; and that, having failed to discharge that onus, they were liable to the pursuers.

(In the Court of Session, 17th May 1911—1911 S. C. 791.)

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 24th and 27th November 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—Under the through bill of lading each carrier was liable only for the damage occurring on his portion of the route, and was bound to notify any damage which he found had been done to the goods before he received them. This effected a limitation of the liability of each carrier. The fact that the defenders did not notify that the goods were damaged when handed to them at New York precluded them from maintaining that they had not received them in good order and condition; or at any rate, in a question with the pursuers, made it impossible for them, as the last carriers, to escape liability unless they proved affirmatively that one of the previous carriers was responsible.¹

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuers' construction of the bill of lading imposed too heavy a burden upon shipowners. The statement in the bill of lading was that the goods were in good order at Minneapolis, and did not apply to their condition at New York, there being many stages in the journey at each of which the goods were taken by the succeeding carrier at the owners' risk. All that the defenders were under obligation to do was to hand over the goods at Glasgow in the condition in which they had received them at New York. This they had done. The goods were received in rain,—were received wet, as was duly notified; and if the wet caused subsequent caking the defenders were not liable, for they had used all the ordinary and usual precautions in conducting the operation of loading. If the flour was caked before the operation of loading commenced the defenders could not be liable. All that they acknowledged under the bill of lading—on the assumption that it was

That acknowledgment was perfectly consistent with the damaged state of the flour, for caking was not a defect which was apparent in the sense that it could be detected from any examination which it was reasonably possible to make during the operation of loading.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—The importance of this case depends not so much on the amount sued for as the effect to be given to what is called a bill of lading, but which goes somewhat beyond what in commercial circles is generally known by that name. It is a written document dealing with the carriage of a cargo of bags of flour to be carried from Minneapolis, in Minnesota, one of the northern States of America, to Glasgow. This transit, involving as it does carriage by railroad, inland lake, and ocean voyage, comprehends the handing over of the goods to be carried by several independent carriers. It has been found convenient both to the carriers and to the owners of merchandise to devise this form, which is in some respects a novel form, of bill of lading, so as to fix the responsibility of each of the successive carriers in turn for any damage or loss of or to the goods, so carried under this contract, during the period of transit.

The facts may here be very briefly stated. The flour was in 41,000 bags in good order and condition, and was so delivered to the first carriers on the route prescribed to go via New York, and each carrier in turn was to certify, by a system of checking, the state and condition of the goods carried in handing them over to his successor, and the succeeding carrier was to receive them in like order and condition and to be responsible for himself delivering them to his own successor on the route except so far as they were marked. It is proved that this course was pursued at New York (whether this was accurately done is another matter with which I will deal presently). A somewhat trifling number were marked at New York, but a very serious number—upwards of 4000 bags—were discovered at Glasgow to have been damaged.

Here I may say that it appears to me to be irrelevant to discuss what is the nature of the damage done and whether it may or may not be comprehended in certain other words. In respect of the question as applicable to the parcel of 4000 bags caked the question may be separated entirely from the question of the amount of damages that may be recovered. It is enough to say that there is no doubt that these 4000 and odd bags had been damaged, and the sole question for decision is, to my mind, upon whom the responsibility for this rests under these bills of lading. The question is one of law, because it does not appear to me that upon the facts stated there is any real dispute between the parties. The question is, as I have described, the validity of this form of bill of lading.

It is proved, as I have said, that the above was the course of business pursued at New York, and whether what I have described as the course of business was done accurately or not at New York does not appear to me (if the bill of lading, as it is called, is valid) to be very material, because, as I think the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, it is quite clear one must assume that each of these carriers in turn receives the goods in good order and condition, except so far as notified in the manner which has been described. Dec. 19, 1911.

The Lord Ordinary decided after proof that the defenders were liable by reason of the contractual engagement by the documents called bills of lading, which were signed by an authorised agent.

Crawford &
Law v. Allan
Line Steam-

Limited.

Of course this part of the arrangement was most important, since but for it neither carrier nor merchant could fix responsibility for loss or damage, as there is an express stipulation that no one of the independent carriers should be responsible for loss or damage except that occurring on his own part of the line. The contract embodying this obligation amongst others was duly signed by Mr P. R. Jarvis on behalf of the defenders. The successive obligations and responsibilities of each succeeding carrier are absolutely essential to such a system as is established by the through bill of lading, enforced as it is by the contract, to which all are parties, that none of them shall be held answerable for loss or damage beyond their own line; and I am wholly unable to agree to the passage in Lord Salvesen's judgment in which he says that no bill of lading of any kind was signed by the master or agent of the steamer at New York. Of course the learned Judge does not mean that it must have been signed at New York. He has, I think, omitted to notice that the bill of lading, which is given to us as a specimen of all the bills of lading, was signed by Mr P. R. Jarvis expressly on behalf of the steamer which was to carry the flour from New York to Glasgow—that is on behalf of the defenders themselves. The learned Judge appears not to have noticed this fact, yet upon it the whole question turns. If this bill of lading is valid according to its true construction, I do not think it is necessary to go into the question of the incorporation of the contract, because the bill of lading describes with considerable accuracy what is to be done, and what is to be assumed if no such marks as are indicated are found upon the bags on their arrival. This has been done. It appears to me that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is perfectly right, and ought to be restored.

Ld. Halsbury.

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session pronounced on 17th March 1911, recalling an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary dated 23rd December 1909.

The action in which this last-mentioned interlocutor was pronounced was raised to recover damages alleged to amount to £167, 12s. 6d. for injury done to 4132 bags of flour, less 110 bags, portion of a cargo of 41,110 bags loaded at New York on 19th December 1903, and following days, on the respondents' steamship "Corinthian," and carried by her for freight to the port of Glasgow, and there delivered to the consignees, the appellants, on 11th January 1904, and the days following.

It is not disputed by the respondents that these 4132 bags of flour were, when delivered in Glasgow, "caked." Caking is the damage complained of, and consists in this, that the texture of the bag getting wet, the wet got through the bag and wetted a portion of the flour immediately contiguous to its inner surface, turning the flour into dough, which, when dry, hardened, and became what is called a cake. It is admitted on both sides that this caking does not injure the uncaked portion of the flour contained in the

Dec. 19, 1911. bag. And it is further admitted that the caking in this case resulted from the bags having been wetted by fresh water, and that this wetting did not take place in the hold of the steamer "Corinthian," though, of course, the caking might, and almost certainly would, take place there if the bags were wet when placed in the hold. It is admitted further that the bills of lading were not drawn up, delivered, or signed by the master of the ship, and that they were not expressly conversant with the ocean voyage from New York to Glasgow. The goods had been purchased from the Pittsburg Wasburn Flour Mills Company, Limited, carrying on business at Minneapolis, Minn., in the United States of America, and were on 10th October 1903, delivered to the Lehigh Valley Transportation Company, consigned to Glasgow to the order of this milling company, to be carried, as the appellants alleged, the entire way to this Scotch port under the terms of certain bills of lading, somewhat peculiar in form, for a through freight. One of these bills of lading is printed as a specimen at p. 374 of the Appendix. It is signed P. R. Jarvis, agent, "on behalf of carriers severally, but not jointly." And immediately above this signature the following paragraph is to be found:—
"In witness whereof, the agent signing on behalf of the said Lehigh Valley Transportation Company, and of the said Ocean Steamship Company, or ocean steamer and her owner, severally and not jointly, hath affirmed two bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the other to stand void."

Ld. Atkinson.

The sum sued for is of small amount, but the proper construction of through bills of lading such as this, which are common, and the determination of the rights and obligations of the parties concerned under them, are of vast importance. It is for the purpose of getting these matters finally decided that this litigation was admittedly commenced. The bill of lading contains on the face of it a statement that the flour was received "in apparent good order except as noted." The provision immediately following is to the effect that the goods so received "are to be carried to the port of New York, and thence by Allan State Line to the port of Glasgow, Scotland . . . and to be there delivered in like good order and condition as above consigned, or to the consignee's assigns," &c. It then proceeds to provide that, in consideration of the freight named, the service stipulated for is to be performed thereunder subject to the conditions, whether printed or written, contained in it. Then follow eleven conditions dealing with the service up to the port of New York.*

It is only necessary to refer to three of these, namely, No. 1, providing that no carrier shall be liable for loss or damage caused, amongst other things, by "heat, frost, wet, or decay"; No. 3, providing that "no carrier shall be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route, nor after said property is ready for delivery to the next carrier or to the consignee . . ." and further, that claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after arrival of the property, and if same be delayed, for more than thirty days after delivery, or after due notice of readiness to deliver, no carrier should be liable thereunder; and No. 11, providing that the contract is deemed to be executed and accomplished and all liability thereunder to terminate on the delivery of the property to the steamer, her master, agent, or servants, or to the steamship company, and that the inland freight and charges should be a first lien due and payable by the steamship company.

Ld. Atkinson.

The second part of the bill of lading deals with the service after delivery at New York, and until delivery at Glasgow. It contains nineteen separate paragraphs. Of these No. 1 provides, amongst other things, that the steamer should not be liable for inland damage, and No. 11 that the steamer should only be responsible for such part of the goods as are actually delivered to her at the port of New York, and should not be liable for any loss or damage that might have occurred before such delivery, "while agreeing to promptly present to inland carriers for account of owners of goods any claim for shortage, or loss, or damage that may have occurred before delivery of goods at the port" of New York.

It is, I think, plain that by these provisions for the prompt delivery of claims for damage, contained in paragraph 3 (dealing with inland carriage), and in paragraph 11 (dealing with ocean carriage), it was designed to set up machinery to protect on the one hand each carrier from claims for damages not occurring on his portion of the through route, and to secure on the other hand to the owner of the goods the means of enforcing any claim he might have against the carrier on whose portion of the through route his goods were, in fact, lost or damaged. The shippers contracted with the transport company to carry these goods in the way and by the means stipulated for to their destination at Glasgow. The shippers were neither bound nor entitled to interfere with the cargo en route, and if, on the arrival of the goods at Glasgow in a damaged condition, the consignees were left to discover for themselves on what part of the route the damage was caused, they would be absolutely at the mercy of the carriers. It suits the interest of these carriers to carry goods in this way for through freights; but, if they adopt that method of doing business for their own gain, it is but reasonable that, if they wish to escape liability themselves, they should be bound by noting the condition of the goods when received by them to protect the interest of their customers, the shippers.

The second part of the bill of lading contains two other important provisions; first, by clause 2, it provides that the shipment until delivery at Glasgow is to be subject to all the provisions of the American statute of 1893, called the Harter Act. (By section 4 of that Act, the owner, master, or agent of every vessel transporting goods from an American port to any foreign port is bound to issue to the shippers a bill of lading containing, amongst other things, a statement of the apparent order and condition of the property delivered when received by the owner, master, or agent of the vessel for transportation, which document is thereby made prima facie evidence of the receipt of the merchandise described in it); and secondly, clause 18 contains a provision to the effect that the property covered by the bill of lading is to be subject to all the conditions expressed in the regular forms of bill of lading in use at the time by the steamship company. One of these so-called ocean bills of lading is printed on pp. 383 and 384 of the

Dec. 19, 1911. Appendix. It commences with the statement "Received in apparent good order and condition by the Allan State Line from the . . . to be transported by the good British steamship 'Corinthian' . . . to be delivered" in like order and condition at the port of Glasgow.

Unless, therefore, the respondents violated the American law, the bill of lading so signed by Jarvis must be taken to be a bill of lading issued by them for the ocean voyage, and Jarvis must be taken to be their agent for that purpose.

I am quite unable, therefore, to follow the reasoning of Lord Salvesen when he says, as he is reported at p. 445 of the Appendix to have said, that the admission contained in the through bill of lading as to the condition in which the flour was received applies, and can only apply, to Minneapolis. That condition is that the goods are to be taken to be in apparent good order and condition except as notified. It is more restricted than what is required by the Harter Act or by the ocean bill of lading. Neither can I follow his reasoning where, at pp. 447 and 448, he says: "It would, of course, have been different if there had been a bill of lading signed on behalf of the ship acknowledging receipt of the flour in good order and undertaking to deliver it in the same order, for this would have been a contractual obligation which it would lie on the ship to excuse itself from discharging. Here, as I hold, there is nothing of the kind." But what are the facts? The flour arrived at New York in due course. It was there warehoused. On 12th November 1903 H. C. Davis, the foreign freight-agent of the Lehigh Valley Company, wrote to Austen, Baldwin, & Company, the agents of the respondents, to notify them of the arrival of flour "engaged with you for Glasgow," and asking for a shipping permit. The only way in which the flour was "engaged" with the respondents for Glasgow was under the through bill of lading. On 12th December these same agents of the respondents sent a permit authorising the receiving clerk of the "Corinthian" to receive this flour from the Lehigh Valley Company.

That is followed by the delivery of the goods to the steamer on the 19th and subsequent days of December 1903, in presence of the respondents' officials, their receiving clerk, L. L. Le Furge, having been sent there for the purpose of checking the delivery and giving receipts for it. He gave receipts, on a printed form, I presume, headed "Received for shipment on board steamship 'Corinthian,' bound to Glasgow, subject to the exceptions and restrictions of liability contained in the usual bills of lading of the Company." But these latter are the bills of lading incorporated into the through bill of lading by clause 18 of the latter. It would, therefore, appear to me impossible not to hold that, whether Jarvis, when he signed the general bill of lading, purporting to act as agent for the respondents, amongst others, had antecedent authority from them so to do or not, they have adopted, acted upon, and taken the benefit of the contract of carriage he purported to enter into on their behalf, and can no more be permitted now to disclaim any liability it may by its terms impose upon them, than if they had placed the seal of the Company under Jarvis's signature on 10th October 1903.

Neither can I concur in the suggestion of Lord Salvesen, found at p. 488 of the Appendix, that the inland carrier who tendered this flour to the ship was, as regards the loading, the agent of the original shipper, and that accordingly the consent of this carrier to have the goods loaded in rain binds the appellants. I think Mr Bailhache is quite right in his contention that the shippers had contracted with the first carrier to transport and deliver these goods to the steamship, just as the steamship had contracted to receive them when delivered, that the relation between the shippers and the inland carrier was the contractual relation thereby created, and that the carrier was no more the agent of the shippers to see to the proper delivery of the goods than was the Steamship Company their agent to see to the proper reception and stowage of them.

It is not suggested that this flour got wet in the warehouse. If it did it must have been caked when delivered, and this should have been readily detected. It is admitted it must have got wet before it was placed in the hold of the steamer, though the caking might, and possibly did, take place there. I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the respondents have failed to prove that these bags of flour had either caked before they came into their custody or got so wetted before they came into their custody that, as a necessary consequence, they caked afterwards. If anything of that kind occurred the evidence, I think, shows that it could have been readily detected in the process of loading, and if detected it should have been notified so as to preserve the appellants' remedy against the wrongdoer. It has not been notified, and, that being so, I think the respondents are bound by the statement contained on the face of the bill of lading, that the flour was received in good order and condition save as noted, i.e., save as to the 110 bags which were noted and are not included in those for which damages are claimed. I think the interlocutor appealed against was, therefore, erroneous, that that of the Lord Ordinary was right and should be restored, and this appeal allowed.

LORD GORELL.—The appellants in this case claim for damage to certain sacks or bags of flour carried on the respondents' steamship "Corinthian" from New York to Glasgow. The Lord Ordinary found that the respondents were liable to the appellants in respect of 4022 bags "caked" (being the difference between 110 and 4132), but the Second Division recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the respondents from the conclusions of the action.

The summons in the action was as far back as May 1904, and the amount in dispute is not large, but the Lord Ordinary states that the object of the action was to stop the loading of flour at New York in wet weather.

The flour was despatched under through bills of lading from Minneapolis for Glasgow. It is admitted that the sacks or bags of flour when delivered to the inland carriers were in apparent good condition (minute of admissions, Appendix, p. 413). According to the bills of lading, a copy of a specimen of which is at p. 374 of the Appendix, the goods were stated to be received at Minneapolis "in apparent good order (except as noted), contents and condition of contents of package unknown," to be carried to New York and thence by the Allan State Line to Glasgow, and there delivered in like good order and condition. The conditions in the bills of

Dec. 19, 1911. lading were divided into two parts. The first dealt with the service by the inland carriers, the Lehigh Valley Transportation Company, to the port of New York, which terminated with delivery to the steamer (clause 11). The delivery in this case was from the inland carriers' lighters when the sacks or bags were placed in the steamer's slings to be hoisted on board the steamer.

Crawford &
Law v. Allan Line Steam-
ship Co.,

Lord Gorell.

The second part dealt with the service after delivery to the steamer until delivery at Glasgow. By condition 1 of the second part the steamer was not liable for inland damage, and by condition 2 of that part the shipment was subject to all the terms, provisions, and exemptions in what is known as the Harter Act—an Act of the United States in 1893. By condition 11 of the same part the steamer was only responsible for such part of the goods as was actually delivered to her at New York, and not liable for any loss or damage that might have occurred before such delivery, “while agreeing to promptly present to inland carriers for account of owners of goods any claims for shortage or loss or damage that may have occurred before delivery of goods at the port first above mentioned,” i.e., at New York. Condition 18 of the said second part provided “That the property covered by this bill of lading is subject to all conditions expressed in the regular forms of bills of lading in use by the steamship company at time of shipment, and to all local rules and regulations at port of destination not expressly provided for by the clauses herein.”

The through bill of lading was signed by an agent on behalf of the carriers, severally but not jointly.

The receipts given by the respondents at New York to the inland carriers were headed “Received for shipment on board steamship ‘Corinthian’ bound to Glasgow subject to the exceptions and restrictions of liability contained in the usual bills of lading of the Company.” I understand that these receipts notified that 26 sacks or bags were “caked” and that 84 were wet, but on delivery at Glasgow it was found that 4132 were “caked.” “Caking” appears to be a well-recognised form of damage to flour resulting from wet; a layer next the covering becomes hard, and the covering seems to be firm and hard to the touch. It is not disputed that the caking in question was caused by fresh water. Caked flour requires reconditioning, and the expense of this process to 4022 sacks or bags (the difference between 4132 bags found caked at Glasgow and the said 110 notified at New York as wet or caked), £167, 12s. 6d., is claimed in this action.

The Harter Act, which will be found conveniently given in the late Judge Carver's work on Carriage by Sea, section 103a, requires the giving of an ocean bill of lading, or shipping document, in case of goods carried out of the United States by sea, and such bill of lading must state, inter alia, “the . . . apparent order and condition of such merchandise or property delivered to and received by the owner, master, or agent of the vessel for transportation, and such document shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt of the merchandise therein described.”

The through bill of lading in question in effect incorporates, by clause 18 of the second part, the respondents' form of ocean bill of lading which is given in the Appendix, p. 383, and commences, “Received in apparent good order and condition," and provides for delivery "from ship's dock, Dec. 19, 1911. where the shipowner's responsibility shall cease, in like order and condition at the port of Glasgow," and also incorporates the Harter Act.

Crawford &
Law v. Allan Line Steamship Co.,
Limited.

In my opinion the effect of these documents is to charge the respondents with the receipt of the flour in apparent good order and condition, except so far as they notify the inland carrier that this is not the case. Here they notified 110 sacks or bags as caked or wet. There were also notifications in respect of other matters not material to the case. Thus the appellants have an admission that the goods were received by the respondents in apparent good order and condition, except to the extent of 110 sacks or bags, and except as to other matters not material. And I think it would be for the respondents, if they could, to show that the damage complained of was in fact done before they received the goods. The Lord Ordinary found that they had not discharged the onus of proving this.

Lord Gorell.

During part of the time in which the cargo was loaded, after intimation from the steamship agents that the steamer was ready for cargo, the weather was wet, and precautions appear to have been taken to prevent the goods from being wetted as they were being taken on board from the lighters in which they came alongside. The Lord Ordinary found that there had not been negligence in the attempts to protect the goods, but it seems reasonably clear that they, in fact, became wetted in the loading, although it is said the loading was stopped when heavy showers or storms came on (Appendix, p. 208). If the bags were wet when taken on board the steamer, it would be apparent, and if they were at that time caked, the Lord Ordinary finds that "caking is damage to the contents of the bag indicated by external appearance."

In these cases of through bills of lading the consignors and consignees have no control over the transit, and the convenience of business requires that the shipowner, when he receives from the inland carrier, shall be careful to see what the apparent order and condition of the goods then is. If he accepts them as in apparent good order and condition, he takes the responsibility of delivering them in that order and condition, except so far as it is shown that the damage complained of was done before he received the goods or was caused by perils excepted in his part of the contract. None were relied on in this case. If they are not in apparent good order and condition he must notify the inland carrier against whom the owner of the goods may claim, subject to any answer that the carrier has. It is said that this imposes a heavy duty on the shipowner, but I do not see that this places him in any worse position than would be the case were he the first receiver of the goods, as in any ordinary case of shipment, from port to port, where, for his own protection, he must be careful not to sign bills of lading for goods as in apparent good order and condition when the goods are not so in fact.

The result is that in this case goods are admitted to have been received by the respondents in apparent good order and condition, to have been discharged in a damaged state, and no sufficient proof is given by the respondents that the damage was in fact done before they had possession of the goods, or by perils excepted after they had such possession.

If it had been established that the damage had in fact been done before

Dec. 19, 1911. the steamer took delivery of the goods, the question would arise as to the duty imposed on the respondents to notify the inland carrier, and I think they would be liable for breach of duty in this respect if they did not make a reasonable and proper inspection in the circumstances and notify the results to the inland carrier by qualifying the receipts accordingly.

Crawford &
Law v. Allan
Line Steam-

Limited.

Lord Gorell.

The Lord Ordinary finds that the loading of what was a very large cargo was pressed on with the result that the examination which would have disclosed caking was not properly made. It seems to me the evidence shows this. An experienced witness, Mr Maloney, states that it was about the biggest shipment of flour that he ever saw (Appendix, p. 354). The owners were evidently anxious to get the steamer away on her sailing day, and it would seem that they could not do this without going on loading notwithstanding the state of the weather (Appendix, p. 282), and that the result was an inadequate and hurried examination. It is not an excuse that the respondents desired to keep to the steamer's sailing date. If the shipowners do not notify, they in effect admit that the goods are received by them in apparent good order and condition, and if they wish to protect themselves they must make a proper examination. If they do notify, then the cargo owners must look to the inland carriers so far as the latter are not excused by the terms of their contract.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and the decision of the Lord Ordinary restored.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—There are two questions in this case. One is a question of law, namely, what is the proper construction of a document called in these proceedings a "through bill of lading"? The other is a question of fact—as to the time and cause of certain damage suffered by a cargo covered by that bill. On both of these questions I agree with all of your Lordships that the conclusions reached by the learned Lord Ordinary (Lord Mackenzie) were correct, and, with the greatest respect to the learned Judges of the Second Division, that their judgment, as expressed in the opinion of Lord Salvesen, was erroneous and falls to be recalled.

First. The "through bill of lading" was for the transport of goods from Minneapolis to Glasgow via the Great Lakes. It was most natural that the consignor in such a case should make a contract for the entire journey and know his rights throughout, and most natural that the transporting interests should combine to facilitate such business. Your Lordships have given the details of the document. It was signed by P. R. Jarvis, agent "on behalf of carriers severally, but not jointly," the document stating that the agent signed "on behalf of the said Lehigh Valley Transportation Company and of the said Ocean Steamship Company or ocean steamer and her owner." There are stipulations in it, also perfectly natural, that no carrier is to be liable for loss or damage by causes beyond his control, or not occurring on his own road or his portion of the through route; and it is provided that claims must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after the arrival of the goods, and, if delayed for more than thirty days after delivery, no carrier to be liable.

A special branch of the contract with a special series of provisions applies to the seagoing portion of the route, and the earlier portion just referred to only bears upon this case as illustrating that the provisions of Dec. 19, 1911. the entire contract point to liability for damage being promptly localised and the damage being paid—the particular carrier being thus ascertained —by that carrier. In the second portion of the contract, into which the form of an ocean bill of lading is imported by reference, it is provided, entirely in accordance with the general scheme of the bargain just mentioned, that the steamer is not liable for loss that may have occurred before delivery to it, while the ocean carrier agrees to present promptly to inland carriers “any claims for shortage or loss or damage that may have occurred before delivery of goods at the port.”

Crawford &
Law v. Allan Line Steamship Co.,
Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

In the document as a whole the flour, which was the cargo, was acknowledged as received at Minneapolis in apparent good order, and it is further admitted by the joint minute of parties that each bag and sack of flour when delivered to the inland carrier was in good condition. In the adopted form of ocean bill of lading precisely the same language—“Received in apparent good order and condition”—was used. It is admitted that the Allan Line Company, the respondents, accepted delivery of the goods at New York taking exception to the caked condition of about only a hundred sacks (I proceed upon the concessions as to figures quite properly made in argument), and that when the goods were ready for discharge at Glasgow over 4000 sacks were discovered to be caked.

Were it not for the judgment of the Second Division, it would be rather difficult to discover what, upon those facts, constitute difficulties in the way of construing this contract. These difficulties, however, in so far as they have led to the reversal of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, appear to be reduced to two. It has been held, to use Lord Salvesen's words, that “The admission contained in the through bill of lading as to the condition in which the flour was received applies, and can only apply, to Minneapolis, and the obligation to deliver in the like good order and condition, while it is undertaken by the agent who signs it on behalf of all the carriers severally but not jointly, does not apply in turn to successive carriers.” I can only say that the very opposite appears to me to be the case. “In the second place, I think,” says the same learned Judge, “it may well be argued that the inland carrier, by whose servants the flour is tendered for shipment, is the agent for that purpose of the original shipper.” It humbly appears to me that this is not the contract of parties. Under a proper construction of this contract the several carriers must, in the view which I entertain, be held bound, unless notification to the contrary is promptly made, to the fact that the goods were received in apparent good order. And with regard to the shipowners for the Atlantic voyage, it appears to me, first, that they are expressly bound by the terms of the through bill of lading signed by Jarvis, who was agent for them as well as for the other carriers, that bill of lading stating that the goods were received in apparent good order and condition; while, further, it must be borne in mind that, under the law of the United States, such an obligation could not be dispensed with. It would appear to me to be a curious result if, by the device of a through bill of lading, a means of escape could be provided from the general shipping law of the United States.

Once, however, the point of law is settled in the sense that I have indi-

Dec. 19, 1911. Crawford & Law v. Allan Line Steamship Co., Limited. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. cated, I do not find in Lord Salvesen's opinion that there would be any doubt in the mind of that learned Judge as to the legal consequences which would follow. "If there had been a bill of lading, signed on behalf of the ship, acknowledging receipt of the flour in good order, and undertaking to deliver it in the same order . . . this would have been a contractual obligation which it would lie on the ship to excuse itself from discharging." I entirely agree in that view. As, accordingly, I am, along with your Lordships, of opinion that there was such a bill of lading on behalf of the ship in this case, I think the contractual obligation referred to rests upon the respondents. When the judgment of the Inner House is analysed, it is, however, to be observed that a consideration of the facts and of points as to the onus of proof is made from the opposite point of view, namely, that there was no such contractual obligation, and that the onus under a contract, worded like the present, for through carriage by land, lake, and ocean, rests upon the consignor to prove how the damage was caused and to localise where it occurred. This might be singular as a matter of business; and it appears to me to be out of keeping, not only with the provisions, but with the scheme of the bargain of parties.

Secondly, the construction of the contract being as stated, the determination of the case upon fact is greatly simplified. If there had been no proof whatever, then so standing the contract, the principle of the "Peter der Grosse"¹ would apply. That principle is thus expressed by that very learned Judge, Sir Robert Phillimore,—“Fairly construed (i.e., the bills of lading), and giving all due weight to the legal effect of the marginal note, the result must be that apparently, and so far as met the eye, and externally, they were placed in good order on board this ship. Well, then, if that be so, if the plaintiffs have shown by prima facie evidence that, having put these bales and bags in good order on board the ship, they were taken out in bad order both externally and internally, I agree with the observation which was made that it is not incumbent on them to show either how or when the damage was done.”² I may add, however, that, quite apart from any questions of onus, I could not have seen my way to differ from the view of the evidence taken by Lord Mackenzie. It appears to me that the respondents were extremely anxious for business reasons for the speedy loading of the “Corinthian” with this exceptionally large cargo of flour, and that they took weather risks, they, however, having the complete option on the documents, under “the condition that such cargo can, in the judgment of the steamer's agent (having regard to weather and other circumstances) be put on board the steamer in proper time.” I do not follow the reasoning as to the weather not being exceptionally rainy for New York, or the introduction into this case of the custom of the port. If it had been necessary to fix time and cause for the damage to this cargo of flour, I think it to be fairly established that the appellants have done so, and that the responsibility rests with the shipowners.

I humbly agree in the course proposed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR concurred.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, enacts :—Sec. 633. “An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.”

A ship, proceeding up the Clyde in charge of a compulsory pilot, collided with a vessel lying moored at a wharf. In an action of damages by the owners of the latter vessel against the owners of the former vessel, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the defenders fell to be assoilzied, in respect that, the ship being in charge of a compulsory pilot, it was necessary for the pursuers to prove that the collision was caused by the fault of the defenders or those for whom they were responsible, and this they had failed to do.

The case was heard, with Nautical Assessors, on 11th March 1912. After hearing counsel for the appellants, and without calling on counsel for the respondents :—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not think it is necessary to enter at all upon the interesting details of this appeal, which is one wholly relating to matters of fact. The learned Judge who heard the witnesses takes one view, and in substance I think the same view is taken by the Lord President, of what took place on the occasion of this collision. I myself agree with the views which have been expressed, and I really do not think that any good purpose would be served by entering upon a consideration of the various arguments that have been adduced by one side or the other. I am content to accept the judgment of the Lord President.

I think the appeal ought to be dismissed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I desire to say that so far as the form of process goes in this case I do not myself see any occasion for the change of the interlocutor which occurred in the Inner House. It appears to me that

Mar. 11, 1912. the finding of Lord Dewar, which was recalled by the First Division, was completely justified by the clear and conclusive narrative which he gave in stating his opinion. The change of form which has occurred did not arise, as I observe, from any change of view in the First Division as to the fault or negligence of the pilot. The Division, or at least the majority thereof, came back at the conclusion of the case to exactly the position in which Lord Dewar left it. I concur in the course proposed.

Alexander

v. Allan Line
Steamship

LORD ROBSON.—In this case it has been found by two Courts in Scotland that the fault lay wholly with the pilot, and I think to that finding no objection can be taken. Some difficulty, no doubt, arises on the evidence as to the look-out kept by the ship, but it cannot be said that the pilot was without warning or information as to the danger which he realised too late. When the vessel got alongside the "Koombana," a vessel moored at the west end of Shieldhall Wharf, the captain of the "Buenos Ayrean" drew the pilot's attention to the loom of the "Koombana," so that he knew he was very near the wharf and any vessels that might be there, and he ought to have taken immediate steps to get more into mid-channel so as to clear any vessel that might be lying further on. He did not do so. That error caused the accident, and I think it cannot be said that the evidence as to the look-out was sufficient to make out fault against the defenders.

THEIR LORDSHIPS dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Sched. (1) (b) and (16)—Cessation of incapacity—Review—Ending of compensation—Loss of eye—Diseased condition of other eye—Risk of future incapacity—Concurrent causes of incapacity.

A miner lost his right eye through an accident arising out of his employment, and for a time received from his employers compensation for total incapacity. Subsequently, in proceedings for review, the arbitrator ended the compensation, on the ground that the miner's incapacity had ceased, and that he was fit to resume his former work as a miner. He however also found that there was incipient cataract in the remaining eye which would gradually produce incapacity for work, but that the cataract was not due to the accident.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the arbitrator was right in ending the compensation.

Ld. Atkinson.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the Haughhead Coal Company, Limited, asked the interim Sheriff-substitute at Airdrie (Millar Craig) to find that the right of Henry Hargreave to compensation, in respect of an accident which occurred to him on 18th February 1910 while working in their colliery at Broomhouse, ceased on 15th September 1910.

The Sheriff-substitute ended the compensation, and, at the request Mar. 12, 1912. of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The case was heard before me on 13th February 1911, when the following facts were admitted or proved:—^{Hargreave v. Haughhead Coal Co., Limited.} (1) That on 18th February 1910 the appellant sustained injury to his right eye by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a miner with the respondents in their Broomhouse Colliery. (2) That in consequence of the injury the eye had to be removed. (3) That the appellant received compensation from the respondents in respect of total incapacity from the date of the accident till 15th September 1910, at the rate of 13s. 9d. per week. (4) That on 12th November 1910 the appellant's incapacity had ceased, and he was fit to resume his former work as a miner. (5) That the appellant had on 12th November 1910, and has now, incipient cataract in his left eye. (6) That incapacity for his work will result gradually from the cataract. (7) That the cataract in the left eye is not due to the accident. (8) That it is admitted that the appellant's condition was the same at 15th September as at 12th November 1910. (9) That in the beginning of December 1910 the appellant resumed his former work as a miner with the respondents. (10) That his wage-earning capacity is not diminished by the loss of his right eye.

"On these facts I ended the compensation as at 15th September 1910, and found no expenses due to or by either party."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was the arbitrator right in the circumstances stated by him in ending the compensation payable to appellant by respondents in respect of the accident sustained by him on 18th February 1910?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, and Lord Salvesen) on 17th June 1911, when their Lordships pronounced an interlocutor answering the question of law in the affirmative, and affirming the decision of the arbitrator.*

* OPINIONS.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff here has found certain facts, and we must assume, we are bound to assume, that he found those facts as basing his judgment upon the evidence which was before him. If there was a deficiency of evidence we have nothing to do with that; we must assume that he had evidence before him which justified him in coming to the conclusion upon the facts at which he arrived. I leave out of view altogether the question about the cataract, because it does not interfere with the appellant's work at present, and it is not an affection which necessarily involves the ultimate loss of his second eye. It is not suggested, and I understand cannot be suggested, that the cataract has anything to do with the accident which happened, whereby he lost the right eye.

Now, the appellant resumed his work as a miner, and the finding in fact of the Sheriff-substitute is that his wage-earning capacity is not diminished by the loss of his right eye. That is a finding in fact. Mr Constable contended that that finding was unreasonable, and that we were entitled to say that we must find otherwise. I am not of that opinion. I think if the Sheriff had evidence before him which satisfied him of the fact that the man's earning capacity was not diminished by the loss of his right eye he was quite entitled so to find; and that can be decided not by theory at all, but by the fact that for a considerable period of time the man with his one eye was doing his work in the mine and earning the same wages that he

Haughhead
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Hargreave appealed to the House of Lords.

The appeal was heard on 12th March 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The arbitrator ought not to have ended the compensation, but should have made either a suspensory order or a nominal award, so as to keep matters open, and thus enable the workman to obtain compensation should incapacity again supervene. The view that had been taken in certain Scottish decisions that the adoption of such devices was incompetent was not good law. [The Lord Chancellor intimated to counsel that it was unnecessary to argue the point, as the competency of such devices had been settled affirmatively by the House in the recent case of Taylor v. London and North-Western Railway Company.¹] From the arbitrator's findings in fact it was almost certain that incapacity would supervene sooner or later. The only question, therefore, remaining in the case, was whether that incapacity, when it arose, would or would not be due to the accident. It clearly would be due to the accident, because if there had been no accident there would have been no incapacity, as the miner would still have had one eye with which to continue his vocation. The accident, therefore, would be a concurrent cause of the incapacity. The Workmen's Compensation Act contained nothing which limited its benefits to these cases only where the injury used to earn before—the same wages, in fact, as other miners were earning with the same output.

If that is so, it seems to me that the case of Rosie v. Mackay, 1910 S. C. 714, as Lord Salvesen has said, is conclusive against the pursuer. In that case the question was one of rupture, and the possibility was stated there that the man could do a good deal of labour and the rupture might not affect him so far as his capacity to do his work was concerned; nevertheless—the question being whether, at that time and with reasonable prospects for the immediate future, he was able to do the work which he undertook to do and proved it by doing it without any appearance of injury caused by the doing of it—the Court of Seven Judges held, by a majority of five to two, that he was not entitled to any further compensation, and that the Sheriff had been wrong in allowing him compensation of 9s. 2d. a week upon the footing that something would happen in the future, of which there was no certainty whatever as to when it would occur or whether it would actually occur.

On these grounds I think there is no reason for interfering with the judgment at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that when the learned counsel for the appellant was reading the stated case over to us, and came to the tenth finding in fact, I wondered what his argument was going to be, because it seemed to me upon the facts that it was very difficult to see what was to be said to us to raise a question of law upon which the appellant could succeed. The point turned out to be that finding ten was an unreasonable finding. It was said to be unreasonable because it was alleged that it was logically inconsistent with the second finding. I do not think that is the case at all. The whole findings must be read and considered together. The tenth finding is, like the others, a pure question of fact upon which the Sheriff-substitute has found. He may be right or he may be wrong upon it—I do not see any reason to suppose that he was wrong—but he arrived at it upon a consideration of the facts. I think it is final, and see no reason for our interference in the matter.

was the causa proxima of the incapacity, but granted compensation Mar. 12, 1912. wherever incapacity "results from the injury."¹ Here the apprehended total blindness would certainly be in part, at least, the "result" of the original accident. In cases of negligence, where an injury resulted from the concurrence of negligence and some extraneous cause, the negligent person was liable for the whole effect.² *Cory Brothers & Company v. Hughes*³ supported the appellant's contention.⁴

Hargreave v.
Haughhead
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In this case the appellant lost his right eye by an accident, and at that time there was no sign of incipient cataract in his left eye; there was nothing the matter with it. The fact is not perhaps very clearly stated by the Sheriff-substitute, but I think that is the fair result of his finding. The incipient cataract only dates from 12th November 1910. The accident occurred on the 18th of February preceding. There is nothing to connect the accident with the disease. That being so, it seems to me that it is impossible to say that the award ought to have been kept open, unless your Lordships are prepared to hold that when a man being gifted by nature with two organs of vision loses one, the award ought always to be kept open on the chance of his losing the other before he becomes unfit to work or is unable to earn his livelihood.

I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur. As I understand the case, the learned Sheriff-substitute has found that this cataract is not due to the accident—that is, that it is not caused by the accident. Now, the compensation is given where the injury is caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of a man's employment, and it is in respect of that injury, and of that alone, that the workman is entitled to receive compensation. The function of the schedule is to supply a measure of damages for that compensation; but a man is not entitled to compensation for an injury not inflicted upon him by the accident with which he meets.

If the argument of the appellant were well founded then, if a man loses one eye, inasmuch as if anything happens to the other eye he would become totally blind, the award must be for ever kept open in order to see whether that misfortune will ever befall him. If that were so, there would be no finality in such a case. It is, on the other hand, quite understandable that, if a man is in a diseased condition at the time he meets with an accident, and the accident accelerates in any way his disease, that, as well as the actual physical injury directly caused by the accident, may be fairly taken into account. And if this cataract was in an incipient stage at the time when the injury to the right eye was sustained, and if that injury to the right eye accelerated the disease in the left eye, it might possibly be

Mar. 12, 1912. that the award should be kept open to meet further developments. But it appears to me—taking the finding here to be that this cataract did not exist at the time the man sustained the injury to his right eye, but that it developed subsequently, coupled with the seventh finding, “that the cataract in the left eye is not due to the accident”—that the award should not be kept open to meet the possibility of the consequences which may hereafter ensue.

Hargreave v. Haughhead Coal Co., Limited.
Ld. Atkinson.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—In my opinion when the Sheriff made his award in this case he made it as a final award, meaning to exclude from the scope of that award anything in respect of or in connection with the cataract in the left eye. I think that the finding in head 7, “that the cataract in the left eye is not due to the accident,” destroys all causal link of connection between that ailment and any accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The causal connection having been thus destroyed, it appears to me that it would be straining the statute and contrary to its provisions to apply it to a case like the present.

No question of probable or possible recurrence of the effects of an accident can arise in a case like the present, where, as I say, all causal connection between the ailment and the accident has been definitely settled not to exist.

The LORD CHANCELLOR and LORD ROBSON concurred.

THEIR LORDSHIPS dismissed the appeal.

May 13, 1912. WILSONS AND CLYDE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—
D.-F. Dickson—H. W. Beveridge.

Duris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited. Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Sched. (1) (b), (3), and (16)—Incapacity for work—Inability to get work—Review—Competency—Change of circumstances.

An injured workman, having to some extent recovered, was given light work by his employers, and entered into an agreement with them for payment to him of a certain weekly sum as compensation for partial incapacity. A medical referee certified him as fit for light work. Subsequently he was dismissed from his employment, and failed to find work elsewhere. He thereupon brought an application for review of the weekly payment, in which he averred that owing to his condition he was unable to obtain employment, and sought to have the weekly payment increased to the sum due to him as for total incapacity. There had been no change in his physical condition since the medical referee's report.

Held (rev. judgment of the First Division) (1) that a workman's inability to obtain work owing to his injured condition is “incapacity for work” within the meaning of the Act, even though he may be physically capable of doing work; (2) that supervening inability to obtain work is a relevant ground for reviewing a weekly payment, even though there may have been no change in the workman's physical condition.

In an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, at the instance of Thomas Macdonald or Duris, coal miner, Castle Street, Hamilton, for review of weekly payments of compensation paid to him under a memorandum of agreement between him and his employers, Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Hay Shennan) refused the application, and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

Ld. Chancellor (Loreburn).
Lord Mac-

Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

The case set forth:—"This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, raised on the 9th day of February 1911, in which I was asked by the appellant to review the weekly payments of 16s. 11d. of partial compensation agreed to be paid by the respondents to the appellant under memorandum of agreement, recorded in the Hamilton Sheriff Court on 11th January 1911, in respect of injuries by accident sustained by him while employed as a miner at No. 1 Pit, Clyde Colliery, Hamilton, belonging to the respondents, on 16th February 1909, and to increase said weekly payments to the sum of 20s. in terms of section 16 of the First Schedule to the said Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The appellant averred as the ground of his application for review that ' . . . owing to his condition he is unable to obtain work in the district, and the said Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, Limited, are unwilling or unable to supply him with same.' The relevancy of the appellant's averment above quoted for an increase of his compensation was disputed, and a debate was heard before me, when the following facts were agreed on between the parties, viz.:—(1) The appellant obtained light work with respondents in May 1909 at the picking tables; (2) while at said light work in September 1910 the parties remitted the question of appellant's fitness for work to a medical referee under Schedule 1, section 15, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, who reported that the appellant was fit for light work such as he was at that date engaged in; (3) that the appellant was dismissed from his employment with respondents on 6th December 1910; (4) that appellant's physical condition had not changed in any way since the date of the said medical referee's report. In these circumstances, founding on the case of Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited,¹ I found that the appellant had set forth no relevant grounds for reviewing the weekly payment."

The question of law was:—"Was I right in holding that the appellant's averments disclosed no relevant grounds for review of his compensation?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 28th June 1911.

Counsel for the appellant stated that he was unable to distinguish the case from Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited,¹ and the Court, without calling upon counsel for the respondents, pronounced an interlocutor answering the question in the affirmative, and dismissing the appeal.

Duris, the workman, appealed to the House of Lords, and in a supplementary statement he averred, inter alia:—"The appellant is prepared to prove that he has made repeated applications in the district for work of a class which, in his impaired condition of health, he might be able to undertake. All these applications have been unsuccessful, and the appellant is prepared to show that his want of success has not been due to the state of the labour market, but to his incapacity, and also to the very limited type of work which is now within his powers. He has been refused employment on the ground that, having regard to his obviously injured condition, employers would not employ such a workman. The appellant is not earning, nor is he able to earn, any wages whatsoever, and his injured condition precludes him from obtaining employment at any suitable employment or business at which he could earn wages. The result of the accident has been and continues to be total incapacity on the part of the appellant."

The case was heard on 12th March 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The case of Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited,¹ by which the First Division felt themselves bound, was wrongly decided, and should now be overruled. It was true that that case contained no specific averment that the workman's inability to get work was caused by his incapacity, but the Court did not proceed on that ground, and the appellant was prepared to argue his case on the footing that the two cases were indistinguishable. The appellant was ready to prove, if allowed, that owing to his physical condition brought about by the accident he was unable to obtain any "suitable employment"² in the district. "Suitable" must be interpreted as meaning "in the district," but even if this were not so, the appellant was prepared to prove that his inability to obtain employment was not confined to the district. He was able and willing to work but no one would employ him, and this inability to obtain work amounted to "incapacity for work" in the words of the statute. This had been recognised both in Scotland and in England. In Clelland v. The Singer Manufacturing Company,³ Lord M'Laren said that the question which the arbitrator had to consider was "what could the man earn in the open market after the accident had happened as distinguished from what he actually earned in the open market before the accident," and in *Rosie v. Mackay*⁴ the Lord President recognised the fact that the report of the medical referee, although final upon medical matters, was not final or conclusive as to the man's wage-earning capacity. The English cases were to the same effect. Sharman v. Holliday & Greenwood, Limited,⁵ recognised that the fact that a workman had been repeatedly refused employment owing to his physical condition was admissible as evidence of incapacity, notwithstanding medical testimony that he was able to work. The same principle was given effect to in the undernoted cases,⁶ and was assumed to be applicable in Cardiff Corporation v. Hall.⁷

Argued for the respondents;—Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited,¹ was rightly decided, and ruled the present case. The only question in the case was whether the workman was or was not physically incapable of working, and it was only where the workman was physically incapable of working that the Act gave compensation. The medical referee had decided that the workman was physically capable of working, and, indeed, that fact was admitted. It was wrong to say that inability to obtain work was equivalent to "total or partial incapacity." Neither Rosie v. Mackay,¹ nor Clelland v. Singer Manufacturing Company,² were inconsistent with the view that it was purely physical incapacity which had to be considered. The English cases did not go as far as the appellant contended. In Cardiff Corporation v. Hall,³ Fletcher Moulton, L.J., recognised that it was only in very exceptional cases, e.g., where an accident left a man's labour an "odd lot" in the labour market, that the employer might have to prove that the workman was able to get work. The present was not such a case, as it was found as a fact that the appellant had "picked" coal, which was a well-known line of light work. The fact that employers did not care to employ a damaged man was unfortunate for the man, but irrelevant to the legal question under consideration. Although the respondents were willing that the general question should be decided, it was to be noted that on technical grounds also the case of the appellant was irrelevant. His averment was that "owing to his condition" he was unable to obtain work; he ought to have added "as the result of the accident." Also, the words "in the district," were a fatal limitation on his averment of inability to obtain employment.

* On the same day their Lordships delivered judgment (reported [1912] A. C. 496), in Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, Limited, an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal in England, reported [1911] 1 K. B. 1048. In that case a workman lost the sight of his left eye through an accident, which did not, however, produce any change of appearance in the eye or physical disfigurement. He continued to work at his old rate of wages. Many years afterwards he met with a second accident to the left eye which necessitated its removal, and on recovering from the operation he was unable to obtain work in consequence of his being manifestly a one-eyed man, though his ability to work remained exactly as it was before.

The County Court Judge and the Court of Appeal held that the workman was not entitled to compensation. The House of Lords reversed this decision, delivering the following opinions:—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the appellant was already blind of one eye when, in September 1910, the blind eye was again injured by an accident in the course of his work and had to be removed. The result is alleged to have been that his disfigurement prevented his obtaining employment. He remained equally able to do work after as he was before September 1910, but says that his partial blindness became apparent as it had not been before, and so he could get no work. Can it be said that incapacity for work resulted from the injury of September 1910? The injury did not prevent him from being able to work, but it did reduce him to a physical condition which prevented him from getting work suitable in the circumstances.

In my opinion, if the County Court Judge thinks these facts are established (as I gather he did think), he ought to award compensation on the footing of total or partial incapacity, according as he may find. By the first section of the Workmen's Compensation Act compensation is to be paid for personal injury by accident within the terms of the Act. What the schedule does is to fix the scale and conditions. In the ordinary and popular meaning which we are to attach to the language of this statute I

May 13, 1912. LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the appellant asked for a review of a certain agreed weekly payment of 16s. 11d. under the Workmen's Compensation Act upon the ground that "owing to his condition he is unable to obtain work in the district and the said Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, Limited, are unwilling or unable to supply him with the same." In fact it was agreed that he was fit for light work such as is done at the picking tables, and was so employed by the respondents for some eighteen months after the accident, and still is so fit, but was dismissed by the respondents in December 1910, and thereupon applied for a review under Schedule I., think there is incapacity for work when a man has a physical defect which makes his labour unsaleable in any market reasonably accessible to him, and there is partial incapacity for work when such a defect makes his labour saleable for less than it would otherwise fetch. I think this view is in accordance with previous decisions of the Court of Appeal. The principle is carefully discussed in Cardiff Corporation v. Hall, [1911] 1 K. B. 1009, And certainly the opposite view would leave a workman uncompensated for what may be very real and direct consequences of an injury. In my opinion this case should be remitted to the learned County Court Judge.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am unable to agree in the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal has arrived, and I must add, with all respect, that the process by which the learned Judges who formed the majority of the Court arrived at that conclusion has not been regarded with much favour in this House.

Both the Master of the Rolls and Buckley, L.J., turn to the First Schedule. Finding there the expression "total or partial incapacity for work" they hold that it is an answer to the present claim to say that the claimant's physical condition is just what it was before the accident happened, and that his dexterity and capacity for manual labour are as good as ever. "Incapacity for work" they take to be the same as "incapacity to work." In fact one of the learned Judges treats the two expressions as synonymous and uses them as convertible terms. Now "incapacity for work," as the phrase is used in the schedule, seems to me to be a compendious expression meaning inability to earn wages, or full wages, as the case may be, at the work in which the injured workman was employed at the time of the accident. But whether that be so or not, it is laid down most distinctly in this House (Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons, Limited, [1901] A. C. 79) that you must not resort to the schedule for the purpose of cutting down the right to compensation. The right to compensation is given by the Act. The Act is the workmen's charter. The schedule prescribes the scale of compensation and the mode and conditions of its enjoyment. That is the office of the schedule. The key to the meaning of the Legislature is not to be looked for there.

As Lord Halsbury observed in the case I have just mentioned, "the first thing, I think, one has to do is to apply one's mind to what is the substantive intention and meaning of this statute." It seems to me that the injury for which the statute gives compensation is not mutilation or disfigurement or loss of physical power, but loss or diminution of the capacity to earn wages in the employment in which the injured workman was engaged at the time of the accident. At that time this man was earning 20s. a week as an edge tool moulder. That is what he was worth then. What is he worth now? As he is now no one will take him on at that work. Everybody would say offhand two eyes are better than one for such a job as that. So he is heavily handicapped in seeking employment. This disadvantage or disqualification, whatever you choose to call it, has resulted from the accident. It is (to use another expression to be found in the Act) "due to the accident."

It seems to me therefore that this workman is entitled to claim compen-

I am not able to arrive at the same conclusion, and I think the English cases cited to us proceed upon the sound view. The purpose of the Act as declared in the first section is to compensate for injuries. The measure of the compensation is given in the First Schedule, paragraphs 1 to 3 inclusive. Ought we to say that if a man, though physically fit for some work, sation under the Act. With the amount of compensation, if compensation be awarded, we have nothing to do. That is a matter for the arbitrator or the County Court Judge.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the case remitted to the proper tribunal.

LORD ATKINSON.—In this case the workman, through an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, lost his eye. It was a blind eye, no doubt, but it is impossible to contend, I think, that the loss of even a blind eye is not an injury within the meaning of section 1, subsection 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. His employer was therefore liable to pay him compensation under the provisions of that section. That is the workman's absolute right. Before the accident he was, though blind of one eye, physically able to do the work he was then doing, and is still able to do work of that kind. There was a market for his labour then because his blindness was not observable. There is no market for his labour now because his blindness is observable. The recent accident has destroyed his market, though it has left his physical ability to work what it was before.

Before the later accident he was not suffering under any incapacity whatever. He was able to work and able to get employment, and I cannot see how the words "antecedent incapacity" apply to the appellant's case. Though the first section of the statute plainly confers upon an injured workman the right, in cases coming within it, to obtain compensation, it does not fix the amount of compensation, or indicate the principle upon which the compensation is to be measured; that is the function of the schedule, but it is its only function. The employer is by section 1, as he was by section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, made liable to pay compensation "in accordance with the schedule," elastic words importing in themselves a degree of latitude which it is difficult to define—Thomas v. Kelly, (1888) 13 App. Cas. 506, at p. 511.

The argument for the respondents resolves itself into this: as paragraph 1 of the schedule only provides for the payment of compensation in two cases—(a) where the death of the workman results from the injury, and (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from it—the workman in the present case cannot get any compensation because he is as able physically to do his work as he ever was, though no one will employ him to do it. In other words, that in construing the words "incapacity for work," used in the schedule, the absence of a market for the workman's labour, though due, not to the state of the labour market nor to fluctuations of trade, but to some defect personal to himself caused by the injury he has received which renders his labour unsaleable, is to be entirely left out of consideration. His power of earning wages may be completely gone, yet for the loss of that power, directly resulting from the disfigurement caused by the accident, he is not to receive any compensation. Such a construction as this, it would appear to me, cuts down the right expressly conferred upon the workman by the statute. It involves a repeal pro tanto of section 1.

The question whether a schedule such as this can legitimately be construed in such a way as to cut down the right conferred by the statute was

May 18, 1912. is prevented by the consequence of the injury from obtaining it—in other words is disabled from earning wages—that nevertheless he is “able to earn” wages and is not under any incapacity for work? He is under an incapacity, if his condition makes his labour unsaleable or saleable only at a less wage.

In regard to the averment that he is “unable to obtain work in the district,” I think it must be understood in the sense that he cannot get work suitable for his condition in any place within reasonable access. The considered in your Lordships’ House in the case of Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons, Limited, [1901] A. C. 79. In that case Lysons, the workman, a miner, entered the respondents’ employment on a Tuesday, on which day in each week the miners’ week in the respondents’ colliery ended. He worked piecework on that day and on the Tuesday following, earning 6s. each day. He was then injured by an accident, giving a right to compensation under the first section of the Act of 1897, which is practically identical with the first section of the present Act.

The County Court Judge held that the workman had earned 12s. during one week, and that he was therefore entitled, under paragraph 1 (b) of the Schedule to that Act, to 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings, i.e., 50 per cent of 12s., or 6s. per week for every week during which his disablement lasted after the first fortnight. The words of the clause are “not exceeding 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months.” The Court of Appeal held that Lysons was not entitled to any compensation, as he had not been employed for two weeks. This construction plainly cut down the right conferred upon the workman by the statute, and was for that very reason disapproved of and rejected in this House. At p. 85 of the report Lord Halsbury, then Lord Chancellor, is reported to have said,—“The first thing, I think, one has to do is to apply one’s mind to what is the substantive intention and meaning of this statute. Does it mean that every workman, who ever is employed in one of the prescribed trades, shall be (subject to certain conditions not relevant to the matter now under debate) entitled to compensation? Or does it mean that only workmen shall be entitled to compensation in respect of whom it is possible to say that the periods of their employment and the mode in which they are paid will render it possible to establish an average weekly payment, so that anybody who comes outside that category is not entitled to any compensation at all. My Lords, for my own part, I cannot entertain a doubt that the Legislature did mean that every workman in the prescribed trades should be entitled to compensation, and I think that is the language which one would naturally expect to have been used by the Legislature if that was the meaning of the enactment. But now it is said that the language of the enactment is that the employer is to ‘be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule of this Act.’ It is to be observed that even upon that language it is not such compensation as is enacted in the schedule, but ‘in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act’; and when we look at the First Schedule of the Act we find that there are a variety of provisions which are very intelligible indeed, if we take what I say is the leading enactment, that every workman is entitled to compensation. But it is said: if a workman is not employed for at least two weeks, how can you average his earnings, or his agreed earnings, by an ‘average,’ which, when you have only got one term, is an impossible phrase? Well, my Lords, for my own part, if I came to the conclusion that there had been no mode by which the quantum should be fixed in the schedule, I should still be of opinion that there was no repealing of the right which had first been granted, but that by arbitration, or by some other means, which I think would be quite within the powers of the Act, the compensation should be ascertained ; because I do not look upon the provision made in respect of the compensation as one which, either in language or in the intention of the Legislature, was meant to cut down and override the primary right given to every workman to compensation, but I regard it as a mode of ascertaining what the quantum was to be."

Lords Macnaghten, Davey, Shand, Robertson, and Lindley gave judgment to the like effect, and Lord Brampton concurred.

On examining the schedule one plainly sees that what is to be compensated for is not, as in ordinary actions of tort, the pain and suffering which the plaintiff has endured, or the disfigurement of, or injury to, his body which has been inflicted upon him, but the loss of the power to earn wages which has resulted from the injury. In the case of the workman's death it is only those dependants who are dependent wholly or in part upon those earnings who are to receive any compensation, and the amount of it is, subject to certain limits, measured by the amount of those earnings in the employment in which he met with the accident which caused his death. However great may be the pecuniary loss the dependants sustain from the workman's death by reason of the cessation on that event of a pension, or life annuity, or income from property, they are not entitled to any compensation under the Act in respect of this loss.

The obvious meaning of paragraph 1 (b) of the Schedule, when read with paragraph 3, is that the higher scale is to be adopted when the workman is not able to earn anything, and that where he does earn or is able to earn something in a suitable employment credit is to be allowed for this sum to the extent specified. The words "or is able to earn" are most significant. They point to the retention of the power to earn something in a suitable employment, and to the extent that this power is retained or has returned, though he may not try to exercise it, he does not incur the particular kind of loss for which compensation is to be given. Paragraph 16 of the schedule points in the same direction. The weekly payment may be ended or diminished or increased according, presumably, as the ability to earn has completely returned, has increased, or has diminished. There would be no meaning, it would appear to me, in these provisions making the amount of wages which were, are, or can be earned so much the basis of compensation, if the market for the workman's labour has to be left out of consideration. The earning of wages depends as much on the demand for the workman's labour as it does upon his physical ability to work. If because of his physical defects no one will employ him, however efficient he may be in fact, he has lost the power to earn wages as completely as if he was paralysed in every limb.

If it be then the paramount object of the Act to compensate for the loss of the power to earn wages, the workman whom, because of the injury caused by an accident, nobody will employ, comes within its purview as much as one who is rendered unable to do any work at all.

I am unable to follow the line of reasoning based upon the antecedent existence of the man's blindness. It was not apparent, and, as the result shows, he got employment because it was not apparent. The employers,

He became totally incapacitated and received compensation of 20s. per week, and a memorandum of agreement was recorded on 27th May 1909. The respondents provided him with light work at the picking tables till December 1910, and during that period his compensation was reduced by agreement, and thereafter continued to be paid at the rate of 16s. 11d. per week. In September 1910 a report was obtained from a medical referee to the effect that the appellant was fit for the light work such as he was then possibly because they think the loss of the workman's vision, which is now obvious, will render him more liable to accident, refuse to employ him.

It may well be that the words "incapacity for work" would not, in their ordinary meaning, prima facie apply to a case such as this, but it has been well established that in the construction of a statute it is perfectly legitimate to give to some of its words a meaning different from their ordinary meaning, where that is necessary to forward and effect the main purpose and object of the enactment.

I therefore concur that the matter should be remitted to the County Court Judge to ascertain the amount of compensation.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I think this case is an important one, but its material facts can be stated in a word. About fifteen years ago the appellant, who is an edge tool moulder, suffered an injury to his left eye, the ball of which was penetrated by a steel chip. This accident resulted in the blindness of that eye, but did not produce any disfigurement in the workman's appearance, which remained unchanged. On 7th September 1910, however, the appellant, being engaged in cutting out brickwork, was struck in the same eye by a piece of brick. The result of this accident was that the eye had to be removed. A marked disfigurement has consequently resulted from the mutilation. With regard to his power to do work, it remains as before; but with regard to his power to get work, that appears to have been lost, or at least diminished, and, up to the time of the trial, notwithstanding frequent applications in various quarters, he has been refused employment on account of the disfigurement above referred to.

The case depends upon the construction of certain frequently quoted words in the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. The first passage referred to is section 1, subsection (1):—"If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act." It is admitted that the appellant did sustain a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment; and, so far as this subsection is concerned, the language of the Act would seem to cover his case.

It is, however, the words of Schedule I. that have caused difficulty and difference of opinion. The material words of that schedule are as follows:—"Schedule I. (1) The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity not exceeding 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings," &c. It is said, on the one hand, that incapacity for work has not resulted from the latest injury, because he can do work as well now as before. On the other hand, so far as the practical result to the workman is concerned, this would seem to avail him little, if, by the injury, he has been so disfigured that, while he could do the work if he obtained it, he, nevertheless, cannot get employment, and, so far as compensation to him is concerned, from all practical points of view, he

 respondents, who were reducing the number of their workmen, dismissed him. The appellant maintains that the circumstances are now different from those which existed when he agreed to accept 16s. 11d. per week, because he has entered the open labour market, and, notwithstanding all his efforts, he is unable, on account of his injuries, to obtain any employment. He asks an opportunity of proving that his applications have been unsuccessful, and that his want of success "has not been due to the state equally suffers by reason of the accident, whether the accident has prevented him from doing work or from getting it. In one view "incapacity for work," which is the language used in clause (b), might not be held to include the case of his being rendered ineligible for employment; whereas many cases occur to the mind, and illustrations have been given in the judgment of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., which show that, as matter of common experience, the capacity for work may remain quite unimpaired, although the eligibility as an employee may be diminished or lost. If a butler is burned by the explosion of a lamp, his appearance may be such, after his recovery, as to prevent him from obtaining a situation as a butler, and he may find himself out of all kinds of employment. In domestic service or in business, particularly shop business, or in cases like those of commercial travellers, the instances might be repeated without limit in which the workman or workwoman would be forced into the ranks of the unemployed by an accident of the kind figured, although in each of these instances, if employers or society would only have disregarded appearances, the workman's real capacity would have been found the same as before.

Admitting the difficulties, I think that not a little help in their solution arises from this consideration, that when compensation for injury is being treated of by the statute, the theory and datum upon which such compensation proceeds is that of compensation for injury to the worker as a wage-earner, and it is the incapacity to earn a wage which forms the standard upon which the compensation is reckoned. A good illustration is found in paragraph 3 of the schedule, which says that: ". . . in the case of partial incapacity the weekly payment shall in no case exceed the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident, but shall bear such relation to the amount of that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper." In the present case, as in those other illustrations to which I have ventured to refer, the workman is neither earning, nor is he able to earn, anything after the accident, and at least he may have to be turned on to a less remunerative position. In the latter case, it is quite clear that the data have been reached under the statute for the estimate of compensation, namely, the difference between his former and his later wage—that difference having been brought about by reason of personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. In these circumstances, I incline to the opinion that the true meaning of the statute is that "incapacity for work"—the term employed—does include the case of his eligibility to obtain work being diminished or lost, or, in other words, of his capacity to get work being impaired or destroyed. In the case before us, this arose from the mutilation and disfigurement which he suffered by reason of the accident in September 1910.

It is necessary to keep clearly in view in such cases the distinction between inability to obtain work arising as the result of the injured or disfigured condition of the workman and inability to obtain work arising from the state of the labour market. It does not appear to me to be any part of the scheme of the statute to make the employer responsible for a non-

May 18, 1912. of the labour market, but to his incapacity, and also to the very limited type of work which is now within his powers."

Duris v.

Wilsons and

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

I am of opinion that this is a relevant claim for inquiry. The question of law put for the opinion of the First Division by the learned Sheriff-substitute was, "Was I right in holding that the appellant's averments disclosed no relevant grounds for review of his compensation?" The First Division, following Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited,¹ answered the question in the affirmative. I am of opinion that it should have been answered in the negative, that the case of *Boag*¹ was wrongly decided, and employment which is owing to general economic causes. The non-employment, as I say, must be connected with the injury which has been received and with the incapacity for work which has been thereby produced. Even treating that incapacity as inclusive of the case of the impossibility or improbability of obtaining work, as well as of doing it, that impossibility or improbability must be traceable to the thing which has differentiated this workman from his other able-bodied comrades, namely, the injury received. If, for instance, one of the probabilities were that, at the first appearance of scarcity in the demand for labour, a workman in his injured condition would be the first to suffer, that is simply one of those circumstances with regard to which the County Court Judge as arbitrator would have to make his best and most judicious estimate. He might, probably he would in the majority of cases, treat such a problematical consideration as entering into his estimate in but a slender degree. But the refinements in these cases have been so frequent that I desire to say once for all that the entire results causally connected with an injury ought to enter into the estimate, but that results attributable to economic causes, such as the state of the labour market, ought to be excluded therefrom.

I am accordingly of opinion that the conclusion reached by the learned Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton is preferable to that reached by the majority of the Court of Appeal, and that this class of case, namely, of persons suffering injuries which result in their unemployment, should not be excluded from the scope of the compensation payable under the Act.

I am glad to think that the general conclusions on this subject which I have ventured to state are in accord with the trend of the decided cases in England upon this subject. These cases are already legion. But the question whether compensation is, under the statute, limited to an award in respect of physical incapacity alone has of necessity, and owing to the circumstances as presented to the Courts, been considered alongside of this other, namely, whether an award once made, say in consequence of the report by a medical referee, can be reviewed by reason of subsequent experiments, and, in particular, of the experiment which the injured man has himself made of placing his labour on the market, with his experience of finding, or being unable to find, employment.

Upon this latter point the opinion of Lord Collins (then Master of the Rolls) in Sharman v. Holliday & Greenwood, Limited, [1904] 1 K. B. 235, at p. 238, has been frequently referred to, and has been followed. There is in the case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall, [1911] 1 K. B. 1009, at p. 1015, what, if I may venture to say so, appears to me a most valuable summary of the English case law upon this subject. These opinions I respectfully adopt. In addition I would venture to quote two sentences from the late Master of the Rolls in Clark v. Gas Light and Coke Company, 21 T. L. R. 184, as also expressing my own view on this subject. The learned Judge there states the point thus: "The contention was that the only question to be considered was as to the physical condition of the applicant, and that that the case put forward by the workman was one suitable for investigation. It should be explained that the appellant's averment as the ground of his application for review that "owing to his condition he is unable to obtain work in the district" was, by a very proper agreement between the parties, who desired to have the more general question decided, held equivalent to an averment not confined to the particular district or small locality in which he had been working, but was held equivalent to a proposition that he was unable to obtain suitable work.

May 13, 1912.

Durris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

when it was once proved that his physical condition was such as to render him capable of earning the same wages as before, there was an end of the question. It was argued that the question whether his opportunity of finding work from which he might earn the same wages had been narrowed in consequence of the accident ought not to be taken into consideration, the one and only question being as to his physical capacity for work." Upon that subject his view was as follows: "If the applicant was unable in consequence of the accident to command the right of earning wages, who was to suffer, he or his employers? In his opinion, if the applicant, after repeated attempts, could not find an opportunity of putting his diminished powers of working into operation, he was justified in saying that his wage-earning capacity was not the same as before."

In Radcliffe v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, [1910] 1 K. B. 685, at p. 688, the present Master of the Rolls says: "Although I think it is competent to the County Court Judge to review an award similar to that which was made in June, it is right to add that any such application should be jealously scrutinised, and, further, that great care must be taken not to allow the fluctuations of the general labour market to justify a review. But a workman is entitled to say that, although the physical effects of an accident may have disappeared or may be unaltered, yet he, as a damaged man, may be more and more handicapped in the labour market as years pass by. The unwillingness of masters to employ men suffering from any infirmity has been greatly increased by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and this is a circumstance which cannot be disregarded." I refer also in particular to the judgment of Buckley, L.J., in which he dwells upon the distinction between inability to obtain employment arising from the injury and such inability arising from general economic conditions. To that distinction I have already alluded.

I regret to observe the marked difference which has arisen on this subject between the English and the Scottish Courts. Upon the general question as to the treatment of the worker under the statute from the point of view of a wage-earner, the opinion of Lord M'Laren in Clelland v. Singer Manufacturing Company, (1905) 7 F. 975, at p. 983, may be referred to. "What," said he, "the arbiter has to consider is not what the man is receiving, whether under the name of wages or charity, from his employer, but what could the man earn in the open market after the accident had happened as distinguished from what he actually earned in the open market before the accident." And later expressions show in some points a near approximation to the views of the learned Judges in England. In Carlin v. Stephen & Sons, Limited, 1911 S. C. 901, at p. 907, Lord Salvesen analyses these English cases, and says: "In my opinion, incapacity for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act is primarily physical incapacity, in which may well be included such personal disfigurement as may lessen the sphere of employment, although the power to work remains as good as before. It does not, in my opinion, include inability to get employment which arises from something not personal to the workman." Had the state of the Scotch decisions been in accord with these sentences, a difference between them and the English cases would have been far to seek.

I need not accordingly recapitulate my views. For the reasons there stated by me, I am of opinion that this appeal should be sustained.

In the case, however, of Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited, 1910 S. C. 51, the question of what is the meaning of the statutory expression "incapacity for work" was broadly and emphatically decided. The case arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but the language under construction and the point were the same as in the subsequent Act. A workman averred that he was entitled to have a weekly payment reviewed and increased "in respect that his employers were unable to give him suitable light work, and that he was unable to obtain light employment elsewhere." It was held that these grounds were not relevant for inquiry. The Lord Justice-Clerk said: "As I read the Act of Parliament and relative schedule the question to be decided in an application to assess compensation, or under an application for review of weekly payments, is the question of the man's physical capacity to work. Now, in this case it had been decided by agreement that the workman was partially capable for work. Is it any reason for reviewing the payment to say that the employers cannot find him suitable work for his capacity, or that he has not been able to find such work himself? If the appellant means that his averments if proved would of themselves be a sufficient ground for saying that compensation must be increased to the full allowance under the statute, I should certainly not for myself yield for one moment to any such demand. I take it that the whole question is that of 'capacity to work,' which cannot be decided merely by the fact that the workman has not got work, but only by such evidence as satisfies the Court whether or not he is able to work." This is a broad affirmance of the proposition that incapacity under the Act must be limited to physical incapacity and to that alone. So stated, I think the proposition—with which I have already dealt at length in the earlier part of my opinion—to be an unsound proposition, and the decision of Boag to be erroneous. On 28th June 1911, the First Division pronounced a decision in the same sense in the case of Macdonald or Duris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, (supra, at p. 75). The case, however, following Boag as it did, was treated as being governed by that decision. It follows that, in my view, that case has also been erroneously decided.

I humbly think, accordingly, that the decision of the Court below should be reversed, and that the case should be remitted for adjudication by the arbitrator as to the amount of compensation to be awarded to the appellant.

GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, (Pursuers) Appellants.—Sir Alfred Cripps, K.C.—H. P. Macmillan. No. 13.

THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF THE BURGH OF AYR, (Defenders) Respondents—Murray, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson. Feb. 27, 1912.

Burgh—Street—Private Street—Railway—Road “forming part of any railway”—Railway lines forming “obstructions” in a street—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 4 (31)—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), sec. 104 (2) (d). Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co. v. Magistrates of Ayr.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, enacts:—Sec. 4 (31). “ ‘Street’ shall include any road . . . thoroughfare, and public passage, or other place within the burgh used either by carts or foot-passengers, and not being, or forming, part of any . . . railway.”

In 1889 a railway company, under section 38 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, which provides for the purchase by a railway company by voluntary agreement of land for extraordinary purposes, acquired a strip of ground in a burgh. The strip consisted of an unformed road which had been used by the public as a right of way for traffic of every description since 1841, and continued to be so used after its acquisition by the railway company, who did not utilise it for any purpose connected with the railway until 1908, when they laid a double line of rails along it.

Held (affirming judgment of the First Division), in a question between the magistrates of the burgh and the railway company, that the strip did not form “part of any railway,” and was therefore “a street” within the meaning of sec. 4 (31) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and that the rails were liable to be removed, at the instance of the magistrates, as “obstructions” within the meaning of sec. 104 (2) (d) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903.

Observed that “part of any railway” means part of a railway in fact, and that the mere acquisition of land by a railway company does not make the land “part of any railway.”

(In the Court of Session, 21st December 1910—1911 S. C. 298.)

The pursuers, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, appealed to the House of Lords.

The appeal was heard on 13th and 14th November 1911.*

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from interlocutors pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, who tried the case, and the First Division of the Court of Session affirming the former.

The controversy between the appellants and respondents, out of which the appeal arises, relates to a strip of ground thirty feet in width, situated formerly within the burgh of Newton-upon-Ayr, now within the extended boundaries of the burgh of Ayr, and forming part of what has come to be known as Oswald Road. One Mr Oswald of Auchencruive was in 1837, when the appellants obtained their first Act authorising the construction of their railway, owner of this land. How he got it, or to what purpose he

In the year 1889 the appellants purchased this strip of land from Oswald for the sum of £3500. They acquired it under the powers conferred upon them by the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for extraordinary purposes, which purposes are, by section 38 of that statute, defined to be "making and providing additional stations, yards, wharfs, and places for the accommodation of passengers, and for receiving, depositing, and loading or unloading goods, . . ." and "making convenient roads or ways to the railway, or any other purpose which may be requisite or convenient for the formation or use of the railway." Whether as between the Company and the vendor, the strip of land was subject to any right in him over it is irrelevant. The proprietors of the land abutting on the eastern side of this strip, that is the side furthest away from the appellants' railway, at some remote time added a strip of about 10 feet wide for the greater part of the length of the strip so purchased, and this enlarged strip, 40 feet in breadth, is now called Oswald Road. On 23rd February 1908 the Railway Company laid down a double line of rails on this ground. Up to that date they had never used it for any purpose. It was never bottomed, or metalled, or made up as a road. In some places it was grass grown, but the Railway Company admit that there is and long has been a public right of way over it for the passage of horses, carts, and of persons on foot. And further, it has been found on the facts at the trial of the case that the rails so laid down were an obstruction to the right of the public thus to use it.

The earlier litigation it is unnecessary to deal with, but the Town-Council of Ayr on 14th March 1908, acting under the provisions of the 133rd section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, as amended by the 104th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, passed a resolution to have the road put in order and freed from obstruction. This resolution, it is admitted, could only be legally passed by the Town-Council on the assumption that the road in question had, at the date of the resolution, become and was a private street. The Railway Company accordingly instituted this action seeking to have it declared that the strip of ground was not, at the date of the resolution, a private street, and that this being so the respondents had no right to interfere with the pursuers. A proof having been taken, the case, after much litigation, came on for hearing, with the result that the Lord Ordinary pronounced the interlocutor of 13th January 1910, by which the respondents, the Magistrates, were assoilzied; and this interlocutor was by the interlocutor of the First Division, dated 8th December 1910, adhered to.

The question upon which the case turns is this: Had this place become a "private street" within the meaning of the 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (repealed by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892), or within the meaning of the latter statute? The definitions of a street and a private street are in the two statutes identical.

Private street in each means a street maintained, or liable to be maintained, by persons other than the commissioners. This place, Oswald Road, was certainly not maintained by the commission. So far as it was maintained at all, it was maintained by some persons other than the commission. Then was it a street when these rails were laid down upon it?

 "Street" is thus defined in the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 4(31):—" 'Street' shall include any road, highway, bridge, quay, lane, square, court, alley, close, wynd, vennel, thoroughfare, and public passage, or other place within the burgh used either by carts or foot-passengers, and not being or forming part of any harbour, railway, or canal station, depot, wharf, towing path, or bank."

Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co. v.
Magistrates
of Ayr.

Ld. Atkinson.

It is not denied that this road was used by horses in carts and foot-passengers long before the year 1862, when the 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 was passed. Up to 1889, the date of the purchase by the Railway Company, it would appear to me that this statute operated upon the state of things existing for twenty-seven years. There could be no question of any part of the street being a railway during that period, but even if this were not so, I think it is not enough that the soil merely should, after it has become subject to a public right of way, be acquired by a railway company for extraordinary purposes, if it never has in fact been used for any of those purposes. The mere acquisition of the land for extraordinary purposes, coupled with an intention ultimately to use it for some of them, cannot by itself convert land allowed to lie waste into a railway within the meaning of this definition. In my view, therefore, this Oswald Road had become a private street, if not long before 1889 certainly before February 1908, when the rails were laid down upon it. There is no doubt that a public right of way may, under the 46th section of the Railways Clauses (Consolidation) Act of 1845, in the absence of any provision in the special Act prohibiting it, be exercised over the permanent way of a railway. *Dartford Rural District Council v. Bexley Heath Railway*¹ established this. But here the fact has been found against the appellants that the rails as laid are an obstruction to the public right of way. It is not necessary to decide at present whether if this place, Oswald Road, had become a private street, as I think it clearly has, the Company could not ever lay down rails upon it, but certainly they cannot do so in such a way as to cause an obstruction such as it is found they have created. The decisions appealed from are, therefore, in my opinion, right, and should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I do not entertain any doubt that the Scotch Courts have come to a correct conclusion in this case. It is only because on both sides of the bar it was represented that the question at issue between, so to speak, railways on the one hand and municipal authorities on the other was of great importance in Scotland, that I venture again briefly to resume the facts. It does not appear to me to be necessary, however, in doing so to go into the history of the strip of ground afterwards known as Oswald Road, Ayr, or to recount its various transmissions since 1765 up to the date when it was acquired by the Railway Company from Mr Oswald in 1889.

In 1885 this road or piece of ground, originally a part of the burgh of

Feb. 27, 1912. Newton-upon-Ayr, was wholly incorporated in the extended burgh of Ayr.

Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co. v. Magistrates of Ayr.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

What was then the situation of that piece of ground? That is cleared up by the admission of parties to this effect, that it "has been used by the public as a right of way for all purposes at least since the year 1841," this admission being made, of course, by the pursuers without prejudice to their pleas as to the effect of their acquisition of the solum in 1889 in virtue of their conveyance and the Railway Acts. It may be useful as a test to look at the state of matters in and after this year 1885. The municipal boundaries of Ayr in that year included this ground. It is admitted that it has been used by the public as a right of way for all purposes at least since 1841. The Burgh Police Act of 1892 had no doubt not then been passed, but its predecessor, the Police and Improvement Act of 1862,¹ a statute which was not referred to in the discussion, was in full operation. By the definition of that Act it does not appear to me to be doubtful that the ground was a "private street." By section 3, "the expression 'private street' shall mean any road, street, or place within the burgh (not being or forming part of any harbour, railway, or canal station, depot, wharf, towing path, or bank) used by carts, and either accessible to the public from a public street or forming a common access to lands and premises separately occupied, and which has not been before the adoption of this Act well and sufficiently paved and flagged by the owners of premises fronting or abutting on said street, and which has not been maintained as a public street." As I say, it does not appear to be open to doubt, accordingly, that Oswald Road in and after 1885 was a private street.

In 1889, acting under the provisions of section 38 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the appellant Company, by voluntary agreement, acquired that ground. I shall refer later to what I consider to be the effect of that statute, but I may remark that from the date of that acquisition in 1889 until February 1908 the ground does not appear to have been in fact used or appropriated as any part of a railway. No rails were laid down upon it, no exclusive possession was taken of it, but, on the contrary, it stands admitted that the public rights and thoroughfare existed as before. The Town-Council of Ayr exercised their ordinary jurisdiction with regard to private streets over it; and in 1896, without objection by the appellants, a public sewer was laid in Oswald Road, and we were informed that the gas mains were also, under public authority, there laid.

Meantime, in 1892, the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act had passed, and the statutory definitions therein are as follows:—" 'Private street' shall mean any street maintained, or liable to be maintained, by persons other than the commissioners," and it is further provided that " 'street' shall include any road, highway . . . thoroughfare, and public passage, or other place within the burgh, used either by carts or foot-passengers, and not being or forming part of any harbour, railway, or canal station, depot, wharf, towing path, or bank." For the purposes of this case there is no material distinction between this and the language of the Act of 1862, and there can be no reasonable argument against the proposition that both de facto and de jure in February 1908 the road in question was, and had for many years

There are various conclusions of the summons in this case, but it was candidly admitted by Sir Alfred Cripps that he desired a judgment which would, for practical purposes, combine the third and fourth conclusions in this way—"That the said strip of ground is not subject to any of the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts . . . because the said strip of ground forms part of the railway of the pursuers within the meaning of the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts . . . and is not a private street . . . and is in no way subject to any of the provisions of the said Acts relating to streets." There follows the fifth conclusion, which appears to me to be a serious but quite logical consequence of the third and fourth conclusions which I have cited, and to constitute what, in my opinion, is a most audacious demand. It is to the effect that the appellants are entitled to maintain and use for the purpose of their undertaking the said strip of ground and the lines of rails already laid down thereon, and to lay down, maintain, and use for said purposes such further lines of rails thereon, as they may deem expedient.

Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co. v.
Magistrates
of Ayr.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

It appears that on 14th March 1908 the Town-Council of Ayr had passed, under their statutory powers, a resolution requiring that this portion of Oswald Road should be freed from obstructions and properly levelled, bottomed, &c., and it is, of course, maintained that this resolution was invalid if the other conclusions of the summons are affirmed. In a word, the object of this suit is this: that it was within the power of the Railway Company in February 1908, by laying rails on this private street, to destroy its character as such, and to cut it out of the jurisdiction of the Ayr municipal authorities, and of all the provisions of the Burgh Police Act. The appellants, it is maintained, had the power to do this, because by laying the rails they made the ground part of the railway, and so brought it within the exception to private streets. It follows, accordingly, that the surface of the ground can, according to the argument, be used without let or hindrance by locomotives, trucks, and carriages, and that the rails can be laid, as in point of fact they are, over the drainage system underneath. I mention these things to show the state of confusion and danger, both above and below ground, which might result from a decree in the terms of the conclusions of this summons and from an affirmance of the construction of the Acts of Parliament for which the appellants contend.

The argument hinges upon the proposition that the strip of ground is part of a railway and within the exception to private streets in the Burgh Police Acts. I desire to state broadly, in the first place, that I think "part of a railway" is, and was meant to be, part of a railway in fact, and not merely ground, buildings, or the like, which happen to be the property of the railway. It is easy to figure the acquisition of property, say, for suites of offices or other convenient accommodation, possibly in parts of burghs which are not even adjoining the actual railway as it is generally understood. Such property may be acquired under the 38th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and I should hold it to be quite unsound to suggest that the fact of such purchase operated to cut out such ground, buildings, &c., from the municipal jurisdiction of the burgh. But if the

Feb. 27, 1912. ground, buildings, &c., are merely the property of the railway, and do not, in the language of the Act, form part of any harbour, railway, or canal station, &c., then it does not appear to me that the exception which is founded upon has any application.

Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co. v.
Magistrates
of Ayr.

Dunfermline.

I now turn to section 38 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, which permits the Company, in addition to their powers of compulsory taking, privately to purchase a certain limited amount of land "adjoining or near to the railway, or to any other railway communicating therewith, and on which the traffic thereupon may pass, and in any town or city adjoining to or near such railways . . . for the purpose of making convenient roads or ways to the railway, or any other purpose which may be requisite or convenient for the formation or use of the railway." Speaking for myself, I do not entertain any doubt that, instead of the land, which is dealt with in section 38, being treated as land which forms part of the railway, it is, on the contrary, treated as land which is different from the railway, in fact, but is "adjoining or near to the railway" or convenient for the "formation or use of the railway." The railway, in short, is one thing, even as used in that statute, and the land which is the subject of section 38 is another thing, and the Act nowhere provides that the mere acquisition of property by the Company shall thereby operate its conversion into part of the railway.

This might be sufficient to dispose of this case, but I desire to give my adhesion to the view which is set forth in the opinion of the learned Lord President. I do not agree with what was maintained to have been his view, that the Act of 1892 must speak from its date, and that accordingly everything must stand fixed at that period. I do not think that the latter of these propositions is implied in what the learned Lord President said, but I understand his meaning to be, and, if so, I entirely concur in it, that when the Act of Parliament passed it became operative when and as the circumstances arose within the area of the burghal jurisdiction to which its provisions could apply. Land might be laid out subsequent to 1892, and rights of access might be granted, or facts as to public thoroughfares emerge, and, as these things occurred, the provisions of the Act of 1892 could be called into operation. I need not go through the many sections of the statute which show that the Act was meant to have its adaptations to emerging circumstances as I have mentioned; but I find nowhere in the Act any countenance to the suggestion that, apart from the express authority of Parliament, the statutory municipal jurisdiction, once set up, could be thereafter cut down or cut into by the acts of inhabitants or corporations within the burgh. This, however, is precisely what, according to the argument of the appellants, has occurred. Against the will of the respondents the Railway Company have placed down these rails, and they propose to treat and use the road as non-burghal, and to bring about the exclusion of the municipal jurisdiction, together with the confusions and dangers to which I have alluded.

I do not think that there is any sanction for these proceedings on account of the fact that the land has been acquired under section 38 of the Railways Clauses Act, nor do I think the effect of the Railway Company's action is to set up the exception to, and exclusion from, the Burgh Police Acts, as contended for.

In view of this opinion, it is unnecessary for me to refer to the subsidiary parts of the case. I think, for instance, that the case of Stewart v. Greenock Harbour Trustees,¹ in which it was held that the working of locomotive traffic on rails through a public street was so plainly an obstruction to traffic as not to require any evidence to be led upon the subject, was rightly decided. Nor is it needful to make any pronouncement upon the question of whether finality attaches to the action of the Town-Council in forbidding obstructions, that action having been already ratified in foro contentioso. My humble opinion being that the foundation of the appellants' case is unsound, it follows that they had not power, apart from statute, to cut down the burghal jurisdiction, and that they are not entitled to decline to give effect to the Town-Council's resolution for the proper levelling, macadamising, freeing from obstructions, &c., of this road.

I agree in the course proposed, and think that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I agree, and have nothing to add ; and I desire to say that my noble and learned friend Lord Gorell also agrees.

APPEAL dismissed with costs.

Fraud—Contract to construct railway—Alleged fraudulent misdescription of nature of soil—Proof of fraud.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co.

A railway company invited tenders for the construction of a line of railway and, for the information of intending offerers, exhibited what purported to be a journal of bores taken along the proposed line. A firm of contractors to whom that journal had been exhibited tendered for the work, and a lump sum contract was entered into with them for the construction of the railway.

During the progress of the work the contractors discovered that the strata contained more rock or hard substance than they had anticipated, and it ultimately appeared that the so-called journal was not the actual record kept by the borers (who were not professional borers but were ordinary servants of the company), but was compiled by the company's engineer from notes supplied by the borers, and that in several instances he had described strata as soft which the borers had described as hard or rock.

In an action brought by the contractors against the railway company, after the completion of the work, the Second Division of the Court of Session, held, inter alia, that the representations made to the pursuers with regard to the journal of bores were false and fraudulent.

The House of Lords, on appeal, reversed that judgment, holding that the engineer had compiled the journal honestly and to the best of his ability, and had only altered the descriptions given by the borers where he honestly believed these descriptions to be erroneous.

The defenders appealed to the House of Lords.

At delivering judgment on 16th May 1912,—

LORD ATKINSON.—In this case the appellants entered into a contract in writing with the respondents, dated 18th September 1900, for the construction of a certain portion of the appellants' railway, called the Dalry and North Johnstone Railway, about 12 miles in length, and for widening their line between the Dalry and Swinlees Junctions, for a lump sum of £243,690. There were several cuttings to be excavated and embankments to be made in order to form this first mentioned line. One cutting was called the Kilbirnie Cutting, and another the Whirlhill Cutting.

The specification attached to the contract executed by the parties and forming its basis contains the following paragraphs amongst others :—

“ Bores have been put down at various parts of the line, the positions of which are shown on the small scale plan, and a copy of the journals of these bores may be seen at the engineer's office, but the Company does not in any way guarantee their accuracy, or that they will be a guide to the nature of the surrounding strata. Contractors must, therefore, satisfy themselves as to the nature of the strata, as the Company will not hold themselves liable for any claim that may be made against them on account of any inaccuracy in the journals of the bores.

“ Of the probability of rock existing in any of the cuttings or other excavations to a greater extent than the quantity given in the detailed schedule the contractor must judge, and also form his own opinion as to the nature of the strata of the material in the various cuttings or excavations and in the base of the embankments, and price the quantities in the detailed schedule accordingly, as no allowance whatever will be made over the lump sum in the detailed schedule for these, although the material may turn out to be different from what is calculated and given in the detailed schedule.

“ The slopes of all cuttings (except where through solid rock not subject to slip or decay from exposure to the weather) shall be at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ horizontal to 1 vertical, and where through solid rock at the rate of a $\frac{1}{2}$ horizontal to 1 vertical.”

There was a detailed schedule attached to this specification, an important part of which is as follows :—

"Cuttings.

May 16, 1912.

"Between peg 1 and peg 5, on up line side,	soft.
" " 1 " " 5, do.,	broken or loose rock.
" " 6 " " 13, do.,	soft.
" " 13 " " 15, do.,	do.
" " 45 " " 67,	soft.
" " 45 " " 67,	solid rock.
" " 67 " " 87,	soft.
" " 67 " " 87,	broken or loose rock."

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co.
Ld. Atkinson.

and so on ; with a note at the top to the following effect :—

"Note.—The particular attention of intending contractors is directed to the specification in regard to the following matters :—

"The probability of slips in cuttings and embankments and sites of embankments.

"The probability of more or less rock or soft material having to be excavated, as no allowance will be made should the material turn out to be different from what is calculated and given in the schedule."

Boring had been carried on before the contract was entered into by persons named Cowan, father and sons, and the journals mentioned in these paragraphs of the specification referred to the daily records of those operations supplied, or supposed to have been supplied, to the appellants. In point of fact no journals, properly so called, of these borings were regularly kept ; but letters were written to one Mr Melville or his assistant by these borers, and of these a compilation was made in the office of the engineers of the Company from the information received, purporting to record correctly the result of the work. A copy of this document, the so-called journal of bores, the contractors were permitted to peruse and examine before they entered into this contract. It is only necessary to deal with the items contained in it in which the words "black blaes" occur. They run as follows :—

	Feet	Inches
" Bore No. 7. At peg 54 + 184 feet,—
Blue clay and stones,	13	0
Hard black blaes,	11	0

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co.
Ld. Atkinson.

Now, it is alleged in this action that the plaintiffs were induced to enter into this contract by the fraud of one William G. Melville, the Company's engineer-in-chief, a man of position and experience. The charge resolved itself in argument into this,—that Melville had put into this compilation of the reports of the borers certain statements which he knew to be false, or statements, false in fact, which he recklessly inserted as being true, not knowing whether they were true or false; that these statements were intended by him to deceive, and did deceive, the plaintiffs, who acted upon them. No more serious charge could well be made, and no motive which will bear examination was suggested why Melville should be guilty of it. It was not disputed that these statements, if fraudulently made, were intended to deceive the respondents, and did in fact deceive them. The only question, however, for your Lordships' decision in the present appeal is this: Has this charge of fraud been proved by the respondents—on whom the burden of proving it by reliable evidence most unquestionably lay—or has it not?

It is the more necessary for me to insist upon this point, inasmuch as it appears to me that questions have been rather mixed up together in the Courts in Scotland which ought to have been kept entirely separate. It may well be that, under the contract entered into, Melville owed a duty to the contractors to prepare this journal of bores with reasonable skill, care, and accuracy, or that a term was by implication introduced into the contract to the effect that the Company should appoint, or had appointed, to do the work of boring, skilled persons, fully competent for that work, or again, that the documents submitted to the contractors for perusal should reasonably answer the description of a journal of bores, or further, that the Company warranted that this compilation was correct, or the borers highly skilled; and that an action or several actions against the Company for the breach of one or all of these warranties or contractual obligations would, on the evidence given at this trial, have been sustained. But in my view these matters, so far as they are not proof of Melville's fraud, are wholly irrelevant to the only issue decided upon by the Second Division of the Court of Session from which this appeal has been taken. I accordingly have not formed, and do not express, any opinion upon any of these matters.

According to the specification, only three descriptions of material were to be excavated, namely, solid rock, broken or loose rock, and soft.

Everything which might be met with was treated as falling within this classification. Whatever was not solid rock, or broken or loose rock, was, for the purpose of the contract, to be treated as soft, whatever might be found in the result to be its consistency or composition.

Now, in the borings at bore holes Nos. 7, 8, 8A, and 9, which between them extended over a considerable distance, as well as at those numbered 53, 54, and 55, a substance was stated in the journal of bores to have been found which was described as "black blaes" or "hard black blaes," not as rock, whether solid, broken, or loose. Blaes is another name for shale.

There was a considerable depth of it represented to have been found—at No. 7, 11 feet of it in thickness; at No. 8, 8 feet; at No. 8A, 8 feet 5 inches; and at No. 9, 8 feet respectively. And at Nos. 53, 54, and 55 May 16, 1912. considerable quantities also.

Now, the fraud alleged to have been committed by Melville narrows itself, as I understand it, into this, that this substance which he styled "black blaes" was reported to him at first in three instances as "black ban" or "hard black ban" and, in the case of five test bores subsequently made, as rock, and that he either deliberately misdescribed it in this compilation in terms which would imply that it was not rock, but soft within the meaning of the contract, or, knowing nothing about the actual composition or consistency of the substance found, he recklessly stated it was black blaes, not knowing whether it was so or not. It is conceded that this compilation, purporting to record the information received from the borers, was made by Melville before tenders were asked for, and therefore before he could have known who might be the contractors. The fraud, if designed at all, must have been designed to entrap and deceive whoever might be the future contractor.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co.
Ld. Atkinson.

The evidence mainly relied upon in support of this charge consists of letters which passed between the borers and Melville or his assistant, Mr Macpherson, between the middle of October 1898 and the 8th of November following. It is admitted they formed an important portion of the material on which Melville's compilation was made. The letter of the 14th of October 1898 refers to bore No. 7. In it the borers state: "A bore has been put down to the depth of 24 feet (the full distance it was to go down) at about 15 feet from the peg on Dalry side. For the first 13 feet it was blue clay and stones, and after that a hard black substance called 'black ban,' but I do not know if this is the proper name for it." On the 18th October 1898 the borers wrote as to bore 8: "The bore at peg 8 has been put down to the depth of 25 feet, the first 16 feet through clay and remainder 'black band,' except the last foot which is freestone." And on the same day they write as to bore No. 9: "The bore at peg No. 9 has been put down the full depth of 20 feet through clay for 12 feet and 8 feet of 'black band.'" Now after the receipt of these three letters Mr Macpherson, on the 19th, by Mr Melville's directions, wrote to the borers a letter containing the following passage: "I should like you to send me a sample of the substance called 'black ban' so that I may see what it is like. You will probably get it again in the bore the men are now at, and a sample from it would do." On the following day, the 20th October, the borers wrote to Mr Macpherson: "Yours of 19th inst., I have to-night sent you a small parcel containing a sample of the substance designated 'black ban.' The most of it has been churned into the consistency of clay through the working of the chisels in the hole; but there are some chips amongst it which will give you an idea of what kind of stuff it is." Mr Macpherson received this sample, and he, in consultation with Mr Melville, determined to put down additional bores to test the matter further. Mr Macpherson accordingly wrote on the 21st of October to John Cowan, the borer, thus: "Dear Sir,—I have received your letter of 20th inst., and also the sample of the material 'black ban' from the bores. I will visit the borers this afternoon and point out to them the position of other two bores that I wish them to put down." The sites of these two new bores

May 16, 1912. subsequently fixed by Macpherson were in the neighbourhood of No. 9. They were accordingly put down, and on the 3rd of November the borer wrote to Mr Melville: "We have put down other two bores at above peg" (i.e., peg 9), "one 5 yards and the other 15 yards from the peg. The first named sunk 13 feet, rock being struck at depth of 11 feet, and the latter sunk 14 feet, rock being struck at 13 feet down." On the 4th of November the borer again wrote as to bore 9. "Another bore has been put down 13 yards on the Glasgow side of peg No. 9 to the depth of 17 feet. Hard substance was struck at depth of 12 feet, and what appears to be rock was struck at depth of 16 feet." A fourth test bore was for greater certainty put down at bore peg No. 7, and in reference to it the borer, on the 8th of November 1898, writes to Mr Melville: "The above bore has been sunk to the depth of about 26½ feet through about 15 feet of clay and remainder whinstone rock. This completes the bores which were pointed out to be done, and the borers are withdrawn to-night." Now, Mr Melville deposed that he, in company with his assistant, Mr Macpherson, carefully considered the reports of the borers touching all these borings; that they thought the word "whinstone" in the last letter was a clerical error of the clerk, the writer, as they were of opinion, which the result proved to be correct, that there was no whinstone rock there. He further deposed that they had before them the records of all the other bores from Nos. 7 to 12; that they considered these individually and collectively; that they examined the sample of "black ban" sent to them; that they studied the lie and configuration of the ground; that they knew the time which the borers had spent at the test bore near No. 7, and judged that it would be impossible for them to have sunk through 11 feet of whinstone rock in that time, and that, after careful consideration of all these materials, they came honestly, and to the best of their skill and judgment, to the conclusion that the "black ban" or "hard black ban" and "rock" respectively reported to have been found in these borings was "black blaes," not rock at all within the meaning of the contract, but a substance which should be treated as soft, and that they made the compilation on that basis. Mr Macpherson, by Mr Melville's directions, recorded their decision on the point in the note now appearing on the borer's letters 1st to 3rd and 8th and 9th November 1898 respectively. On the former group the note ran thus: "What is called rock in this letter must have been black blaes, see former letter 18/10/98," and on the latter thus: "Keep to first report of this bore, as the rock here referred to must be the 'black blaes' of 14/10/98."

It may be that Mr Melville and his assistant came too hastily to a conclusion, and that they ought to have had further test borings made; that they ought to have called in at this stage a scientific borer who could give precise and reliable information as to the nature and consistency of the substances he might meet with in his operations. That may all be so, though I think it is not so; but that is not the point. The point is this: Are Melville and Macpherson swearing falsely when they state on oath, as they have stated, that they considered carefully in detail and collectively the several matters they have mentioned, and on the data before them honestly and to the best of their skill and knowledge came to the conclusion that the substance designated "black ban" and "rock" by the borers was in fact "black blaes"? If they have sworn truly there is, in my view, an May 16, 1912.

The information which boring reveals must always rest more or less upon opinion, not upon demonstration. No contractor could expect that the reports of the borers should, even in a case of doubt, be verified in works such as these by excavating at the site of the bore down from the surface to the proposed formation level of the line. It may be that the wiser and the more prudent thing for Mr Melville to have done in the circumstances would have been to have recorded the information he received from the borers precisely as he had received it, and then have appended a note of his own to the effect that, in his opinion, the borer was in error, that "black ban" was "black blaes," or "shale," and that the rock reported to have been found in the test bores at or near bore pegs 7 and 9 was, in his opinion, also "black blaes." Again, it may well be that the data upon which Mr Melville proceeded to form a judgment, were to some degree insufficient, even in the case of one of his skill and experience, but if he honestly thought they were sufficient, and, after full consideration, honestly came to the conclusion that the borer was mistaken in his description of the substances he had found, and that the description which he (Melville) inserted in the document was the true description, and further, inserted that description with the object of giving what was, in his opinion, true information, deliberate lying is, in my view, not only out of the case, but every element which renders recklessness in statement equivalent to lying, is absent from it as well. The well-known passage from Lord Herschell's judgment in Derry v. Peek,¹ was cited by Lord Ardwall. It runs thus:—"First, in order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved where it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made."

If there be any truth in the evidence of Messrs Melville and Macpherson, "carelessness of whether the description of these substances was true or false," the absence of an honest belief "that their description was a true and accurate description," and the making of a statement as true of that which was, in fact, false, "without knowing whether it was true or false," are all negatived.

Much was sought to be made of the fact that Mr Melville did not employ professional borers as it was contended he should have done. It may be, as I have already said, that there was an implied term in the contract that May 16, 1912. none but professional borers, or at all events competent borers, had been employed, and that the Cowans were, in fact, not competent borers, though he thought them to be so. They certainly were not professional borers, but I can discover no evidence whatever to lead legitimately to the conclusion to which Lord Ardwall, at p. 632 of the printed case, states he has come, namely, that the appellants, which in this matter means Melville and his assistants, knew the Cowans were not competent to do this kind of boring, and did not rely upon them as being competent.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western

Ld. Atkinson.

The passage in his judgment runs thus: "In the next place, it is clear that the defenders' engineer did not rely on them. If he had done so he would not have altered their reports when he came to make up what he called the journal of bores, or treated the statements in their letters with the absolute disregard which he did. On this part of the case I think it is clearly proved that the persons who took the bores were not competent to do so, and in the next place, that the defenders knew they were not competent to do so, and did not rely on them as being competent, and yet, in that state of matters, they referred to a journal of bores as if it had been taken by competent men in whom they had confidence, and had been written up by them day by day from their personal observation. All this, in my opinion, constituted fraud."

Before referring to the evidence of Mr Melville as to his belief in the competency of the Cowans, it is well to point out that what the contractor is interested in, in cases such as this, is the accuracy and reliability of the information afforded by the journal of bores rather than the professional qualifications of the borers. If the information be accurate and reliable, that is what concerns him most. For instance, if an action were brought for breach of warranty or deceit for employing non-professional or even incompetent borers, and yet the information as recorded was accurate, then nothing beyond nominal damages could be recovered, because no damage beyond that would have been sustained. Now Melville's evidence as to the Cowans is this. He states (p. 227 and 229) that in January 1898 he instructed his resident engineer to arrange with William Cowan, now dead, to put down bores on the line; that he showed Macpherson where to put them down; that his instructions were to go down below the surface level to the depth of the formation level of the railway line unless they met rock; to work into the rock when they found it for one foot and then to stop; that this was in accordance with the practice he had invariably followed in making bores for railways, namely, to probe the clay or soft material until the borer got to the rock; that this man had not great experience any further than putting down bores such as these; that he was not a qualified mineral borer; that he had carried out any boring of this description he (Melville) wanted done; that he relied upon the accounts he got from William Cowan; that he had regularly dealt with Cowan as an honest and reliable borer, and that he had never any fault to find with his bores; that he (Cowan) was in the habit of making bores for parliamentary purposes and bores for probings; and that he never had occasion at any time to doubt his (Cowan's) honesty, competency, or capacity. As to John Cowan, he (Melville) says that John Cowan succeeded his father as superintendent of the permanent way; that he had been in the service of the railway company for a good number of years before his father's death. At May 16, 1912. page 279, he states that Brown, a professional borer, made mistakes on two occasions upon which he had employed him; that all borers occasionally make misleading bores; that Cowan had only done what is called surface boring, i.e., probing to get the rock, that that was all his experience.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western Railway Co.

Mr Macpherson, at page 352, states that William and his son John made the bores for them in 1896; that the son William Cowan junior was the leading hand; that these two sons who had thus worked with their father put down fifteen bores after their father's death; and that Brown, a professional borer, who was also employed, put down forty-seven bores. I altogether fail to find in this statement any evidence to the effect that Mr Melville knew the Cowans, father and sons, were not competent borers for this kind of work, or that he did not rely upon the statements in their letters, or that he treated those letters with absolute disregard.

Ld. Atkinson.

The fact that he, to the best of his skill and judgment, correctly described the substance he honestly thought the borers had misdescribed, is the only foundation I can find for Lord Ardwall's statement that he (Melville) treated the statements in the borer's letters "with absolute disregard." In my opinion it is, with all respect, a wholly insufficient foundation for the purpose.

The peculiarity of this case, moreover, is this, that Melville was, as proved by the result, right to a great degree in the conclusion to which he came. The stuff excavated at bore holes from 7 to 9 inclusive was, to a considerable extent, "black blaes." Some of it hard, no doubt, possibly as hard as rock, but the stratification at that portion of the line was proved to be "troubled," as it was styled, and strata of rock ran through the masses of blaes. Robert Forrest, speaking of the blaes excavated at bore 7, says,— "Some of the blaes may be soft, some hard, but at No. 7 bore, where it was represented that there were 13 feet of clay and 11 feet of blaes, there were bands of rock and bands of clay-band ironstone through the blaes." And Mr Melville, at page 260, says at this time (July 1902),—"Mr Forrest told me that he was being pressed financially, and that the bank were troubling him. It would have been a serious matter for the Company if the work had been stopped. I found there were posts of rock mixed with the blaes which had been shown in the bores. I told Mr Forrest at this time that the only thing I could recommend to assist him was that seeing so many posts of rock had turned up out of this blaes which were not shown in the bores, I would recommend consideration of paying him the rock price for the blaes . . . I spoke to Mr Cooper and recommended him to do this, and he told me to do it." A new line was accordingly drawn on the plans indicating the upper surface of the blaes, and as the result Forrest was paid at rock prices, 4s. 6d. per cubic yard for the 60,656 yards of blaes which he excavated (over £14,000).

Mr Melville insists that this was a concession which, according to the strict terms of the contract, his Company were in no way bound to make; that in contracts for railway construction such as this, blaes or shale, owing to its friable nature, and tendency to split, disintegrate, and slip when exposed to the weather, is not treated as rock "solid, broken, or loose," but that it comes properly under the description of the only other

May 16, 1912. kind of substance contemplated by this contract, namely, "soft"; that in such matters the test is, not so much the consistency of the substance itself, as the batter at which the slopes of the cuttings can be allowed to stand; and that shale slopes, no matter how hard the consistency of the shale, cannot be allowed to stand at the batter of "solid rock, not liable to split or decay from exposure to the weather," as provided in the specification. He further states that from the so-called journal of bores, plans, and sections, it was plain to any contractor that this was contemplated under the terms of the contract. Four expert engineers—presumably from the description given of them, persons of position and standing in their profession—who examined the completed cuttings on the line, were examined at the trial. They supported Mr Melville in every one of these propositions. The general result of their evidence, as I read it, is this, that blaes, whether hard or soft, or with layers or strata of rock interspersed, or stones embedded in it, is properly treated as "soft"; that any contractor of experience who examined the plans, sections, and so-called journal of bores, must have seen that it was so treated in this case, and that, as far as they can now judge from an examination of cuttings, the record of the bores (they ran along the middle line of the cutting) was extremely accurate. One of these gentlemen, Mr Charles Pullar Hogg, stated that some engineers allow rock prices for excavating blaes if it requires to be blasted, but that this is quite exceptional. They all agree that this blaes, though interspersed with rock, could be dug out with a steam navvy of proper strength and power, the more easily, too, one of them thought, from the fact of its being traversed by strata of rock, as that renders the mass more friable. They concur with Melville in thinking that the slopes of some of the cuttings through the blaes have been left at too steep a batter; and one of them, Mr Hall Blyth, in cross-examination, on being asked this question in reference to bores 7 and 9,—“Don't you think that if the engineer had taken the borers' reports as they were given to him and had not put a construction upon them, the schedule would have been different as regards its quantities and as regards the conclusions of what was true hard and soft?” answered, “No, I think the bores show with absolute accuracy the nature of the strata in the cuttings.” And on re-examination he stated,—“Mr Melville got his report of black ban on the 14th of October, and he asked for and got a sample on the 20th of October. That is what I would have done. Assuming there was black ban in two bores, a sample from either of them would have been quite sufficient to enable me to determine what it was, and I would act upon that. When he came to the rock in November, by that time he had several bores before him, and was able to judge of the general nature of the line. Being the engineer for the railway there I agree that he must have personal knowledge that I, as an outsider, could not have.” All these gentlemen were cross-examined at length, but their evidence was unshaken.

As a matter of fact Cowan had proved that the substance, a sample of which was sent, was the same as that first found. More of the so-called posts of rock were, no doubt, found in this blaes formation than was anticipated, but the error may possibly be accounted for, without imputing fraud to the engineer or incompetence to the borer, in this way, namely, that in the earlier borings black blaes was struck, and in the May 16, 1912. test bores the sites of which were some distance from the others, some of these posts of rock were struck. That may be the true explanation. I cannot but think, moreover that Mr Melville has been most unfairly treated in respect of two other matters:—First, instead of giving him credit for the two considerations which he says induced him to pay for the excavation of this blaes as if it were rock, namely, (1) that he wished to save his company from the inconvenience of having their work stopped, and (2) his desire to come to the aid of the respondents in their financial difficulties, due to the extra expense they had to incur, the suggestion was made that his advice to his company to abandon their strict rights and treat the respondents generously was due to the qualms of a guilty conscience. And second, in endeavouring to twist some answers he gave in part of his cross-examination, in which the word “guess” was used by counsel into an admission of recklessness in his preparation of the so-called journal of bores. The following questions were put to him in these words: “What was the true justification in your mind for assuming that it was black blaes of the same kind as you had reported to you under the name of ‘black ban’ on the 18th of October 1898? (A.) I took it to be the same material. (Q.) Was it just a guess? (A.) There is a good deal of guessing in all boring. (Q.) Don’t you think with such doubts as these that it would have been only right to have got these bores confirmed by efficient people? (A.) As the bores have turned out they have come out correct. (Q.) Don’t you think it would have been right with such results to have got his bores properly confirmed or corrected by competent people? (A.) No, I considered that I had people quite competent to do boring such as this.” It is quite obvious that the forming of a conclusion on the results afforded by boring must in the very nature of things involve a certain element of conjecture, that until the excavation is actually carried out there cannot be absolute certainty, and that this was all Melville meant to say.

The respondents were both examined, and the result of their evidence is this. They say that out of sixty-two bores altogether twenty-two were wrong. They gave the description of what was found at bore 7. There were, they say, bands of ironstone, bands of freestone, and blaes. At No. 8, Robert Forrest states the information given to him was 16 feet of clay, 8 feet of black blaes, and 15 feet of freestone. This latter is wholly wrong, it was only one foot of freestone, and what they found was 13 ft. 6 in. of clay and 25 ft. 6 in. of hard rock which required to be blasted. At 8a the journal gave 14 ft. 0 in. of blue clay and 5 ft. 5 in. black blaes, 19 ft. 5 in. in all. He said he found 25 ft. 5 in. of rock with blaes in between the rock but no continuous blaes. And at No. 9 the information he got was 12 feet of clay and 8 feet of black blaes, but what he found was 8 feet of clay and 12 feet of rock. These are the bores about which there is such controversy. The respondents deal with the remainder of the twenty-two similarly, but it is clear, from the evidence, that they consider that nothing which requires to be blasted, or which cannot be taken out with a steam navvy should be treated as soft. That is their test; it is not, however, the test provided by the contract.

May 16, 1912. The rest of the evidence given on behalf of the respondents has, I think, no material bearing on Melville's alleged fraud.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western

Ld. Atkinson.

Lord Johnston, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Dundas, appear to acquit Mr Melville of intentional deceit or fraud. The first named of these learned Judges states his view that the compilation of the journal of the bores was false in fact and made with a recklessness which amounts to fraud, the absence of intentional dishonesty being supplied by the presence of a reckless disregard of the interests of the opposite contracting party where these interests must have been or must be held to have been known to be materially affected by the act in question.

The Lord Justice-Clerk states the conclusion to which he has come in these words:—"I come to the conclusion, on this part of the case, that the defenders acted with culpable recklessness; that they deceived the pursuers into accepting as properly obtained data from bores data obtained from persons known to them to be incompetent, and that they further deceived the pursuers by putting before them as facts representations as to bores which they did not receive from the borers, presenting their own inferences of what they thought the borers should have said in describing strata. . . . I agree with the Lord Ordinary in not imputing direct mala fides to Mr Melville. But most unfortunately, he did what he had no right to do, ordered to be written down as being the facts ascertained by the borer something essentially different from what the borer reported. I have no doubt that he thought he was drawing a sound inference, but he must have known that he was putting forward his inference and passing it off as ascertained fact stated by the borer, which it was not. I cannot acquit him of legal fraud in doing so." Well, if Melville thought he was "drawing a sound inference" it is difficult to see how he was guilty of recklessly asserting as true that of which he did not know whether it was true or false, but that is the very essence of what the learned Judge meant to designate as legal fraud.

I am not quite sure whether Lord Ardwall was of opinion that Mr Melville was guilty of deliberate fraud or not. From the following passage in his judgment it would appear to me somewhat doubtful. He expresses himself thus:—"I am of opinion that a false and fraudulent representation was made to the pursuers, inasmuch as it was represented to them that the schedule of quantities, the plans, and the sections were founded on a genuine and honest journal of bores, whereas they were not. That this representation was knowingly made does not admit of a moment's doubt. I have already examined the evidence on the point, and need not go into it again. Mr Melville's own evidence, which I have already referred to, is sufficient to show that he knew perfectly well that the so-called journal of bores was not a genuine journal of bores in any sense of the term, and that it was not made by responsible or competent borers. It goes without saying that the false representations were made without belief in their truth."

With the greatest respect for each of those learned Judges, I find myself wholly unable to take their view of the result of the evidence. To my mind it appears clear that Mr Melville honestly thought he was stating in the journal of bores the information in fact conveyed to him by the borers, and that the change he made in the entry was made for the very purpose of correcting what he honestly believed to be their misdescription of the substance actually found, so that the journal should set forth the absolute truth. For the reason I have already given, I think that so far from not knowing or caring whether the statements contained in the journal were true or false, he was anxious to state the truth, and took such means as he honestly considered sufficient for the very purpose of ascertaining what the truth was so that he might set it forth with accuracy.

Boyd &
Forrest v.
Glasgow and So.-Western

Ld. Atkinson.

It would be a strange way of showing good faith to state the information he received as if he believed it to be true when he, in fact, thought the borers were in error, and yet abstain from correcting their error. I do not think that Mr Melville acted recklessly in any reasonable sense of the word; and am therefore of opinion that the respondents failed to prove that he was guilty of fraud of any kind towards them. Accordingly, I think their case fails upon this point, and that this appeal should be allowed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion which has just been delivered, and I entirely agree.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I agree with the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson. The only point argued at your Lordships' bar was whether Mr Melville, the engineer of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company was guilty of fraud inducing this contract. My noble and learned friend has explained the circumstances. In agreeing with him I only desire to add this. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Johnston) say that he acquits Mr Melville of intentional fraud. But he adds,—“I cannot acquit him of such recklessness as aequiparatur dolo.” The learned Judge also speaks of Mr Melville's “attempts to throw over his subordinates”—of his “not being very successful in his explanations”—of “the very specious persuasions of Mr Melville,” and, in short, language is used in the judgment which, by any man with a regard for his own reputation as an engineer or character as a man, must be regarded as most serious. I content myself with saying that not one of these expressions appears to me to have been justified by the testimony or the conduct of Mr Melville.

Of the charge of fraud preferred against him by the pursuers, it is not for me to pronounce whether it was unscrupulously made; it is sufficient that it is unfounded in fact. I think that the attempt to bring Mr Melville's conduct into the same range as to be equal to fraud also fails; that the plea of fraud is as entirely devoid of legal as it is of ethical warrant.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I agree. The question is one of fraud which imports dishonesty, and that has not been established.

I concur also with my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson in not expressing any opinion upon other matters that may or may not be open for litigation and decision between the parties.

Johnstone v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

—Mercer.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Provision to widow of "liferent use and enjoyment" of house—Liferent or occupancy—Incidence of burdens and rates—Fee and Liferent.

A testator directed his trustees on his death to give to his widow the "liferent use and enjoyment" of his house, to pay her an annuity, to set aside a certain sum to provide for the same, to distribute the residue of his estate between his widow and his brothers, and on the death of his widow to divide the price of the house and the annuity fund, with any surplus revenue accrued thereon, among his brothers. Power was given to the trustees to sell the house, with the consent of the widow, and thereafter to pay her the annual income of the price during her life.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the interest of the widow in the house was a liferent and not a mere right of occupancy, and accordingly that the feu-duty, proprietor's taxes, and landlord's repairs fell to be paid by her and not by the trustees.

(IN the Court of Session, 23rd December 1910—1911 S. C. 321.)

The defenders appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 14th and 15th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The widow was a liferentrix and not a mere occupant, and was accordingly bound to pay feu-duty, proprietor's taxes, and landlord's repairs. That these burdens fell to be borne by an ordinary liferenter under the law of Scotland was indisputable.¹ The fact that the liferent was not a gift direct but was a gift conveyed through the medium of a trust was immaterial²; and the question of who was ultimately liable to bear such burdens did not depend upon the question of who was feudally vested in the property.³ It was really a question of the intention of the testator. There was nothing in the settlement to suggest that the testator intended to take the case out of the ordinary rule. The words "liferent use" and "liferent use and enjoyment" were, and had always been, the ordinary terms by which conveyancers in Scotland described the rights of a liferenter.¹ The direction that the residue was to be distributed at the testator's death, without any provision of a fund to meet the burdens, indicated his intention that the liferentrix was to bear the burdens; and the same inference was deducible from the fact that, if the house was sold, as it might be, by the trustees with the widow's consent, the purchase price, the annual income of which she obtained as a surrogatum, would be a price realised on the footing that the charges now in question were on the debit side of the property account as a revenue-yielding subject. Moreover, the testator declared the liferent provision to be for her alimentary use and not assignable or affectable by creditors. Such a declaration would be meaningless if the right possessed by her were a mere right of occupancy and not a proper liferent. It was said, however, that the authorities were against the appellants' contention. That was not the case. In *Clark v. Clark and Others*² the testator gave his widow "the use of my house." The word "liferent" was not used, and it was plain that all that she had was a mere right of personally occupying the house which from first to last remained merged in the residue of the estate. In *Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger*³ the widow was given, as here, the liferent use and enjoyment of the house and was a proper liferentrix, who would have been held bound to bear the burdens had it not been expressly provided by the settlement that the use was to be "free of rent, feu-duty, ground annual, taxes, and all other deductions." In *Bayne's Trustees v. Bayne*⁴ as in *Clark*² the residue was to remain in the hands of the trustees until the death of the widow, and the word "liferent" was not used in the gift itself but only afterwards in the settlement when the gift was again referred to, and the Court evidently regarded the case as one of occupancy. The case of *Cathcart's Trustees v. Allardice*⁵ was based upon a misapprehension of the previous decisions and was wrongly decided. *Smart's Trustee v. Smart's Trustees*⁶ followed the decision of the Second Division in the present case and was not, consequently, of independent value. Further, the respondent was barred from seeking relief by having paid the burdens for so many years, and by having consented to the distribution of the estate. In any event the burdens fell to be discharged out of the residue of the estate and not out of the surplus revenue accrued upon the annuity fund.

Argued for the respondent;—The widow was merely the occupant of the house, and as such was not liable for the burdens. Admittedly a proper liferenter was liable for such burdens, but a testamentary provision such as that now in question was not a proper liferent. It was quite distinct from the ordinary heritable right of liferent.⁷ In the present case the trustees, as the registered owners of the property, were liable primo loco for rates and burdens, and in order to throw the burden on to the widow they would have to show that under the

July 26, 1912. trust-settlement they had a right of relief against her. The settlement indicated no such intention; on the contrary, it simply directed the trustees to give her the use and enjoyment of the house. Under the settlement she had not the ordinary power of a liferenter to let the subjects liferented, because the truster expressly declared that the provisions were alimentary and not assignable. It was not denied that the words in the present settlement, if occurring in a gift inter vivos, would have made the donee the heritable proprietor in liferent, or that it was possible to frame a trust in such a way that it could only be carried out by the trustees divesting themselves of the liferent; but neither of these contingencies was present here. Further, the present case was directly ruled by a series of decisions¹ extending over forty years. Even if these cases had been wrongly decided, they had led to a generally recognised meaning being given in Scotland to such a testamentary direction as the present, and it must be presumed that it was this generally recognised meaning that the testator had in his mind. These considerations had been given effect to in the recent case of Smart's Trustees v. Smart.² The direction to the trustees to distribute the residue was really immaterial, because residue obviously meant residue after payment of liabilities of every kind whether expressly mentioned or not. The burdens here, however, were covered by the expression "expenses of executing the trust."³ But, in any event, the surplus revenue of the £20,000 afforded appropriate means for discharging the truster's liability. The case depended solely on Scottish law, which in this matter differed from the law of England.⁴

At delivering judgment on 26th July 1912,—

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—By the trust-settlement of the late James Whitelaw Mackenzie he provided "(Second) That my trustees shall give to my said wife in the event of her surviving me, during all the days of her life, the liferent use and enjoyment of my dwelling-house, number nine Glencairn Crescent, Edinburgh, or of such other house as shall at the time of my death be my residence in Edinburgh, and belong to me, together with the whole household furniture and plenishing therein at the time of my death, including books, pictures, linen, china, plate, plated articles, and others, without however any obligation upon her to replace articles broken, or perishing with the using; and in the event of the said dwelling-house and the whole or any part of said household furniture and plenishing being sold by my trustees, as they are hereby with consent of my said wife empowered to do, they shall pay to her the annual income of the price or prices obtained therefor during all the days of her life: Declaring that the said liferent provisions shall be for the alimentary use of my said wife, and shall not be assignable by her or affectable by the diligence of her creditors."

and landlord's repairs on this house, 9 Glencairn Crescent, Edinburgh.

The expression "my trustees shall give to my said wife in the event of her surviving me during all the days of her life the liferent use and enjoyment of my dwelling-house," is, as was admitted at your Lordships' bar, a direction in terms which are perfectly apt to give a liferent in the ordinary sense. Even if the question were one of feudal conveyancing, the expression "the liferent use and enjoyment" would appear to be language suitable to express the constitution of a liferent. But, occurring as they do in the course of an ordinary trust-settlement, these words are adopted as language familiar for generations in Scotland and used in setting up a liferent. As we were informed at the bar, they so occur in the Juridical Styles from its earliest edition. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

The consequences which attach to such a liferent are also familiar. The subject must be enjoyed salva rei substantia. Upon the point of annual charges (on the hypothesis that what is really a liferent has been given) there is little ground for dispute. In the language of Erskine (ii. 9, 61), "Liferenters, as they are entitled to the profits, must also bear the burdens attending the subject liferented; as taxations, duties payable to the superior, ministers' stipends, and the other yearly payments chargeable on the lands, which may fall due during the liferent." Mr More in his Notes to Stair (ccxv.), puts the proposition simply:—"The liferenter is bound to pay all the annual and ordinary burdens which are exigible from the property liferented by him." And in Mr Guthrie's edition of Bell's Principles, section 1061, the language employed is, "The right of the liferenter" (on which the learned editor, Mr Guthrie, interpolates the parenthesis "unless exempted by the terms of the grant") "is subject to the burden of the public taxes, feu-duties, minister's stipend, &c., during the liferent." An old Report of Fountainhall (3 Brown's Supplement to Morison, p. 33) refers learnedly to the corpus juris upon the subject, and with some quaintness sums up:—"And, really, it cannot be thought rational, that the fiar shall bear the burdens imposed intuitu of land, whereof he is not in possession, but debarred by liferenters. Natural equity provides, ut eum sequantur incommoda qui habet commoda; they who reap the emolument ought not to grudge onus ei annexum." I have only cited these authorities because of a somewhat full argument presented to your Lordships' House, which appeared at times to suggest that there was doubt in the law of Scotland on the subject of the liferenter's liability. That doubt is without warrant.

Nor does it appear to me that there is any foundation for the proposition that the obligations of a liferenter are less or more according as the liferent is a gift direct or is a gift conveyed through the interposition of a trust. There is no decision which sanctions such a distinction. There seems nothing in the form in which the right is conveyed which should alter the obligations attached to the gift; and I do not see my way to hold that considerations as to the possibility, or otherwise, of the liferent being feudalised by infeftment have any bearing upon the topic under consideration. None of the Judges in the Courts below took such things into account.

The true and only question is whether a liferent right, to which the July 26, 1912. obligations that I have mentioned would undoubtedly attach, has been here created, or whether, on the contrary, what Mr Mackenzie conferred upon his wife was not a liferent, but a mere right of occupancy of his house. The respondent maintains that it was the latter. In support of that view she appeals with much force to the series of cases enumerated in the opinion of the learned Lord Ordinary.

Johnstone v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

One of these cases may be at once put on one side. I refer to the case of Rodger.¹ In that case the truster in terms directed and appointed that his widow should "have the liferent use and enjoyment of the house in which I reside at the time of my death, free of rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." The question, accordingly, of whether the liferentrix stood free of these annual burdens was not left—as unfortunately conveyancers in Scotland have too frequently left it—to be determined by implication or inference, but was settled in express terms by the language of the trust-deed.

In the case of *Clark*² trustees were directed by a testator to give his widow "the use of my house, No. 36 Drummond Place, with the whole furniture and effects contained therein," so long as she remained his widow. The words employed, namely, "the use of my house," were not those usual in the constitution of a liferent. The residue of the estate was not divisible until the widow's death. Lord President Inglis held that "there can be no doubt that the widow, as a mere occupant of the house, has nothing to do with the payment of the feu-duty; and as to the repairs of the house, I do not see what a mere occupant has to do with them either." The case was peculiar in this respect, that the main point of contention seems to have been as to whether the widow was even liable for tenant's taxes, it being maintained that the true tenants were the trustees themselves. This contention was set aside, and the Court held that the widow was liable in tenant's taxes as occupant, but that, upon a construction of the special terms of the trust-deed, her position stopped at occupancy and did not rise to the level of a liferent. As I say, the language of the deed, which was merely to give her the use of the house so long as she remained his widow, was no doubt taken in connection with the fact that the trustees were charged with keeping up the trust, the division of the residue being postponed until the widow's death.

I agree with the learned Lord Ordinary in attaching importance to this latter circumstance. It humbly appears to me that, in regard to the question of the incidence and disbursement of charges as charges upon the estate of a trust, it is a consideration of weight that the annual administration is continued and the residue left in hand. On the other hand, it is a cogent consideration in favour of the opposite view, that the residue is in fact distributed and the fund available for disbursements of trust charges is gone. In this latter case it appears to be not an unfair or improper inference that the testator's meaning was that the annual charges referred to should fall to be borne by the person liferented in the property on which they fall.

In the later case of *Bayne*³ a testator directed his trustees "to make over to" Miss Duckworth "the house at present occupied by me at Craig-view aforesaid, together with the whole furniture, &c., therein, and that July 26, 1912. during all the days of her natural life, and so long as she shall not enter into any marriage after my decease." It will be observed that the word "liferent," although occurring in other parts of the settlement, is not used in the destination itself, nor is the expression employed "liferent use and enjoyment." Lord Young expressed doubts as to the decision, and his leaning to the view "that as the widow gets the whole benefit of the house—not merely to occupy it, but to let it if she pleases—the whole costs and charges connected with it should fall on herself." This doubt seems entirely in line with the institutional and other authorities which I have cited. But the Second Division held that the case was ruled by Clark.¹ It is plain that there was considerable difference in the expressions used in the respective deeds. In this case also, as in the case of Clark,¹ the residue only became payable at the death of the liferentrix.

Matters, however, advanced a distinct stage further in the case of Cathcart,² where, by an antenuptial contract of marriage, the husband conveyed to his wife "the liferent use of any one house he may die possessed of." He died, survived by his wife, and possessed of one house only, and this was burdened to the extent of over two-thirds of its value. It was held that the wife was not liable for the burdens and the landlord's taxes, &c., but that the meaning of the settlement was that the widow had obtained a free gift of the occupation of the house. Lord Young again expressed doubts. Lord Moncreiff held that the decision had to be governed by the preceding cases, and particularly that of Clark.¹ The Lord Justice-Clerk decided the case upon its merits in the sense indicated, but held that his view was confirmed by the preceding authorities.

With some regret, and fully admitting the difficulties which confronted the learned Judges of the Court of Session, I venture to doubt whether the previous authorities, and in particular the case of *Clark*¹ were apt as precedents. In the case of *Cathcart*² a liferent in terms was created. In *Clark*¹ it was not so. Nor did the other language in the deeds to be construed in the two cases equate. But if the case of *Cathcart*² is treated as an independent authority amounting to a proposition that a person enjoying "the liferent use" of a particular house is not, quoad the obligation attached to such a position, to be treated as a liferenter, then I am humbly of opinion that such a proposition is unsound in law. No reason occurs to the mind for confining the beneficiary to the category of occupant as distinguished from that of liferenter, when the language employed in the settlement or marriage-contract is plain and apt as constituting a liferent right. The doubts of Lord Young, expressed more than once, as to the decisions in which he took part, seem to me to have been well warranted.

It is not necessary in this case to go further and to say whether the cases of *Clark*¹ and *Bayne*³ were in themselves properly decided, or whether the language and provisions of the deeds there construed were so special as to relieve the beneficiary as a mere occupant from the general obligations of a liferenter. Two propositions of general import may, however, be stated. First, the extent of the obligations attaching to a right of this character

July 26, 1912. conferred by deed or settlement is a question to be determined by the intention of the maker, as that intention can be derived from the language which he has employed, and from the provisions which he has made with regard to, inter alia, the administration and realisation of his estate.

Johnstone v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

Secondly, when the language employed is entirely apt and appropriate for the creation of an ordinary liferent right, it rests upon those who contend that the ordinary obligations which attach to a liferenter should not apply to him in the particular case—it rests upon those putting forward such a proposition of exception to establish it.

Applying these principles to the present case, I now turn to the provisions of Mr Mackenzie's settlement. The scheme of that settlement was this: After the ordinary provision for payment of debts, he gave his widow an annuity of £500 and the liferent of the house. With regard to providing the annuity a sum of £20,000 was set apart, and the language in which that was done, and in which the corpus of the estate was disposed of, is of great importance. It is as follows:—"That my trustees shall, in the event of my said wife surviving me, after setting aside the sum of twenty thousand pounds to provide for the foresaid annuity, pay and convey to her one-half of the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate, and shall pay and convey the remaining one-half to my said brother Walter Mackenzie, to the extent of two-thirds thereof, and to my said brother Robert Mackenzie, to the extent of one-third thereof; and shall, on the death of my said wife, pay and convey to them in the same proportions, the said dwelling-house and household furniture and plenishing, or, if the same shall have been sold, the prices thereof, and the sum set aside to provide the said annuity, and any surplus revenue accrued thereon." It is accordingly clear that the bulk of the residue of the estate was to be paid and conveyed on the death of the testator to one set of beneficiaries, namely, the testator's widow and brothers in certain proportions.

During the widow's life all that remained undistributed were the house and furniture (or their prices if sold), in which she was liferented, and a sum of £20,000 set aside to provide the widow's annuity. These were to be paid and conveyed at her death to another set of beneficiaries, namely, the testator's brothers alone. Not only, however, was the sum set aside to provide the annuity so to be conveyed to the brothers, but, as was also provided by the settlement, "any surplus revenue accrued thereon." This surplus revenue was surplus after payment of the annuity and nothing else, and the right to every portion of such surplus was and is in Messrs Walter and Robert Mackenzie. It appears, accordingly, to be in the highest degree unlikely, and, indeed, quite contrary to the intention of the testator, that any residue of his estate (thus directed to be paid over at his death) was to be in part reserved so as to provide a fund out of which the taxation upon the property liferented by his widow was to be defrayed. In the second place (and with much respect to the Judges of the Second Division, this appears to be particularly clear), the fund of £20,000 was a fund which, along with the surplus of revenue which remained after defraying Mrs Mackenzie's annuity year by year, went to Messrs Walter Mackenzie and Robert Mackenzie; and to divert it, or any part of the annual surplus, to other purposes or to other people seems a plain breach of the duty resting upon the trustees, and of the rights of Messrs Walter and Robert Mackenzie July 26, 1912. under their brother's settlement. I cannot see my way to hold that an encroachment upon this fund so specifically destined can be made for the purpose of payment of taxation by Mr Mackenzie's trustees upon the house ^{Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees.} ^{Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.} ^{liferented by his widow.} The judgment of the Second Division, holding that it is legitimate to dedicate any portion of the £20,000 and surplus revenue thereon to the payment of such taxation, appears to me to be contrary to the provisions of the deed.

Accordingly, the residue is, in terms of the settlement, distributed, and the £20,000, with the entire surplus revenue therefrom, is specially destined to particular beneficiaries. That being so, and the problem being, "Did Mr Mackenzie intend that his trustees should pay these annual charges or that his widow should pay them?" I think the problem is plainly solved by these two considerations—first, that, if he intended the former, he has left no fund which it would be reasonable to think he assumed could be dedicated to, or utilised for, that purpose; whereas, on the contrary, if his intention was that his widow should pay these charges, there was nothing out of the common in that; he was simply presuming what the law of Scotland would in ordinary circumstances lay down, namely, that she, as liferenter, should have the rights and perform the obligations attaching to such a position.

There is, however, another point which humbly appears to me to shed no inconsiderable light upon the testator's intentions, a point which does not appear to be adverted to in the Courts below. The trustees had power, with the consent of the widow, to sell the house. What, in the event of such a sale, was to happen? She was to be entitled to "the annual income of the price or prices obtained therefrom during all the days of her life." It is clear that the price obtained for the property was a price which would be realised on the footing that feu-duty, landlord's taxation, and all the charges now in question in this case were on the debit side of the property account as a revenue-yielding subject. The widow accordingly, it is provided by the settlement, shall in the event of a sale be truly and in the result debited with this taxation. If, however, there be no sale she is not to be debited with that taxation, but it is to be disbursed—so is the contention—out of the general residue, or out of the revenue of £20,000 specifically destined to the testator's brothers. It would appear to be much more reasonable, and in accord with the intention of the testator, to make the incidence of the taxation where the general law would put it, namely, as a debit against the property and its fruits or their equivalent, a debit to be borne by the liferenter in either case, namely, whether the property was sold or remained unsold.

Although the result has been reached in some respects upon a broader ground than that taken by the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that that learned Judge came to a correct conclusion in this case, and that—whether upon the point of the possible dedication of the annuity funds and surplus to the payment of these charges, or upon the point of the effect of the authorities as governing a case of this kind—the decision of the learned Judges of the Second Division cannot be supported.

July 26, 1912. I am humbly of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and that the appellants are entitled to costs in both Courts.

Statutory Offences—Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sec. 9—Charge of exceeding speed limit—Proof of warning or notice of intended prosecution. Dickson v. Stevenson.

In a prosecution for a contravention of section 9 of the Motor Car Act, 1903 (which imposes a speed limit), the prosecutor must prove that the warning or notice of the intended prosecution required by the section was given to the accused; and a conviction, without such proof, is bad.

FINDLAY KERR DICKSON, studgroom, Mauchline, was charged on a summary complaint in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock, with having, on 19th September 1911, upon a public highway in the village of Crookedholm, parish of Kilmarnock, ridden or driven a motor cycle at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour, contrary to the Motor Cars Regulation (County of Ayr) Order, 1910, and the Motor Car Act, 1903, section 9.* HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Guthrie.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence led was convicted and fined by the Sheriff-substitute (D. J. Mackenzie).

Thereafter he brought a bill of suspension craving the Court to suspend the sentence in which he averred:—"The complainer was not warned of the intended prosecution at the time the offence was committed. On issuing from the west end of the trap aftermentioned, the complainer was stopped by two constables, who then informed him that he was going too fast and would be reported. Said constables, who are subordinate officials, did not warn the accused of any threatened prosecution, and it was not proved nor was any evidence led to prove that they had authority to determine on a prosecution or to give warning thereof, prior to consideration of their report to their superior officers by respondent. No evidence was led for the prosecution at the trial to the effect that any warning or written notice was given, nor was any admission made by the complainer to that effect. The receipt of the service copy of the complaint on 2nd October 1911 was the first intimation received by the complainer that a prosecution was to be taken. This objection was taken by the complainer in the course of the trial and before sentence was pronounced."

* The Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), enacts:—Sec. 9 (1) " . . . A person shall not, under any circumstances, drive a motor car on a public highway at a speed exceeding twenty miles per hour, and within any limits or place referred to in regulations made by the Local Government Board . . . at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour." (2) "Where a person is prosecuted for an offence under this section he shall not be convicted unless he is warned of the intended prosecution at the time the offence is committed, or unless notice of the intended prosecution is sent to him or to the owner of the car as entered on the register within such time after the offence is committed, not exceeding twenty-one days, as the Court think reasonable."

Answers were lodged on behalf of the prosecutor, James Pollock Stevenson, in which it was averred:—"Denied that the receipt of the service copy of the complaint was the first intimation received by the complainer that a prosecution was to be taken. Explained that, in addition to being informed by the constables at the time of the offence that he would be reported for prosecution, the complainer was also notified by the respondent that he was to be prosecuted in terms of the copy letter of 23rd September 1911, printed in the appendix hereto. This copy letter was mentioned to the Sheriff when the objection referred to was taken by the complainer, and he did not deny that he had received it. Further, the complaint was served within the twenty-one days mentioned in the Act. Quoad ultra admitted." The copy letter produced set forth the offence, the date, the place, and the hour at which it occurred, and stated that it was intended to prosecute the accused.

The case was heard on 14th December 1911. At the hearing counsel for the complainer admitted that the statement in the italicised sentence quoted from the bill of suspension was incorrect.

Argued for the complainer;—Under section 9 (2) of the Motor Car Act it was a condition precedent to a conviction for an offence under the section that it should be proved that the required notice was given. This fact might be established by evidence led by the prosecutor or by the accused's admission made in terms of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.¹ But in this case there was no such proof or admission. The statements made at the time of the alleged offence by the constables were clearly not sufficient notice.² Nor was there any proof of further notice being given. The copy letter, to which the respondent referred, was not produced until the proof on both sides was closed; it did not appear that it had ever been put before the Sheriff-substitute; and all that was averred was that the accused did not deny receiving it, which was not equivalent to an admission. Accordingly the provisions of the Motor Car Act had not been obeyed, and the sentence should be suspended.

Argued for the respondent;—The complainer had received sufficient notice. He was told by the constables that he would be reported for prosecution; and he had received, as he could not deny, the letter a copy of which was now produced. It was not necessary under the Act that the receipt of this letter should be proved; it was sufficient that it was brought to the notice of the Court before sentence was pronounced, and that the Court was satisfied that notice had in fact been given.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the conviction here cannot [His Lordship quoted the subsection]. Now, it is admitted that in this case Dickson v.

 his case, when the agent for the accused moved the Sheriff to acquit the Lord Justice-accused on the ground that there was no evidence before the Court that the Clerk.
 prosecutor had given warning or notice. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the prosecutor has failed to prove that which he is required by the statute to prove in order to obtain a conviction. The words of the statute are very distinct and very peculiar—the accused “shall not be convicted unless” he receives warning or intimation. It seems to me to be plainly the duty of the prosecutor to prove at the trial that he gave the required warning or intimation, and if, as here, he fails to do so, the accused cannot be convicted. Accordingly, I think that the conviction here must be quashed.

LORD DUNDAS —I quite agree. The objection to the conviction, which is more or less technical, is taken in circumstances which are not favourable to the suspender, because he now admits that in point of fact he did get due notice in writing of the prosecution ; but none the less I agree that he must succeed. I think the plain meaning of subsection 2 of section 9 of the Act is that a person shall not be convicted unless it is proved or admitted at the trial that he received notice or warning in terms of the subsection. Now, there was no such proof or admission here ; and, therefore, I do not see how the Sheriff could be satisfied that the required warning or notice had been given. It is true that it is said in the answers that a copy of the letter containing notice of the prosecution which was sent to the accused “was mentioned to the Sheriff,” and that the accused “did not deny that he had received it.” But it was for the prosecutor to prove that notice was sent, and not for the accused to deny ; and, accordingly, the fact that he did not deny that he received notice cannot be regarded as establishing the fact that notice was given. I think the conviction must be suspended.

By Article II. of a convention between Great Britain and certain states (of which Norway is not one) which appears in a Schedule to, and is incorporated with, the Act, it is provided that the fishermen of each country shall, as regards bays, have the exclusive right of fishing within three miles of a straight line drawn across the bay at a point described.

A Norwegian subject, the master of a trawler registered in Norway, having been convicted on a complaint which set forth that, contrary to the Act, he had fished "within the exclusive fishing limits of the British Islands as defined by Article II. of the Schedule, viz., at a point within three miles of the line drawn across a certain bay—

Held that the accused, not being the subject of a signatory nation, was not bound by the provisions of the convention, and that, accordingly, as the locus of the offence was defined in the complaint by reference to these provisions, the complaint was irrelevant; and the conviction quashed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Guthrie.

AASULD JENSEN was charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen on a summary complaint at the instance of Charles Wilson, Procurator-fiscal. The complaint was in these terms:—"Aasuld Jensen, residing at Lyngor, Norway, but at present in Aberdeen, you are charged at the instance of the complainer that, being the master of the steam-trawler 'Nestor,' S.D. 12 of Sandefjord, Norway, a foreign sea-fishing boat within the meaning of the Act aftermentioned, you did, on 7th June 1911, enter within the exclusive fishing limits of the British Islands as defined by Article II. of the First Schedule attached to said Act, viz., at a part of the sea known as Dunbeath Bay, off the east coast of Caithness-shire, in a position 3 and six-tenth miles south, two degrees west from low-water mark at Forse Point, Caithness-shire, and within three miles of a straight line drawn across said bay, in the part nearest the entrance, at the first point where the width does not exceed ten miles, namely, from Auchmaster Point on the north-east of said bay to a position half a mile south 69 degrees west from Newport Point on the south side of said bay, and you did, while said steam-trawler remained within said limits, fish or attempt to fish by means of an otter-trawl, contrary to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883,*

* The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), enacts:—

Sec. 7 (1). "A foreign sea-fishing boat shall not enter within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands except for purposes recognised by international law, or by any convention . . . or for any lawful purpose. (2) If a foreign sea-fishing boat enters the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands . . . (b) No person on board the boat shall fish or attempt to fish while the boat remains within the said limits."

Sec. 28. "The expression 'exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands' means that portion of the seas surrounding the British Islands within which Her Majesty's subjects have, by international law, the exclusive right of fishing, and where such portion is defined by the terms of any convention, treaty, or arrangement for the time being in force between Her Majesty and any foreign state, includes, as regards the sea-fishing boats and officers and subjects of that state, the portion so defined."

The First Schedule (entitled "International Convention for the purpose of regulating the Police of the Fisheries in the North Sea outside Territorial Waters") provides—Article I.:—"The provisions of the present Convention . . . shall apply to the subjects of the high contracting parties." Jensen v.
Wilson.

The accused, having been convicted after a trial by the Sheriff-substitute (Laing), appealed on a stated case.

The case set forth:—"The appellant stated as a preliminary objection that he, being a Norwegian subject, the said steam-trawler being registered in Norway, and Norway not being one of the powers signatory to the International Convention relative to fisheries, dated 6th May 1882, as embodied in the First Schedule to the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883, and further the locus of the offence being as alleged, the complaint as laid was irrelevant, or otherwise that on these grounds he was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Aberdeen Sheriff Court. Under reservation of the said objection the appellant pleaded not guilty, and of consent of parties evidence was led."

The case also set forth that the accused was a Norwegian, and that his trawler was registered in Norway; that Norway was not a party to the Convention; that the accused had fished as charged in the complaint; and continued:—

"On these facts I found (1) that the appellant was the master of a foreign sea-fishing boat within the meaning of the Act aftermentioned; (2) that on the date libelled he entered within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands as defined by Article II. of the First Schedule attached to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, namely, the locus mentioned in the complaint; and (3) that he did, while the said steam-trawler remained within the said limits, fish therein by means of an otter-trawl. I accordingly repelled the objection for the appellant and found him guilty of the contravention charged. I imposed a fine of £5, which was paid in Court.

"I refer to the case of Peters v. Olsen, (1905) 4 Adam, 608, 7 F. (J.) 86, and Mortensen v. Peters, (1906) 5 Adam, 121, 8 F. (J.) 93."

The following question of law was stated, inter alia:—" (1) Whether, on the facts admitted and proved, it was relevant to have charged the appellant with the contravention alleged, viz., that he did enter within the exclusive fishing limits of the British Islands, as defined by Article II. of the said Schedule attached to the said the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, namely, at a part of the sea known as Dunbeath Bay, off the east coast of Caithness-shire, in a position three and six-tenth miles S. 2° W. from low-water mark at Forse Point, Caithness-shire, said position being more than three miles seawards from low-water mark of ordinary spring tides of the nearest point of land, but within three miles of a line drawn across said bay between the points libelled in the complaint?"

A joint minute was presented to the Court in which the parties concurred in asking the Court to set aside the conviction.

The case was heard on 14th December 1911. At the hearing counsel for the respondent stated that as the complaint was based on right of fishery within the distance of three miles from low-water mark along the whole extent of the coasts of their respective countries as well as of the dependent islands and banks.

"As regards bays, the distance of three miles shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay, in the part nearest the entrance, at the first point where the width does not exceed ten miles. . . ."

Dec. 14, 1911. Article II. of the International Convention they did not submit any argument in support of the conviction.

Wilson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat unusual case. We have had, before now, cases where the Crown does not support the conviction brought under review; but in the present case the parties have sought by a joint minute to have the conviction set aside. It is, however, our duty when a judgment has been pronounced by any competent Court not to set the conviction aside except upon satisfactory grounds of law, and we cannot simply give effect to the joint minute without hearing argument against the conviction which is brought under review. Here we have not had anything stated by the Crown in support of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, and in these circumstances we must deal with the case as best we can.

If I thought that our decision would affect the law as laid down in the cases of *Peters v. Olsen*¹ and Mortensen v. Peters,² I should desire a fuller hearing of this case—possibly before a full bench—but being satisfied, as I am, that the ground on which our decision is to be pronounced does not affect the law laid down in these cases, I have no hesitation in proceeding to decide this case.

It is unfortunate that the prosecutor in stating his complaint has tied himself down to Article II. of the First Schedule annexed to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, which is of the nature of a convention, and not a statutory enactment. Under that convention all nations who are parties thereto are bound to accept it as the law applicable to their subjects when fishing vessels belonging to any such subject are found in the territorial waters of another country which is also a signatory. In defining the locus the prosecutor has founded on the second paragraph of Article II., which is in these terms:—“As regards bays, the distance of three miles shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay, in the part nearest the entrance, at the first point where the width does not exceed ten miles.” That is the law applicable to signatory nations and their subjects within the defined limits; but nations who have not become members of the convention, and likewise their subjects, are not bound thereby.

Now, the accused is a Norwegian, and Norway, as the Sheriff-substitute says, was not, on the date libelled, “one of the powers signatory to the International Convention relative to fisheries, dated 6th May 1882, as embodied in the First Schedule to the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883.” Accordingly, what we have to determine is whether, when the complaint is based upon a contravention of Article II., the accused could be convicted on these grounds. Whether he could have been convicted on other grounds I need not consider. Here the complaint is based upon Article II., and on that ground I think, for the reasons which I have stated, that the conviction must be quashed.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree; and only wish to add a single word. It is this, that owing to the peculiar position of matters, we have heard no argu-

The General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 96 (as incorporated in the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 123 and Schedule C) enacts that any person who “shall hang or lay any linen clothes or other such article on any hedge or fence of” a turnpike road shall be liable in a penalty.

Held that a complaint which charged an accused with contravening the section by hanging herring fishing-nets on a roadside hedge was irrelevant, as herring fishing-nets did not fall under the category “linen clothes or other such article.”

GEORGE PATIENCE, fisherman, Avoch, was charged in the Sheriff HIGH COURT.
 Court at Dingwall on a summary complaint at the instance of Lord Justice-William Mackenzie, Procurator-fiscal. The charge in the complaint Clerk. was “that on the 6th and 7th days of October 1911, by the side of Lord Dundas.

 (Scotland) Act, 1878,* whereby you are liable to forfeit or pay any sum not exceeding 50s. over and above the damages occasioned thereby, and, in default of payment of said penalty of 50s., to im-that if any person . . . shall hang or lay any linen clothes or other such article on any hedge or fence of any such road ; . . . every person offending in any of the cases aforesaid, shall for each and every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding fifty shillings over and above the damages occasioned thereby.”

Dec. 15, 1911. The accused pleaded not guilty, but, after evidence led, was convicted and fined 10s. by the Sheriff-substitute (MacWatt).

Patience v.
Mackenzie.

He presented a bill of suspension in which he stated that before he was called on to plead his agent took objection to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground, inter alia, that "a herring-net was not included (or embraced) in or ejusdem generis with the words 'linen clothes or other such article' used in the 96th section of the Act 1 and 2 William IV. cap. 43," and that this objection had been repelled by the Sheriff-substitute.

He repeated this objection in the bill of suspension, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The acts set forth in the said complaint not being, upon a sound construction, an offence under the statutes libelled, the said complaint was irrelevant, and the conviction and sentence following thereupon were therefore null and oppressive, and should be suspended as craved. (2) The said complaint not having charged the present complainer with any offence known to the law, was irrelevant, and the conviction and sentence following thereupon should be suspended as craved.

The case was heard on 15th December 1911.

Argued for the complainer;—The complaint was irrelevant. Fishing-nets were neither "linen clothes" nor "other such article." The latter expression must be construed as comprehending such articles only as were ejusdem generis with linen clothes,¹ and, so construed, herring-nets could not be brought within its scope. The section must be read with reference to the evil which the Legislature intended to prevent,² and here the object of the section clearly was to prohibit persons from laying articles on roadside hedges which would be unsightly or might frighten animals on the road. But herring-nets were not open to either of these objections, and did not, therefore, fall within the purview of the section. Further, even if the complainer were wrong on this point, the complaint was open to objection on the ground of want of specification.³ The charge should have run: "You did hang or lay linen clothes or other such articles, viz., herring fishing-nets, on the hedge"; or in some form which would have certiorated the accused of the portion of the section which he was charged with contravening.

Argued for the respondent;—The complaint was relevant, and sufficiently specified the offence charged. There was only one sentence in the section libelled which referred to hanging articles on hedges, and consequently the accused could be in no doubt as to the portion of the section to which the charge referred. The words "other such article" would, in themselves, comprehend herring nets, and the fact that these general words were preceded by specific words would not, per se, justify the Court in departing from the natural meaning of the former words. All that was meant by the principle of ejusdem generis was that, if there was difficulty in giving the general terms their natural meaning, or if there was something in the statute or deed in which they appeared which indicated that they were used in a restricted sense, then they must be construed as including only things which were ejusdem generis with the things which were specified by the preceding terms.¹ But this rule of construction did not apply to Dec. 15, 1911. a case, such as the present, where there was nothing to prevent the general words receiving their ordinary interpretation. Assuming, Patience v. Mackenzie. however, that the rule did apply, herring nets were within the same class as linen clothes. The class-characteristic was the fabric of the articles, and any articles of textile fabric which could be hung on hedges were comprehended. A lace curtain would fall within the statutory prohibition, and in point of manufacture there was no great difference between such a curtain and a herring net. On a sound interpretation of the section there were three kinds of article mentioned, viz., "linen," "clothes," and "other such article."

LORD DUNDAS.—The suspender is a fisherman residing at Avoch. He was charged in Dingwall Sheriff Court on a complaint, at the instance of the respondent, which libelled that he "did hang or lay herring fishing-nets on the hedge or fence" of a public highway "contrary to 1 and 2 William IV. chapter 43, section 96, as incorporated with the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878." His agent stated certain objections to the relevancy of the complaint, but these were repelled by the Sheriff-substitute, and the accused was thereafter convicted and fined; and this suspension has been brought.

I am of opinion that the conviction must be quashed. The first observation which occurs to one upon the complaint as framed is that some ingenuity (to say the least) would be required to ascertain what part of section 96 is referred to in the charge, there being no direct reference, throughout its length, to herring nets. It is explained that the provision applicable is contained in the clause "or shall hang or lay any linen clothes or other such articles on any hedge or fence of any such road"; and it was urged with, I thought, a good deal of force that the libel should at least have stated that the accused did hang or lay on the fence of the roadway "linen clothes or other such articles, videlicet, herring fishing-nets." But it is unnecessary to say more about that; for, even if the complaint had been more explicitly framed, I do not think it could have been made relevant. I do not see how one can, by any reasonable stretch of language, include herring nets in the category of "linen clothes or other such articles."

I have no desire to push the doctrine of ejusdem generis to an extreme length. Perhaps there has sometimes been a tendency to carry it too far. But one must, at all events, find some definite relation or connection between the specific act charged and the acts prohibited by the statute. I have not thought (or been told) of any common category to which both linen clothes (or linen and clothes) and herring nets can be referred, unless, it may be, that both can be hung on hedges. Something much closer and more definite would be required to enable one to include "herring fishing-nets" in the words "other such article," as they occur in section 96. I think this complaint is radically irrelevant, and the conviction should be quashed. If the practice of hanging or laying fishing-nets upon the fences

Patience v. Mackenzie.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. In this case it is immaterial whether the word “linen” in the section is taken as qualifying the word “clothes”—in which case the prohibition in the section applies only to “linen clothes” or “other such article”—or whether, as Mr Sandeman suggested, the two words are to be read separately and as designing two classes of articles, viz., linen articles and articles which are clothes.

Campbell v. Kerr. Statutory Offences—Betting—“Public place”—“Unenclosed ground”—Open shed on quay—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), sec. 1.

The Street Betting Act, 1906, makes it an offence for any person to frequent, or loiter in, “public places” for the purpose of bookmaking or betting; and defines “public place” as including “any unenclosed ground to which the public for the time being have unrestricted access.”

On a quay belonging to a harbour trust there was a shed, in the sides of which there were large openings without gates or doors. The public had free access to both quay and shed.

Held that the shed was “unenclosed ground,” and was a “public place” within the meaning of the Act.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Aggravation—Complaint libelling second offence—Procedure—Stage at which previous conviction should be proved—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), sec. 1—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 34.

The Street Betting Act, 1906, which prohibits betting in public places, imposes a certain penalty for a first offence and a larger penalty for a second offence.

A complaint charged an accused with a contravention of the Act, and that “such offence is a second offence, you having been previously convicted as in the list annexed, whereby you are liable” to the larger penalty.

Held that the previous conviction was libelled as an aggravation and not as a substantive charge, and had been competently proved after the accused had been found guilty of the offence for which he was prosecuted; and that it would have been incompetent to prove it in causa.

HIGH COURT. THOMAS CAMPBELL, Port-Glasgow, was charged on a summary complaint in the Police Court of Port-Glasgow at the instance of George Kerr, burgh prosecutor. The charge in the complaint was “that on 2nd August 1911, within the open shed situated on the quay, known as the Steamboat Quay, in the burgh of Port-Glasgow, said open shed being unenclosed ground to which the public for the time being

The accused having been convicted, he appealed on a stated case. The case set forth the following facts (in addition to those showing that the accused had betted) as proved :—

“ (3) That the place libelled is an open shed situated on the Steamboat Quay in the burgh of Port-Glasgow, forming the property of the Port-Glasgow Harbour Trust, a public trust. “ (b) in the case of a second offence . . . to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds.

“ (4) For the purpose of this section . . . the words ‘ public place ’ shall include any public park, garden, or sea-beach, and any unenclosed ground to which the public for the time being have unrestricted access . . . ”

It is closed along the remaining portions of said sides by fixed wooden partitions, and at the ends by closed-in sheds, and has a slated roof. There are no gateways at any of these openings, and the public can, and do, pass freely in and out at any time. (5) That situated inside said open shed there is a public water-closet and urinal, access to this urinal being obtained from inside the shed. Masts, sails, and fishing-gear are stored on the beams of the roof of said shed by members of the public owning small boats. The shed has not been used for harbour purposes for a long number of years. (6) That the open shed in question is not enclosed by walls or fences, or in any other manner to keep the public out of it. The public have free access to said quay and shed from any of the public streets of the burgh. There are no gateways or barricades to prevent such access. (7) That the said quay and shed are largely frequented by the public, and they have been so frequented from time immemorial. No attempt has ever been made to restrain the public from using them, and in particular on the date in question the public had free and unrestricted access to said open shed. At the time of the apprehension of the appellant there were besides him at least twenty members of the public in said shed."

Campbell v.
Kerr.

"I accordingly held it proved that said open shed, situated as aforesaid, is unenclosed ground to which the public for the time being had unrestricted access, and that it is therefore a public place within the meaning of subsection 4 of section 1 of the Street Betting Act, 1906, and I found the appellant guilty of the charge.

"The appellant was then asked, as directed by section 34 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, if he admitted the correctness of the previous conviction libelled. He refused to do so, and his agent objected to the competency of proving the conviction at this stage, and pled that it should have been proved in causa. I repelled the objection, and the previous conviction was thereafter proved as required by section 34 (4) of the last mentioned Act.

"I thereupon imposed a fine of £20, and failing payment ordered the accused to be imprisoned for sixty days."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was I right in holding that the open shed in question is unenclosed ground to which the public for the time being had unrestricted access, and, as such, a public place within the meaning of subsection 4 of section 1 of the Street Betting Act, 1906? (2) Was I right in repelling the objection to the competency of proving the previous conviction libelled after I had found the appellant guilty of the charge?"

The case was heard on 15th and 16th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The shed in question was not a "public place" in the sense of the Betting Act. It was placed on a quay, which was the private property of the Harbour Trustees; and it could not be described as "unenclosed ground."¹ (2) The offence charged was libelled as a second offence. The previous conviction was essential to the substantiation of that charge, and was not merely an aggravation of the offence.¹ It was necessary, therefore, that it should be proved in causa and not after the conviction of the accused, as appeared from the Summary Jurisdiction Act, section 34 (8). In Campbell v. Kerr.² *H. M. Advocate v. Hunter*³ it was held that the aggravation of theft that the accused was habit and repute a thief must be proved in causa by evidence laid before the jury; and the present case was a fortiori of that case.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The shed was “unenclosed ground” in the sense of the statute. The test of whether a place was or was not “unenclosed” was whether de facto the public, as public, had access to it.³ In this case the shed had no gates or doors, nor were there any means of excluding the public from the quay on which it was situated; and the urinal would not have been placed in the shed unless the public had access to it. In view of these facts it was clear that the shed fell within the definition of “public place.” (2) The previous conviction was libelled as an aggravation, and not as a substantive part, of the charge. Under section 34 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act the procedure followed in the case was correct.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case turns on the question whether or not a certain shed was “unenclosed ground,” or rather, whether it was competent for the magistrate who tried the case, after hearing the evidence and finding proved the facts which we have here stated, to hold that it was “unenclosed ground.” I think that the magistrate was right in so holding, in spite of Mr Crabb Watt’s ingenious argument to the contrary.

The fact that the shed was on a quay can make no difference. The quay itself was public ground, and on it there was this erection, with a roof and certain fixed wooden partitions, which partially closed it in, but left large openings in front and in rear. It was left open, it was out of use for harbour purposes, and the public were in the habit of using it freely. It was in every respect a place open to the public, and I think it comes within the description of “unenclosed ground.” I do not see that the fact of its having a cover over it makes any difference. There are many places in public grounds so roofed in in order to form a shelter from the rain, but there can be no doubt that such a shelter is unenclosed ground so long as the public are able to pass into it and under the roof, and to range freely over the park in which it is placed.

The only other question was whether it was competent for the magistrate to proceed as he did to repel the objection to the competency of proving the previous conviction libelled after he had found the appellant guilty of the charge. The appellant here contends that as the previous conviction was stated against him in the complaint, it had to be proved before the case for the prosecution was closed. I think differently. I think the magistrate was bound to make up his mind, first, whether the offence was proved,

Dec. 16, 1911. Campbell v. Kerr. and only after he had found the accused guilty of the offence was it his duty to proceed to consider the previous conviction, which was libelled, not as a substantive charge, but as an aggravation rendering the accused liable to a heavier punishment. As it was merely a question of greater or less punishment, the Judge here was just in the same position as when, under the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887, a previous conviction is libelled as an aggravation. There, if it is to be proved, it must be proved separately by a separate inquiry before the same jury, and a separate verdict returned. And section 67, which prescribes this procedure, is made to apply to summary prosecutions by section 71. In my opinion the Judge in this case could not have proceeded in any other way than he did. If he had done so there would have been good ground for overturning the conviction.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree upon both points, and have nothing to add.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur.

Administration of Justice—Application to restrain publication of statements tending to prejudice course of justice—Contempt of Court—Newspaper.

During a strike at Glasgow acts of violence were committed, in connection with which certain persons were apprehended and charged with having been part of a riotous mob which forced the Allan Line shed at Princes Dock. Prior to their trial the Glasgow Herald newspaper published a letter commenting on the occurrences, and calling on the magistrates to take steps to prevent their repetition. The letter contained this passage:—"Instances have occurred which clearly demonstrate the determination of the men to carry out their leaders' advice, notably that in which the Allan Line sheds at Princes Docks were rushed and the 'Sicilian' boarded, when a number of men were arrested, and subsequently remitted to the Sheriff."

The accused persons presented a petition to the High Court, setting forth the letter, and craving the Court to prohibit the newspaper from publishing any statement relative to the acts with which the petitioners were charged, or anything prejudicial to their case.

Held that, there being nothing in the letter complained of but a statement of facts already known to the public, it was not prejudicial to the petitioners' case; and petition refused.

HIGH COURT. WILLIAM COWIE AND OTHERS, who had been apprehended and charged with forming part of a riotous mob which had committed acts of violence, and who had been admitted to bail, presented a petition to the High Court of Justiciary, craving the Court "to prohibit the editor and publisher and proprietors of the Glasgow Herald from publishing or circulating any statement relative to the acts of violence or other deeds with which the petitioners are charged as aforesaid, or anything of a nature prejudicial to the petitioners' case, or doing anything whereby such statement may be published or circulated until the proceedings now in dependence shall be brought to a conclusion."

The petition stated:—"On or about the 9th of February 1912 the petitioners were apprehended, and on 12th February 1912 a petition at the instance of James Neil Hart, writer, Glasgow, Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriffdom of Lanarkshire, was served upon them, stating that they did, on 9th February 1912, at Plantation Quay, Mavisbank Quay, General Terminus Quay, and Springfield Quay, and Princes Dock, all Glasgow Harbour, form part of a riotous mob, which, acting of common purpose, did force open blinds or running doors of the Clyde Shipping Company's shed at Plantation Quay aforesaid, and did destroy several barricades and force open the blinds or running doors of the Allan Line sheds at Princes Dock aforesaid, and did obstruct and assault while in the execution of their duty George P. Crawford, lieutenant, Northern District, Auchterlonie Williamson, lieutenant, St Rollox District; James Fitzpatrick and Alexander Cameron, constables, both Central District; and Morris M'Bridge, sergeant, Marine District, all of the Glasgow Police, by beating them with their fists and with sticks.

"The petitioners were thereafter admitted to bail. The said committal and liberation on bail were both reported in the issue of the Glasgow Herald newspaper, dated Saturday, 10th February 1912. Notwithstanding the apprehension and committal foresaid the Glasgow Herald continued to publish articles and correspondence dealing with the said dockers' strike and with alleged acts of violence which it represented to have taken place in the course thereof. These articles and correspondence are in their nature and tendency calculated to seriously prejudice the defence of the petitioners. In particular, on or about Thursday, 15th February 1912, a letter over the nom de plume of 'Civis' was published in the correspondence column of said newspaper in the following terms:—"Glasgow Harbour Dispute.—Sir,—I am sorry to see that our local labour troubles at the Harbour are not yet at an end, and that a stoppage of work is again threatened. In common with all law-abiding citizens I hope that the scenes of riot which disgraced our Harbour and City last week will not be allowed to be repeated, and that the Magistrates will see that the law is not again openly set at defiance. May I also express my surprise that the men who publicly incited their ignorant followers to personal violence should be allowed to be at large. These men were directly responsible for the open resistance of the police, for the utter lawlessness which we saw last week. While I am pleased to see that a considerable number of the rioters were promptly laid by the heels, and hope they will receive exemplary punishment, I ask why the chief offenders should be allowed to go scot free. I sincerely trust that should we have any further direct incitements to violence and intimidation, our Magistrates will resolutely do their obvious duty.—I am, &c., CIVIS."

"The said letter in its terms clearly refers to the petitioners, and was so understood by the readers of the said newspaper, and it assumes the petitioners guilty of the said crime with which they stand charged. On or about Thursday, the 15th February 1912, the agents for the petitioners, Messrs St Clair Swanson & Manson, wrote to the proprietor and publishers and to the editor of the said Glasgow

Feb. 24, 1912. Herald a letter setting forth that the said letter was in its terms calculated to seriously prejudice the petitioners' defence, and asking them to give an undertaking that no further matters of a similar import would be published in the Glasgow Herald pending the trial, failing which an application to your Lordships would be presented. In reply to said letter a reply addressed to the petitioners' Glasgow agent, Mr W. G. Leechman, writer, Glasgow, was received from the editor of the said newspaper in the following terms:—'Glasgow, Feb. 15/12.—Dear Sir,—With reference to a letter received by me from Messrs St Clair Swanson & Manson on the subject of "Civis" letter re the Glasgow Harbour Dispute, I am quite willing to undertake that no matter similar to that complained of in "Civis" letter will be published in the Glasgow Herald pending the trial of men apprehended in connection with the harbour dispute.—Yours truly, F. HARCOURT KITCHIN, Editor.'

"The petitioners accepted the said undertaking for the time as being given by the proper and responsible party, but in breach of said undertaking there was published in the issue of the Glasgow Herald, of date 20th February 1912, a letter in the following terms:—'Police Protection at the Docks.—Feb. 19. Sir,—I was a member of the deputation from the provision trade which had the honour of being received to-day by the Magistrates' Committee. I wish it to be clearly understood that I have no complaint to make against the Committee, but express the opinion held by all of us when I say that we felt in tendering us from their very fully occupied time even the brief ten minutes' reception they were extending to us kind consideration. You can understand, however, how astonished the members of the deputation felt when after two of the members had spoken, and only the half of our tale had been told, the Committee rose in a body and politely bowed us out. I address this letter to you, Mr Editor, in the hope that you will publish same to-morrow, as I observe from the evening papers that the Chief Constable in his assurance to the Magistrates that there is ample police protection provided at the Docks controverts the statement of facts which it was my particular privilege to have placed before the Committee this morning had the opportunity been afforded me.

"Inflammatory speeches have been made inciting to all manner of violence workmen who are not of the highest order of intelligence, and who might be excused if in a time of excitement they were unable to distinguish between right and wrong. But not only have these speeches been made, instances have occurred which clearly demonstrate the determination of the men to carry out their leaders' advice, notably that in which the Allan Line sheds at Princes Docks were rushed and the "Sicilian" boarded, when a number of men were arrested and subsequently remitted to the Sheriff. Further, messages have been sent by the strikers' Committee to traders intimating that trouble would ensue if they attempted to lift their goods.

"The fact of the matter is that the mob law has established itself above civic law, that the reign of terror holds sway, and that freeborn citizens are constrained to forego their just and lawful rights to their great material and pecuniary loss. The Magistrates are or ought to be aware of this. The Chief Constable's assurance is only idle talk.

"Traders have carefully avoided taking sides in this dispute. We pass no opinion on the merits of the points at issue. We assert but our most primitive and fundamental right in claiming that we ought

loss, and it may be from ruin.

“It should be borne in mind that so far as the discharge and delivery of cargo of a ship is concerned it is in no way part of a ship-owner's duty. It is and always has been recognised to be the cargo owner's work and responsibility. It is well known that at the present moment a powerful Committee, representative of the leading Trades Associations in the City, is in existence for the express purpose of endeavouring to have all these duties at present discharged (on behalf of consignees) by the Shipping Companies transferred to some other authority which will be more directly under the control of traders.—
I am, &c., D. F. LOCHHEAD.’

Cowie v.
George
Outram & Co.,
Limited.

“The said letter clearly refers to the said dockers' strike and to the men concerned therein, and in particular to the petitioners, and implies their guilt of criminal violence, and it is seriously prejudicial to their defence in the criminal proceedings pending against them.

“The name of the proprietors and publishers of the Glasgow Herald is George Outram & Company, Limited, and the name of the editor is F. Harcourt Kitchin. It is humbly submitted that the continued publication of these articles or correspondence would be seriously injurious to the petitioners, and would tend seriously to prejudice their defence, and that there is a serious menace unless the crave hereof is granted that the said letters published on 15th February and 20th February 1912, as aforesaid, may be followed by others of the same or a similar injurious character.”

The case was heard before the High Court on 24th February 1912, when counsel were present on behalf of George Outram & Company, Limited, the proprietors and publishers of the Glasgow Herald, and F. Harcourt Kitchin, the editor.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Court would always interfere to prevent the publication of anything which tended to prejudice the case of a person who had been committed to trial.¹ In the present case the letter complained of not only suggested that the petitioners were guilty of acts of violence, but was also calculated to raise up a strong feeling against them, so that, if they were convicted, they would receive a more severe sentence than they might otherwise have done. Decree should be pronounced in terms of the prayer of the petition.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If men are apprehended and charged with an offence, and their names are published in the newspapers, and that matter is referred to by a citizen in a newspaper, abstractly speaking it may be said that that might have some effect on their defence, and that it is better to avoid publicity in these matters. This letter which is now complained of had a particular object, an object not directed towards these individual men at all, but directed to stir up the magistrates to see that what had taken place in the past, in the way of violence committed by strikers on the men who were at work at the docks, was necessarily highly injurious to the traders who have no connection with the dock at all except that their

Feb. 24, 1912. goods are there. That was a perfectly legitimate object, and to restrain the citizens who were suffering in consequence of a strike which is said to be accompanied by violence—which everybody knows has been accompanied by violence—to restrain them from publicly stating their views as to what the magistrates should do to prevent that happening again is an idea which, I think, cannot possibly be given effect to. On the other hand, if, in doing that, they use words and language which may directly tend to prejudice the defence of persons who are about to be under trial, I think that ought most certainly to be restrained. Now, the thing in this letter which is complained of—I put it to Mr Sandeman, and with his usual frankness he admitted it, and it is quite evident that it is so—is that the men arrested may be affected in their legitimate interests at the trial and prejudiced in their defence by these words, “notably that in which the Allan Line sheds were rushed and the ‘Sicilian’ boarded.” That is a statement of a fact which had taken place. Then comes the only statement which can connect the petitioners with it—“when a number of men were arrested and subsequently remitted to the Sheriff.” That is a mere statement of fact, and in no way tends to prejudice the case against these individual men, and the purpose for which it is made is obvious. The purpose is to show that these things which happened at that dock at the discharge of the “Sicilian” were of such a character that the public authorities were forced to arrest on the spot a certain number of persons, and to bring them before the proper authorities on a charge of having offended against the law by rioting. The purpose is to call upon the magistrates to see that these occurrences—which everybody knows took place—shall not be repeated, but shall be prevented by the proper authority. I can see nothing in it tending to prejudice these persons at all. I do not see that the cases quoted to us have any bearing upon this one, and upon the whole matter I am satisfied that there has been no ground shown for interfering here. It is always desirable that newspapers should be careful, after an event has taken place, not to use their privileged position to do anything that may prejudice others. On the other hand, they must and ought to have the liberty to express their opinions and the opinions of their readers as regards what should be done in the future to prevent unlawful proceedings such as those spoken of in the letter complained of.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I should like to repeat and adopt the words of your Lordship in the chair in the case of Smith,¹ where you said that, apart from any question of contempt of Court, “it is clear that a prisoner has a right to ask the Court to secure him against anything which may prejudice the public mind so as to endanger his prospect of obtaining a fair trial.” If I thought that anything of that kind had occurred here, I should have been for interfering, but I do not think that anything of the sort has been made out.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. But I think it right to point out that there Feb. 24, 1912.
 is a marked distinction between the two letters, because if there had been Cowie v.
 in the second letter what the first letter contains I should have doubted George whether there was not ground for interfering. The first letter says: "I Outram & Co., am pleased to see that a considerable number of the rioters were promptly Limited.
 laid by the heels, and hope that they will receive exemplary punishment."
 That comes very near assuming that the charge, which was still sub judice, was well founded. But in the second letter I cannot find anything of that kind. The passages to which the Lord Justice-Clerk referred about rushing the "Sicilian" and the remitting of the men to the Sheriff would be nothing in themselves. It is the collocation of the two which gives any ground for complaint. I cannot help thinking that, looking to one being a statement of fact and the other a statement that certain charges have been made which may turn out to be right or not, it would have been better that no reference had been made to the men having been arrested and remitted to the Sheriff, but I do not think that that comes in any way near to being a reason for granting the prayer of the petition.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

WILLIAM THOMSON, Respondent.—M'Kechnie, K.C.—J. G. Jameson.

Statutory offences—Managing a brothel—Manager found "in" a "building or part of a building" used as a brothel—Common stair leading to brothel—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 142.

M'Intyre v. Thomson.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 142, enacts that any building, or part of a building, used for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution, may be entered under a magistrate's warrant; and "every person found therein who manages, or assists in the management of, such business" shall be subject to certain penalties.

In a prosecution under the above section it was proved that on the date libelled the accused, who managed as a brothel a house situated on the first floor of a common stair, admitted a man and woman to the house for the purpose of prostitution but did not himself enter the house, and that he was then met by two constables on the stair-landing outside the door of the house with the key of the door (which he had locked) in his possession.

Held that the accused was found "in" the house in the sense of the section.

THIS was an appeal on a stated case from the decision of the Magistrate in a summary prosecution in the Police Court of Glasgow at the instance of John J. M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, against William Thomson. The charge against the accused was "that on the 20th day of November 1911, you, being a person found in a house at No. 6 West Russell Street, Glasgow, used ordinarily or shortly before the date above libelled for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution, did manage and use said house, or assist in managing the same, for said purpose, and did harbour, and knowingly suffered to be harboured, in said house for said purpose one prostitute, M'Intyre v. Thomson.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence had been led, the Magistrate found the charge not proven "in view of the fact," as stated in the case, "that the accused was not de facto found in the house at the time libelled."

The case set forth that the following facts were proved:—"That the house in question is situated at No. 6 West Russell Street, one stair up, and consists of two rooms and kitchen; that it had been conducted as a brothel for three weeks prior to the date libelled; that during that period and on the date libelled the accused, though not the occupier of the house, managed same as a brothel; that on the date libelled the accused went up the stairs from the street accompanied by the said Kate Dougan and a man, Hugh M'Lean, dockyard worker, 142 Blackburn Street, Glasgow; that the accused opened the door and admitted the said Kate Dougan and the said Hugh M'Lean, but did not enter the house himself; that the accused then locked the door from the outside; that constable George Ogilvie, No. 143 'E' Division, Glasgow, and constable Robert Innes, No. 144 'E' Division, Glasgow, who had been watching the house, then came up the stairs and met the accused on the stair-landing near to the door of the house and asked him to show them who was in the house; that at first the accused denied that there was anyone in the house, and refused to open the door, but latterly he opened the door and admitted them into the house; that on entering the house the constables found the said Kate Dougan and the said Hugh M'Lean in one of the rooms; that they both admitted in presence of accused that they had come there for the purpose of having sexual intercourse, and that accused admitted them into the house."

The questions of law were:—" (1) Was the accused on the facts stated a person found in a building within the meaning of the

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), enacts:—
 Sec. 142. "The provisions hereinbefore contained with respect to entering unlicensed or improper places of resort under a warrant of the magistrates shall apply to any building or part of a building ordinarily or shortly before the date of entry under such warrant used for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution; and by virtue of such warrant it shall be lawful for any constable to take into custody and convey to the police-office, in order to be brought before the magistrate, the occupier of such building or part of a building, or any person found therein who either temporarily or permanently manages, or assists in the management of, the business conducted therein; and the proprietor and occupier of such building or part of a building, and every person found therein who manages, or assists in the management of, such business shall be subject to the same penalties and provisions as are hereinbefore enacted with respect to the proprietor and occupier of, or to any person who manages, or assists in the management of, the business conducted in, any other unlicensed or improper place of resort."

Sec. 136 of the Act provides for entry, under warrant of a magistrate, of any "building or part of a building or other place" believed to be kept for certain purposes, among which the purpose of prostitution is not included; and for taking into custody all persons found therein: and sec. 137 provides that every proprietor who keeps any building or any part of a building for any of such purposes, and every person "who aids or assists or takes any part in the management thereof," shall be liable to a penalty.

section libelled? (2) Should I, on the facts stated as proved, have Mar. 12, 1912.
convicted the accused?"

The case was heard on 12th March 1912, when the authorities M'Intyre v.
Thomson.
noted below were referred to in the arguments.¹

LORD DUNDAS.—[After stating the terms of the complaint]—The sections of the statute to which we have been referred are certainly not happily framed, and it is not very easy to understand why the language should have been exactly what it is. But at all events it is admitted by the prosecutor's counsel that in order to get his conviction he would have to prove that Thomson was a person found in a house as libelled. Now, the facts which were here found by the Magistrate, and which of course are final, disclose that the house is one stair up, and consists of two rooms and kitchen; that it had been conducted as a brothel for a period of three weeks prior to the date libelled; and that during that period the accused managed it as a brothel. Further, that the accused went upstairs on that day with the woman named in the complaint and a man, and let them into this house. He did not go in himself, but locked the door; and then the police-constables, who had been watching, came up the stairs and met the accused on the stair-landing near to the door of the house. They asked him to show them in; he at first declined, but finally did so, and on entering the constables found the man and woman inside, who admitted that they had come for an immoral purpose. The Magistrate says, that in view of the fact that the accused was not de facto found in the house at the time libelled, he found the charge not proven. The question therefore is, Was the accused found in that house within the meaning of the Act?

The word "found" is a flexible term, and it is quite clear, I think, that it must be interpreted in a reasonable sense and not applied too rigidly, otherwise the statute would be perfectly nugatory. We must read it in a reasonable sense, having regard to the nature of the offence which is libelled. Now, the place where this man was undoubtedly found was on the stair-landing just outside the door of the house. He was the manager of this brothel; he was in charge of the place, and had the key of the door. Now, this being so, was he "found in the house"? I cannot help thinking that he was. The place where the police came on him was the necessary and only access to the premises, and although other persons, no doubt, have common rights in a passage of this sort, it seems to me that none the less was he in the house in the circumstances stated in the case. I do not think we derive any help from the few cases that were cited, except indeed that we have the benefit of the views stated by the Lord Justice-General in one case, viz., that you must construe words of this sort in a reasonable sense, having regard to the offence charged.

I need say no more, for I desire to deal with this case as we find it, and I do not wish to discuss other cases which may arise hereafter, and which on their facts may be more difficult. In this case I hold that the accused ¹ For the appellant:—Martin v. M'Intyre, 1910 S. C. (J.) 72, 6 Adam, 252; Woods v. Lindsay, 1910 S. C. (J.) 88, 6 Adam, 294. For the respondent:—Wright v. Smith, (1903) 6 F. (J.) 18, 4 Adam, 316; Yorkshire Fire and Life Insurance Co. v. Clayton, (1881) 8 Q. B. D. 421, at p. 424.

Mar. 12, 1912. M'Intyre v. Thomson. was a person found in a house as libelled, and within the meaning of the statute. I think we should answer the first question put to us by a finding to that effect and not by a direct answer, as the question is not too happily framed. There is no need to answer the second question, because the procurator's counsel very properly indicated that he merely wished a direction in law, and did not ask us to remit the case back in order that the accused might be dealt with for the particular offence.

Lord Dundas.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. The sole question in the case is whether, it having been found as matter of fact that the respondent managed this brothel, he was found "in" the house within the meaning of the section, when he was in fact found on the landing at the head of the stair which led to the house. Now, if this had been the only house that was reached by that stair and landing, I think it would have been very difficult to say that he was not found within the house, and indeed counsel for the respondent was unable to put his case so high as that. Then, does it make any difference that certain other persons who occupy houses or flats in the same tenement, have in common with the respondent, a right to use that stair and landing? I think it makes no difference, and that within the meaning of this section the respondent was found in the house which the Magistrate has held was managed by him for an improper purpose. I therefore agree that we should pronounce the finding which your Lordship in the chair has suggested.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. No reason has been suggested why the keeping or managing of a brothel should not have been added to the offences which are mentioned in section 136, in which case it would have fallen under section 137, and no such question as we have here would have arisen. But for some reason a distinction has been made, and the element of the manager of the brothel being found in the building or part of the building has been introduced, and we must give reasonable effect to these words of the section. The main purpose evidently was to strike at the manager, but that is not enough; we must find that the manager was found in the building or part of the building. The first clause of the section, which refers to the obtaining of a warrant applicable to a building or part of a building, seems to me not unimportant. It is perfectly clear that a warrant of this kind—while it would not entitle the person holding it to enter other houses let to other people in the stair—would certainly entitle him to force the outer door, if there was such a door and it was fastened, at the foot of the common stair, as well as to force the actual door applicable to this particular house. I think it is reasonable to hold that this house had two doors, an inner door and an outer door, and without deciding what other premises, pertinents of this house, such as a common lavatory, may be covered by the section of the statute, it seems to me that we should hold that the landing of this house, as to which the accused had certain rights which are not in the least comparable with those he had in the pavement outside, was a part of the house here in question.

THE COURT found in answer to the first question that the respondent, on the facts stated, was a person found in a house, as charged in the complaint, within the meaning of the statute libelled.

Held that a person cannot be convicted of an offence under this section unless it appears that he acted with fraudulent intention.

Tramway—Statutory cars for workmen at reduced fares—Right to charge other passengers ordinary fares—Hamilton, Motherwell, and Wishaw Tramways Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cxxi.), sec. 75.

A tramway company was bound by its private Act to run cars for workmen at reduced fares specified in the Act.

Opinion (per Lord Salvesen and Lord Guthrie) that the Act did not warrant the company in discriminating in the matter of fares between workmen and other passengers who were allowed to travel in cars for workmen.

JOHN NIMMO, teacher, Barrhead, was charged in the Justice of the Peace Court of Lanarkshire on a summary complaint at the instance of the Lanarkshire Tramways Company. The charge against the accused was "that on 10th July 1911, you did travel on a car of complainers from Wishaw Cross to Ladysmith Street, Wishaw, and having only paid your fare to Ladysmith Street aforesaid, you knowingly and wilfully proceeded in such tramway car to Motherwell Cross, in the parish of Dalzell, and did not pay the additional fare for said additional distance, contrary to section 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870,* which, by section 2 of the Hamilton, Motherwell, and Wishaw Tramways Act, 1900, is incorporated with that Act, whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding Forty shillings, as set forth in said section."

The accused pleaded not guilty. No proof was led, the following minute of admissions being lodged in terms of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908:—"The accused, John Nimmo, maintains that he regularly journeyed on Monday mornings

The time occupied by travelling from Wishaw to Motherwell Cross is about half-an-hour.

Nimmo v.
Lanarkshire
Tramways Co.

"The complainers do not run their ordinary passenger-cars from Wishaw to Motherwell until 7.30 A.M., and accused, as also had other ordinary travellers (the complainers allowing ordinary passengers to travel on their workmen's cars), had regularly travelled on the Monday mornings referred to up till the 10th day of July 1911 mentioned in the complaint in the complainers' workmen's cars, which are run under the provisions of section 75 of the Hamilton, Motherwell, and Wishaw Tramways Act, 1900,* to the terms of which section and the Act itself the Court are respectfully referred. Accused up till said date had been regularly charged and had paid the toll authorised to be charged under said section of the Act for the journey between Wishaw and Motherwell, namely, 1d.

"Upon the said 10th day of July 1911 the accused, on way to his employment, boarded complainers' workmen's car at Wishaw, tendered and paid a penny for his fare to Motherwell, but on arriving at the stage at Ladysmith Street, Wishaw—which is the completion of the ordinary fare distance from Wishaw, and to which fare stage only the tram ticket on this day was, unnoticed by accused, punched—the conductor on complainers' car informed the accused that he would require to pay another penny for the completion of his journey to Motherwell, as the accused was not a workman, and his instructions were to charge the ordinary fare of 2d. for passengers other than workmen on workmen's cars for the journey between Wishaw and Motherwell. The accused informed him that he had regularly been charged and had paid the workmen's car rate only, which he believed to be the proper legal charge, refused to pay any additional sum for his journey, but gave the conductor his name and address. accused thereafter continued his journey to Motherwell Cross and left the car there. This complaint was subsequently served upon him." Mar. 13, 1912.
Nimmo v.
Lanarkshire
Tramways Co.

The accused having been convicted appealed to the High Court on a stated case.

The case (after quoting the terms of the minute of admissions as given above) set forth:—"In discussing the merits the respondents' agent pointed out (and it was admitted by appellant's agent) that in each workmen's car there were displayed in view of passengers (1) a table of the fares chargeable, and (2) a board indicating that such cars were for 'workmen.'

"After the Court had heard the respondents' agent, the appellant's agent discussed the merits and objected to the Court exercising jurisdiction in the case in respect that there was prima facie a question of civil right or title raised in the cause, namely, whether the respondents were entitled to exact from ordinary passengers allowed by the respondents to travel in their workmen's cars, run in terms of section 75 of said Hamilton, Motherwell, and Wishaw Tramways Act, 1900, fares exceeding the rates therein specified, and that the case consequently fell to be decided by proceedings in a civil Court.

"The Court repelled this plea, and (on the grounds that appellant was admittedly not one of the classes for whom the workmen's car in question was run, and that he continued his journey beyond the stage to which he had paid his fare after being challenged by the conductor of the car, and refusing to pay the additional fare for the additional distance) the justices held that the complaint had been proved, and found the appellant guilty as libelled, and (on account of the lengthened period during which the appellant had been allowed to travel in respondents' workmen's cars at the workmen's rates without being challenged by the conductor) the justices imposed no penalty, but admonished and dismissed the appellant."

The questions of law were:—" (1) Had the Court jurisdiction to decide the cause? and if so (2) Did the facts admitted justify a conviction of the contravention charged?"

The case was heard on 13th March 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The Justice of the Peace Court should have declined jurisdiction in this prosecution. The question involved in the case was whether, under the respondents' private Act, the appellant was entitled to travel at the workmen's rate in workmen's cars; and that question could be determined only in a civil action and not in a summary prosecution.¹ But, apart from this, the conviction was wrong. The appellant was right in maintaining that he was entitled to travel at the reduced rate; and, secondly, there could be no conviction under the Tramways Act, 1870, section 51, unless fraudulent intention on the part of the accused was proved,² and here the facts showed conclusively that there was no fraud intended. Reference was made to the Tramways Act, 1870, section 45.

Argued for the respondents;—There was no ground for the suggestion that the Justice of the Peace Court had no jurisdiction. In cases such as *Meiklejohn v. Fisherrow Harbour Commissioners*³ or Barlas v.

Mar. 13, 1912. Chalmers,¹ where there was a competition of heritable title, the jurisdiction of a summary criminal Court was ousted; but there were no questions unsuitable for such a Court in the present case.² The Court, having jurisdiction, had rightly convicted the appellant, for it was clear that he was not entitled to the benefit of workmen's rates; and intent to defraud need not be proved. *Thom's case*³ was not in point, as it was decided on the terms of section 96 of the Railways Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845.⁴

Nimmo v.
Lanarkshire
Tramways Co.

LORD SALVESEN.—The facts of this case have been ascertained by a joint minute under which they were to be accepted as if they had been duly proved in terms of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908; and the question is whether the accused was rightly convicted of a contravention of section 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which is incorporated in the Hamilton, Motherwell, and Wishaw Tramways Act of 1900.

Now, the offence which was charged against him was that he did travel on a car of the complainers, and having only paid his fare to Ladysmith Street, he knowingly proceeded on said car to Motherwell Cross, and did not pay the additional fare.

It is quite clear to my mind that if he had done that with intent to get the benefit of the extra mileage at the expense of the Company, and well knowing that he was not entitled to it, he would have been guilty of the contravention charged against him. But these are not the facts here. The appellant is a teacher, who for two years had been in the habit of travelling by this early morning car which the Company run, in terms of section 75 of their own Act of Parliament, which requires them to run trams at such hours in the morning as are most convenient for artisans, mechanics, daily labourers, clerks, and shop assistants. Now, the appellant on the occasion in question was asked to pay an additional fare of a penny, and he declined to do so. He gave his name and address, and stated that he considered he was entitled to go to the end of his journey without paying an additional fare, he having paid as much as any workman would have paid for the same distance. The element of fraud, therefore, seems to me to be totally absent. It is not suggested that he was intending to cheat the Tramway Company of their rights. He was maintaining, as every citizen is entitled to do, a civil right on his part, and I think it was a somewhat harsh proceeding to bring him before a Court primarily of criminal jurisdiction and have him convicted in the same way as if he had been travelling with intent to defraud the Company. The case of Thom,³ to which we were referred, seems to settle that a contravention of this kind is not really made out unless the person charged is proved to have had a fraudulent or criminal intent. That being absent in this case, I am of opinion that the Magistrates ought not to have convicted.

It is unnecessary that we should decide the other questions, which are of general application. All I shall say with regard to Mr Duffes's contention upon section 75 is that, as at present advised, I think the appellant was Mar. 13, 1912.

 right in the view which he took of his legal liability. It may be that the ^{Nimmo v.} Tramway Company could have refused to have taken him as a passenger on ^{Lanarkshire} a workmen's car: I express no opinion upon that point. But having ^{Tramways Co.} admitted him on to this workmen's car, they need to make out that they ^{Lord Salvesen.} have statutory warrant for discriminating in the matter of fares between persons who are within the enumerated classes and those who are not.
 Now, as matter of construction, I do not think the section is capable of being so construed. The provision is that the Company are to run certain cars, not for artisans and so on only, but at such hours as are most convenient for artisans, mechanics, daily labourers, clerks, and shop assistants; and then it is provided that all tolls or charges on such cars are not to exceed a halfpenny per mile. I see no warrant for the Company discriminating between one passenger and another, more especially as the Company maintains that the limitation of liability contained in the same section applies to all who may use these workmen's cars. That is the view which I at present entertain on the point; but, of course, that will not form res judicata in any civil proceedings which the Company may choose to institute in the way of declarator or otherwise. But it makes it very clear that we cannot say that this appellant was guilty of any offence when he was simply maintaining, on reasonable grounds, his rights as a citizen, as he conceived them to be, under certain Acts of Parliament which define the rights of the undertakers of the tramway system in question.

For these reasons, and without expressing any opinion on the question of civil jurisdiction, on which the argument was not seriously pressed, I am for sustaining the appeal and holding that the second question should be answered in the negative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. There are three questions raised here in the two queries in the case, the first question being, Had the Court jurisdiction to decide the case? and the other two questions being raised by the second query, namely, Could the appellant be properly convicted unless it appeared that his action was fraudulent? and, secondly (this being his argument on the statute of 1900), Was he entitled to do what he did, and to refuse the extra payment which was asked from him? The question of jurisdiction was, I think, cleared up in the end by a citation of authorities which seemed to show that there was no case where, on a question of construction of a statute not involving any question of heritable right or competing title, the Justiciary Court came to the conclusion that the matter could be dealt with only by way of declarator.

On the question of fraud I entirely agree with your Lordship, and I think that the rubric of section 51 of the Tramways Act, 1907, although not authoritative, is quite accurate, namely, "Penalty on passengers practising fraud on the promoters."

On the last question I also agree with your Lordship, although it is not necessary to come to any final conclusion upon it. It raises a very large question directly affecting general tramway interests and indirectly general railway interests. It was Mr Wark's contention that you should look only at the origin and object of the Act; but, on the other hand, I do not find any

Mar. 13, 1912. provision in the Act to the effect that, in the case of cars which are meant for workmen, if the Tramway Company choose to allow other people to board them they will be, in the event of an accident, under a restriction of liability and entitled to differentiate between such cars and those expressly mentioned in the section. It seems to me that these are in the same position as if they were labelled " $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a mile cars," and no such distinction may be made. But, as your Lordship has said, the ground connected with the necessity for fraud is sufficient for the decision of this case.

Nimmo v.
Lanarkshire
Tramways Co.

Lord Guthrie.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree that in the circumstances stated the appellant was not guilty of any offence, and therefore we should answer question 2 in the negative, and that is enough to dispose of the case. It is unnecessary to answer the first question.

As regards the construction, scope, and meaning of section 75 of the local Act of 1900, that is a matter which may form the subject of proceedings hereafter and elsewhere, and, for myself, I express no opinion upon it.

THE COURT answered the second question in the negative, found it unnecessary to answer the first question, and sustained the appeal.

No. 8. THE WARDENS AND COMMONALTY OF THE MISTERY OF THE FISHMONGERS OF THE CITY OF LONDON AND ANOTHER, Complainers (Appellants).

Fishmongers
of London v.
Stiven.

WILLIAM STIVEN, Respondent.—Hon. W. Watson.

Fishing—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 21—Possession of salmon in close time—Defence that salmon taken with rod and line—Onus of proof.

The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 21, renders liable to a penalty any person who shall "have in his possession any salmon taken" during the "annual close time." It has been decided that "annual close time" refers only to net-fishing, and that there is no offence if the salmon was taken by rod and line at a time when rod-fishing was open.

Held that proof of possession within the close time is prima facie proof of the offence, and that the onus of establishing capture by rod and line rests on the accused.

HIGH COURT. WILLIAM STIVEN, fishmonger, Dunfermline, was charged in the Sheriff Court there on a summary complaint at the instance of the "Wardens and Commonalty of the Mistery of the Fishmongers of the City of London" and Robert Pringle, W.S., Edinburgh. The charge against the accused was that on 12th October 1911, "at the shop occupied by you in Randolph Street, Dunfermline aforesaid, you had in your possession a salmon taken within the limits of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Victoria, chapter 123), between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time which was in force at the time, contrary to section 21 of the said Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868.* . . ."

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), enacts:—Sec. 21. "Any person who shall buy, sell, or expose for sale, or

The accused pleaded not guilty, and, after a trial, the Sheriff-sub-stitute (Umpherston) found the charge not proven. Mar. 14, 1912.

The complainers appealed on a stated case, which set forth:—

Fishmongers
of London v.
Stiven.

“The following facts were admitted or proved at the trial, namely:—

“(1) The respondent was in possession, at the shop occupied by him as a fishmonger and poulterer in Randolph Street, Dunfermline, in the county of Fife, of one salmon upon the 12th day of October 1911, being a date between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest close time which was in force at that date for the whole of Scotland.

“(3) The respondent had instructed the said George Davis never to send salmon to him which had not been legally caught. He did not know where Davis got the said fish or how it had been caught.

“(4) The said salmon was purchased by the said George Davis on Wednesday, 11th October 1911, from a man named Hunter, both Davis and Hunter being then in their respective boats on the River Forth. George Davis did not ask, and was not informed by, Hunter where or how the fish had been caught. On said date the River Forth and most other rivers in Scotland were open for fishing by rod and line.

“I found the charge in the said complaint not proven, in respect that the accused took all necessary precautions to see that any fish possessed by him was not illegally taken.”

The questions of law were:—“(1) Was the respondent bound to prove that the said salmon was taken beyond the limits of the Act, meaning thereby outwith Scotland? (2) Was I entitled to hold the offence charged not proven?”

The case was heard on 14th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute's decision was wrong. All that the appellants required to prove under their complaint was that the respondent was in possession of the salmon as libelled; they did not require to prove how the salmon was taken, and, although the respondent would not be liable if the salmon was caught by rod and line,¹ the burden of proving that the salmon was caught in this way rested on him.²

Argued for the respondent;—Section 21 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, put the onus on the accused to show that the salmon was taken outside the limits of the Act. The burden thus expressly placed on the accused could not be enlarged. The defence here was that the have in his possession, any salmon taken within the limits of this Act between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time which is in force at the time for any district, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5, and to a further penalty not exceeding £2 for every salmon so bought, sold, or exposed for sale, or in his possession; and any salmon so bought, sold, or exposed for sale, or in his possession shall be forfeited; and the burden of proving that any such salmon was caught beyond the limits of this Act shall lie on the person selling or exposing the same for sale, or having the same in his possession.”

Mar. 14, 1912. salmon was caught by rod and line, and it lay on the complainers to show that this was not so,¹ and this they had failed to prove.

Fishmongers
of London
v. Stiven.

LORD SALVESEN.—I think this is a very clear case. The complaint is brought under section 21 of the Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123, and the complaint is that the respondent had in his possession a salmon taken within the limits of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time which was in force at the time, contrary to section 21. I think the meaning of that section is not really doubtful, although the collocation of the various sentences of which it is composed might have been better arranged. The essence of the offence is being in possession of a salmon between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest close time. That has been interpreted to mean the close time for net fishing, and accordingly that must be read into the Act now in consequence of judicial decisions to that effect. The words “taken within the limits” appear to me to be almost unnecessary in view of the qualification which follows, and which entitles a person, who is in possession of a salmon within the period of time mentioned, to prove that the salmon of which he is in possession was not taken within the limits in Scotland to which the Act applies, which again has been interpreted to mean the whole of Scotland. If you have possession within the particular period, the offence is prima facie committed.

It is quite true that the Courts have also held that, in addition to the defence which is expressly mentioned, the accused may elide the operation of the statute by proving that the salmon of which he is in possession has been caught by rod and line during the period that the privilege of rod and line fishing continued in the district in which it was caught. I think it is quite clear that the onus of proving a special defence of that kind is upon the accused, just as the onus of proving that the salmon has been taken outside of Scotland is upon the accused. It is a special defence which, the Courts have held, may be implied from the statute taken as a whole; but it is a defence which the accused must establish. If it were otherwise, it would seem to me that the whole of this provision would be nugatory, because it would be upon the prosecutor in each case to prove by what method the salmon was taken, and, unless he could do that, he would not be able to get a conviction against the person who had exposed it for sale. That is plainly not what the statute means, because the essence of the offence is the possession of a salmon during the close time. Accordingly I think the Sheriff has erred, and I propose that we should answer the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and found that, on the facts stated in the case, the Sheriff-substitute should have convicted the respondent.

Sheriff—Small-debt procedure—Review—Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 31—Wilful deviation from statute which prevents substantial justice being done—Multiplepoinding—Competency.

Britannic Assurance Co., Limited, v. James Henderson, Limited.

The Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, sec. 31, permits appeal from the decision of the Sheriff in small-debt actions on certain grounds only, including "such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done."

A small-debt action of multiplepoinding was brought in name of an insurance company by a creditor of a deceased policy-holder, the fund in medio being the sum due under the policy. The summons did not comply with section 10 of the Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, which enacts that the "common debtors" shall be cited, the only parties cited being creditors of the deceased. The representatives of the deceased had not confirmed, and were not cited. The Sheriff-substitute, although aware of the fact that the statute had not been complied with, repelled an objection to the competency of the action based on that fact, and pronounced a decree of ranking and payment.

Held that an appeal against this interlocutor was competent, as the Sheriff-substitute's intentional disregard of the statute was a deviation therefrom, which had taken place "wilfully," and which also prevented substantial justice from being done in respect that a decree in the action would not afford the insurance company complete exoneration.

Held also that the multiplepoinding was incompetent, and the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor recalled.

ON 6th June 1911 James Henderson, Limited, carriage-hirers, Glasgow, brought a small-debt action of multiplepoinding* in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow in name of the Britannic Assurance Company, Limited, as pursuers and nominal raisers. The summons bore that the nominal raisers were the holders of £17 contained in a policy with them on the life of the deceased Alexander Gray, who resided in Glasgow; and it called as defenders Dr J. The facts of the case were stated in the note of the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) as follows:—"Alexander Gray, now deceased, was assured with pursuers' company under a policy dated 14th May 1900. Gray having died, there is a small sum of about £14 payable under the policy. Gray has left a widow, but she is in America, and she will not move to collect the money. Then he has left a document which may, I think, be regarded as a will in favour of his mother, giving her as a special legacy the sum payable under the policy, but she will not act, for she would have the cost of confirmation to face and the preferable claims for deathbed and funeral expenses will obviously more than swallow up the fund. In these circumstances the funeral undertaker, in order to recover his account out of the insurance money, brings this action of multiplepounding in the Small-Debt Court."

The policy contained a clause, which will be found quoted in the Sheriff-substitute's note, infra. p. 33, providing for the discharge of the Company on payment being made to certain specified representatives of the assured.

The Britannic Assurance Company, Limited, having objected to the competency of the action, the Sheriff-substitute repelled the objections,* and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor ranking the

* "NOTE.—[After stating the facts as above]—Henderson, the funeral undertaker, is the real raiser. The action is in the name of the Assurance Company as pursuers and nominal raisers. The convenience of this proceeding is obvious, but the Assurance Company challenges its competency. I am exceedingly averse to holding that the procedure is incompetent, because the system of industrial assurance is very wide spread, and the sum payable under such policies being generally small, the Small-Debt Court is a most convenient tribunal for discharging the Assurance Company and allocating the amount due under such a policy amongst relatives or creditors or others entitled to it. But, of course, competency cannot be sacrificed to convenience, and if it were the case, as the pursuers contend, that the Assurance Company would not be exonerated under a decree upon this summons, then I could not hold that the process is competent, for the first and leading object of any multiplepounding process is to exoner the holder of the fund. It does not, however, appear to me that there is any doubt that a decree in this action will exoner the pursuers, and if they are exonerated they have no interest to oppose the action.

"No creditor has arrested the fund in the hands of the Assurance Company, and no creditor could do so, for there is no common debtor as regards this fund. One peculiarity of the present summons is that all reference to the common debtor has been deleted, and I have some doubt as to whether, speaking generally, an action of multiplepounding can ever be a competent process where there is no common debtor, and still graver doubt as to whether under the Small Debt Act the elimination of the common debtor from the statutory form of summons does not vitiate the process.

"I do not attach any importance to the fact that no arrestments have been used, for the old ideas about double distress are not now entertained, and wherever the holder of a fund is distressed by competing claims being made upon it—that is to say, wherever there is more than one party with an ostensible claim—I think an action of multiplepounding is a competent process.

"On the other hand, small-debt procedure is a subject of statutory enact-real raisers and the compearing defenders, and decerning against the Assurance Company for payment to them of the fund in medio. Mar. 14, 1912.

Against this interlocutor the Assurance Company appealed to the Circuit Court at Glasgow on a note of appeal which set forth the following grounds of appeal:—“(a) Incompetency. The appellants under the policy referred to in the summons are bound to pay the sum assured to the ‘representatives, executors, administrators, or permitted assigns’ of the assured. The claimants are neither representatives, executors, administrators, nor assigns of the assured, and have, therefore, no claim against the appellants. There is accordingly no double distress, and the appellants would not be discharged of their obligation in the policy. (b) Wilful deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments. The summons is not in conformity with Schedule E and section 10 of the Small Debt Act, 1837. There must be a ment, and section 10 of the Small Debt Act of 1837 is peremptory in its terms. A multiplepinding action in the Small-Debt Court is directed to be raised in the form of Schedule E which includes the common debtor as a party, and it is an express direction of the statute that the common debtor shall be called as a party. Probably, however, the breadth of view which subsequently to 1837 the law has come to take of the matter of double distress may also be reasonably accorded now to the question of the common debtor. If it is competent, as in the general case I think it now is, to use a process of multiplepinding to exoner the holder and distribute any fund to which there are rival claims, then I think section 10 of the Small Debt Act may be read in the light of the modern view of double distress, and so read, that section seems to me to make this action competent.

“I think it is clear that under section 10 of the Small Debt Act it would have been competent for the Assurance Company itself to have raised an action of multiplepinding, for the only requirement of section 10 is that the fund is in some way claimed by more than one party. If it would have been competent for the Assurance Company itself to raise this action, then I think it is competent for any claimant also to do so unless he is excluded under special contract.

“It is suggested that the policy here is such a special contract excluding creditors. The policy bears that ‘production by the said Company of a receipt for any moneys payable hereunder signed by any person being either an executor or administrator or the husband or wife or a relation by blood or connection by marriage of the assured shall be a discharge to the Company for the same, and shall be final and conclusive evidence to all intents and purposes that such sum has been duly paid to and received by the person or persons lawfully and rightfully entitled to the same, and that all claims and demands whatsoever against the Company in respect of this policy have been fully satisfied.’ In the present case nobody will confirm, so there is no executor to grant a discharge to the Company. The widow will not do so, and no blood relation is in a position to do so. But I do not think that that exhausts the possibility of the Company getting a discharge.

“It would be most unfair to creditors to hold that the Assurance Company is not bound to pay the money to anybody, merely because none of the parties mentioned in the policy is in the position to grant a discharge for it. Of course it is quite true that a creditor could get himself confirmed as executor qua creditor of the deceased Alexander Gray, and what the Assurance Company wants is to be sure that whoever takes up this money is in a position to grant a good and valid discharge which can be afterwards pled against any claimant, such as the widow or the mother or anybody else. If it were worth while perhaps the strictly formal course would be

Mar. 14, 1912. common debtor, but there is no common debtor in the summons, the words 'common debtor' in the statutory form of the summons having been deleted."

Britannic Assurance Co.,
Limited, v.
James
Henderson,
Limited.

The appeal was heard at the Circuit Court in Glasgow on 28th February 1912 by Lord Dundas, who certified it for hearing by the High Court at Edinburgh.

The case was heard before the High Court on 14th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The grounds of appeal fell within those specified in section 31 of the Small Debt Act of 1837, and, therefore, the appeal was competent. Section 10 of that Act was imperative, and, as the Sheriff-substitute had consciously disregarded its provisions, there was wilful deviation from a statutory enactment. Also the course followed involved serious injustice to the appellants, because they would be ordained to pay the fund in medio without obtaining a proper discharge. On the merits the multiplepounding was clearly incompetent. The fund belonged to the executor of the deceased, and the claims of creditors were merely riders on his claim.¹ The action was really an attempt to distribute the estate of a deceased person without an executor being appointed. The Sheriff-substitute for the funeral undertaker to take proceedings in the Commissary Court to be decerned as executor-creditor of the deceased Alexander Gray, but the cost of this would greatly diminish if not swallow up the estate which consists only of the small sum payable under this policy. In the circumstances I have come to the conclusion, although not without some hesitation, that the present summons is competent. I reach this view mainly upon the broad ground that it would have been competent for the Assurance Company itself to bring an action, and that where it is competent for the holder of a fund to raise an action, it is also competent for a claimant upon that fund to raise an action in the holder's name.

"Apart from the technical view where the fund is a small sum payable under an industrial insurance policy (the main purpose of which is to provide a fund to meet funeral expenses) it would be most inequitable that such a creditor as a funeral undertaker should be forced to go to the expense of confirming as executor-creditor when there is a ready means in the Small-Debt Court of distributing the insurance fund. The form of the small-debt decree exonerates the pursuer and nominal raiser, and all the other parties are 'prohibited from molesting the pursuer thereanent in all time coming.' I think, therefore, that the fear of the present pursuers that they may afterwards be annoyed by somebody else claiming the fund is rather visionary, and, if any claimant did appear, the production of decree in the present process would be an immediate and sufficient answer to any possible claim. I can conceive of no more useful purpose which the Small-Debt Court machinery can be put to than to save a small estate like this from being squandered in the expense of more formal proceedings by creditors of the deceased, and even if there is any technical doubt about the competency, the nominal raisers can be in no way prejudiced by the fact that this action has been raised by a creditor rather than by the holder of the fund. It is against public policy to force a creditor to take a more expensive course to recover his debt when a less expensive course is open to him, and when the adoption of that less expensive course cannot prejudice the holder of the fund.

"In the whole circumstances I am not prepared to sustain the nominal raisers' plea that the action is incompetent. The amount payable under the policy is I understand agreed upon as £13, 19s. I have accordingly ordered claims in the usual way."

was in error in assuming that the appellants could have brought the action. Mar. 14, 1912.

Argued for the respondents;—The appeal was incompetent. Wilful deviation from a statute in the sense of section 31 of the Small Debt Act was capricious deviation.¹ There had been no such deviation here, and there was no real risk of injustice to the appellants. Considerations of expediency were all in favour of the Sheriff-substitute's action. But assuming appeal were permitted there was no ground for holding that the action was incompetent. There was no common debtor who could be called, and therefore the statutory requirement that the common debtor should be called did not apply. In circumstances similar to the present, actions of multiplepoinding had been entertained.²

Britannic
Assurance Co.,
Limited, v.
James
Henderson,
Limited.

LORD GUTHRIE.—This case, although dealing with a small sum of money and coming from the Small-Debt Court, raises a general question of some importance. What the Sheriff has done in finding the action competent by his interlocutor of 21st June 1911 is objected to on two grounds: first, that, contrary to section 31 of the Small Debt Act of 1837, the Sheriff wilfully deviated from the statutory form; and, second, that, contrary to the said section, what the Sheriff did prevented substantial justice being done. It was put as a separate point that there was no double distress. This is not an independent point. We cannot interfere if the Sheriff has found double distress in fact when there was none, or even if he has wrongly held in law that double distress was not required. This objection can only prevail if we think that the absence of double distress has led to substantial injustice being done. It seems to me that both objections are well founded.

In the multiplepoinding the Assurance Company, who had the policy on the life of the deceased, amounting to £17, were called, and also certain people who were creditors of the deceased. One of these happened to be his mother, but she was not called as one of the representatives of the deceased, but on account of some claim—apparently a good claim—which she had for nursing him in his last illness. The result is that nobody was called who had any adverse claim or who had any knowledge which would enable them to question the creditors' claims to which I have referred. It so happened that there was enough money to satisfy all the claims. In these circumstances the Assurance Company, who are the appellants here, say that if the Sheriff is right in his view they will not be in the position, which they ought to be in, of having a decree that would enable them to be safe in the future against subsequent claims either by other creditors who are not called, or by the representatives of the deceased disputing the soundness of the present creditors' claims. The only interest the Assurance Company have to raise this question is to get a discharge good against all the world.

Now, it is said that whether the Sheriff was right or wrong, or however much he was wrong, this question cannot be raised. It appears to me that

Britannic Assurance Co., Limited, v. James Henderson, Limited.
Lord Guthrie. The statute entitles this Court to inquire into what has been done in the Small-Debt Court if it appears that there has been a wilful deviation from the statutory form, or if what has been done has prevented substantial justice from being done. It is not denied that there has been deviation from the statutory form; but it is said that that deviation has not been wilful. It seems to me that the view taken by Lord Kinnear in one of the cases referred to is well founded where he interpreted the word "wilful" to mean "of set purpose." If that is the proper view, it is quite clear that the Sheriff, with his eyes open, deviated from the statutory form, and justified his doing so on the ground of convenience and public policy—grounds which might have been extremely proper for the Legislature to have considered and to have acted upon, but which were not open to the Sheriff to consider, and, if he has considered and given effect to them, we are bound to put the matter right.

He says expressly: "It is an express direction of the statute that the common debtor shall be called as a party." Mr Macquisten pointed out that, so far as the schedule was concerned, there might be room for difference of opinion; but he did not dispute, what the Sheriff expressly affirms, that the statute, in section 10, distinctly states that the common debtor shall be cited. But then it is said that in this case the deviation was unavoidable, because there was no common debtor. The Sheriff has not given effect to that, although he has pointed out that the widow refused to grant a discharge to the Company, and that there was no blood relation in a position to do so. It appears to me clear that there is a common debtor. The estate belonged to the deceased and was part of his hæreditas jacens. The policy by which the appellants were bound to walk provides that the proceeds were to be paid to the "representatives, executors, administrators, or permitted assigns" of the assured. I do not see any difficulty in the summons being made to comply with the statute and calling, whether they were willing to appear or not—that is no concern of those who framed the summons—the representatives of the deceased.

Mr Macquisten figured cases where there might be no common debtor; but these would raise questions with which we have nothing to do here. If there is a common debtor, then the question simply is, Was the Sheriff-substitute entitled to pass a summons in which the common debtor was eliminated from the statutory form? He says himself that he has some doubt as to whether there can be a competent process where there is no common debtor; and he says he has "still graver doubt as to whether under the Small Debt Act the elimination of the common debtor from the statutory form of summons does not vitiate the process." It seems to me that that doubt is well founded, and that the Sheriff should have held that, the statutory form having been deviated from, he was bound to hold the summons incompetent.

If so, that is sufficient for the determination of the case. But I further think that the Assurance Company are quite entitled to maintain that what the Sheriff has done has prevented substantial justice; because he has put them in a position which might not in this particular case lead to any harm, but which, in another case, which would be ruled by this case, might lead to the Company being put into a very serious position in paying away Mar. 14, 1912. money to poor people from whom it would be improbable that they could get it back. That being so, the question of there being no double distress becomes a practical question productive of substantial injustice. I cannot agree with what the Sheriff says in his judgment, where he seems to say that, if you have a number of claims you have a case where a multiplepounding is competent, whether there be any competition or not between these claims. In that sense he holds competing claims to be identical with several claims. That is clearly wrong; and therefore that is another ground for sustaining the appeal.

Britannic
Assurance Co.,
Limited, v.
James
Henderson,
Limited.

Lord Guthrie.

In these circumstances I think we must give effect to the appellants' contention, and refuse to sustain what the Sheriff has done.

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree. The effect of what the Sheriff-substitute has done is to constitute an action of multiplepounding in the Small-Debt Court as a mode of distributing the estate of a deceased person. Now that is not merely a novel but, as I think, an entirely incompetent proceeding. There is legislation which provides for the distribution of estates of solvent persons and for making up a title to such estates; and where the estates are small, provision is made for the expenses being kept at a minimum. I never heard of an action of multiplepounding being used in order to supersede the necessity of executry administration, but that is what the Sheriff-substitute has, in effect, done by sustaining this action of multiplepounding; and he has done so in a case where he has thought fit to leave out of the proceedings entirely the only persons who are interested in the division of the estate of the deceased, to wit, those who would be entitled to it in consequence of the death. That makes it possible for us to interfere with his decision; because, as Lord Guthrie has pointed out, in order to reach that result he has committed a wilful deviation from the forms prescribed by the Small Debt Act.

I have no hesitation in agreeing with the view that he has also committed substantial injustice; because I do not think that a decree in a multiplepounding, so called, to which certain creditors only are cited, would exonerate the holders of the fund as in a question with other persons who are not parties to that multiplepounding. Accordingly, I agree with Lord Guthrie in the result at which he has arrived.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, and decerned.

ROBERT TAYLOR, Complainer.—T. G. Robertson.
 GEORGE NICOL (Burgh Prosecutor, Stirling), Respondent.—
C. H. Brown.

Police Offences—Street—Burgh—Regulation of traffic—Bye-law—Order—Ultra vires—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 385.

Under sec. 385 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the magistrates of a burgh may make "bye-laws and issue notices and orders," inter alia, "regulating the traffic, or any particular traffic, in streets within the burgh." The Act further provides that such bye-laws shall be confirmed by the Sheriff and the Secretary for Scotland, but contains no such provision with regard to notices and orders.

Held that an "order," made by magistrates in pursuance of this section, by which omnibuses were forbidden to turn in certain streets of the burgh was invalid, in respect that, as the regulation was intended to be permanent, it could be competently made only by bye-law.

Baikie v. Charleson, (1901) 3 F. (J.) 54, 3 Adam, 323, followed.

HIGH COURT. ON 13th December 1911 Robert Taylor was charged in the Police Court at Stirling on a summary complaint at the instance of George Nicol, burgh prosecutor. The charge was that "on 9th December 1911, in Barnton Street, in the burgh of Stirling, you did contravene the Order made by the Magistrates of the royal burgh of Stirling for the regulation of street traffic, dated the 28th day of March 1910, under the powers conferred on them by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 385 (1),* in so far as you, while acting as driver of motor char-à-banc M. S. 74, the property of Messrs Robert Taylor & Son, carriage-hirers, Bannockburn, and then plying for hire between Stirling and Bannockburn aforesaid, did turn said motor char-à-banc in Barnton Street aforesaid, instead of as prescribed by Order at that part of Viewfield Place opposite the County Buildings in the burgh of Stirling aforesaid, whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings, and, in default of payment, to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, section 48."

The accused, having been convicted and admonished, brought a bill of suspension in which he averred:—(Stat. 2) "On 28th March 1910 the Magistrates of Stirling made an Order in the following terms:—'The Magistrates of the royal burgh of Stirling, by virtue of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 385 (1), hereby order that no omnibuses plying for hire, whether driven by motor power

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), enacts:—Sec. 385. "The magistrates may from time to time make bye-laws and issue notices and orders—(1) Regulating the traffic, or any particular traffic, in streets within the burgh; (2) Diverting temporarily out of any street or streets traffic of every kind, or such particular kinds of traffic as may be specified in any such order or notice; (3) Prescribing the streets in or through which particular kinds of traffic shall not be permitted, or where permitted the hours within which they are permitted; (4) Prohibiting or regulating public processions . . ."

Under sec. 318 bye-laws under the Act (with certain exceptions not here material) require to be confirmed by the Sheriff and the Secretary for Scotland; and sec. 319 provides for the advertisement of notice of the intention to apply for confirmation and for the hearing of objections. There are no such provisions in regard to notices and orders.

or horses, and approaching from Port Street, King Street, or Station Road, shall be turned in the streets known as Murray Place and Barnton Street, within the burgh of Stirling, and that the turning place for such omnibuses shall be at that part of Viewfield Place opposite the County Buildings. Every person committing a breach of this Order shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.' Thereafter the said Order was published in Stirling, and on or about 5th April 1910 copies of it were sent by the Town-Clerk of Stirling to the various carriage-hirers in the burgh, with a request that they should instruct their men 'to give careful attention.' (Stat. 3)

Mar. 14, 1912.
Taylor v.
Nicol.

"The said Order purports to make, and is interpreted by the respondent and the Magistrates of Stirling as making, permanent regulations for street traffic in Stirling. Moreover, the regulations therein contained constitute an unreasonable and unnecessary interference with the business of carriage-hirers in Stirling. There are places within the area dealt with by the Order, other than 'that part of Viewfield Place opposite the County Buildings,' where there is ample room for omnibuses to turn without danger to or obstruction of the other street traffic. No opportunity was given to any private citizen in Stirling to object to the said Order or the regulations contained therein. If the Magistrates of Stirling, in making permanent regulations for street traffic in the burgh, had proceeded by way of bye-laws duly confirmed by the Sheriff, the complainer would have had an opportunity of objecting, and would have objected to any regulations such as are contained in the said Order."

Answers were lodged by the respondent, George Nicol, in which he averred, inter alia, that the regulations in the Order were reasonable and necessary for the safety of the public, and were within the powers conferred on the Magistrates by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 385 (1).

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—The conviction and sentence complained of ought to be suspended simpliciter, in respect—(1) That the complaint is irrelevant. (2) That the said Order of the Magistrates is not authorised by the statute by virtue of which it bears to have been made, and is ultra vires and illegal.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The bill of suspension should be refused in respect that the Order complained of was made in conformity with section 385 (1) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and within the powers conferred upon the Magistrates thereby.

The case was heard on 14th March 1912.

At the hearing *Baikie v. Charleson*¹ having been cited for the complainer, counsel for the respondent submitted that that decision did not rule this case, as the Order there considered fell under subsection (3) of section 385 of the Burgh Police Act, and was a prohibition of traffic, whereas the Order complained of here fell under subsection (1) and merely regulated, and did not prohibit, traffic.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Mr Brown has said all that could be said with force and effectiveness; but I think it all tends to show the barrenness of his case. It was decided in *Baikie's case*¹ that the opening words of section 385 are used distributively. We have in subsection (2) an illustration of Mar. 14, 1912. the kind of thing to which a notice or order is applicable, viz., "diverting temporarily out of any street or streets traffic of every kind, or such particular kinds of traffic as may be specified in any such order or notice." I can conceive many situations in which for temporary purposes orders are more appropriate, if for no other reason than that their purpose would be frustrated if the delay involved in submitting a bye-law for the approval of the Sheriff had to be incurred. Here there is no doubt that the Order in question is of a permanent character, even although it may be abrogated at any time. It is permanent in the ordinary sensible meaning of that word. Its permanent character is shown by the fact that it has already been in force for upwards of a year. The question is—Does what has been done fall within the category of bye-laws, for which the confirmation of the Sheriff is required?

Taylor v.
Nicol.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Mr Brown's argument would allow magistrates to evade the right of appeal to the Sheriff to which the members of the public are entitled. I cannot assent to this. Every regulation of a permanent character—as distinguished from one of a character restricted as to time, and for a temporary reason—which interferes with the liberty of the public, can be made effective only by a bye-law submitted to the Sheriff and confirmed by him after objectors, if any, have been heard. I cannot conceive a clearer case than this in which a permanent regulation falls within the category of things which must be done by bye-law. Though Baikie's case¹ was under subsection (3) of the section the principles of that case point to the regulation in this case being appropriate to be carried out by bye-law.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur. I think that this case is ruled by Baikie v. Charleson,¹ and I agree with the reasoning which led the Judges in that case to find that a prohibition of any particular kind of traffic can only be effected by bye-law. I hope that in future, magistrates, acting in virtue of their powers under section 385, will keep in view, when making regulations which are intended to be of a permanent character, that they must obtain the sanction of the Sheriff to the proposed regulation, and so allow people affected by it to have an opportunity of being heard on their objections.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur.

THE COURT passed the bill and suspended the conviction and sentence.

M'Lean &

June 13, 1912. At the calling of the libel at the first diet the complainer objected to the relevancy of both charges on the grounds “(1) that said charges do not disclose a crime at common law; and (2) that the statements in said charges were entirely wanting in specification.” The Sheriff-substitute (Scott Moncrieff) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the objections, and thereafter, the accused having pleaded not guilty, pronounced an interlocutor continuing the case to the second diet.

Muir v. Hart.

The accused then brought a bill of advocacy and suspension in which he craved the Court to suspend the judgments and to quash the proceedings, or otherwise to advocate the proceedings, to recall the interlocutors, and to remit the libel to the Sheriff at Glasgow or his substitute, with instructions to dismiss the same. In the bill, after setting forth the objections taken in the Sheriff Court, he averred:—“The complainer maintains that certain portions of said indictment are unintelligible, and that it is impossible for him, owing to the vague and contradictory allegations made in the indictment, to understand what the charges made against him are. The productions made increase the complainer’s difficulties. It is not possible for the complainer to discover whether the transactions referred to ever were M’Lean & Company to believe that the said contracts were so authorised and instructed, and were transactions for behoof of the said Thomas R. Forsyth and Robert Gilchrist respectively; and you having made the said contracts without the authority and instructions of the said Thomas R. Forsyth and Robert Gilchrist, whereby the said R. A. M’Lean & Company, being liable for the price of the said shares, did suffer loss to the amount of £8, 19s. 2d. on the said shares of the British South Africa Company (Chartered), and to the amount of £736, 14s. 4d. on the said shares of the Tanganyika Concessions, Limited, when said shares were sold on their discovering that the purchases were not authorised, you did, in the office of the said R. A. M’Lean & Company, at 44 West George Street aforesaid, on the respective dates set opposite the names of the said Thomas R. Forsyth and Robert Gilchrist in the schedule hereto annexed, the said R. A. M’Lean & Company being then in the belief induced by you that the said shares had been purchased on behalf of the said Thomas R. Forsyth and Robert Gilchrist respectively, represent to Robert Andrew M’Lean, partner of said firm of R. A. M’Lean & Company, and Walter Johnstone Wilson, cashier to the said firm, that you would pay to the said Thomas R. In these circumstances the complainer respectfully submits that it is unjust and oppressive that he should be tried before a jury on said indictment, which as regards both charges is in substance and in form unprecedented."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The libels complained of being irrelevant, the complainer is entitled to a warrant suspending the said interlocutors, in terms of the prayer of the bill, with expenses as craved.

The bill came before the Court (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) on 12th January 1912, when the respondent objected to the competency of the advocacy. The Court remitted the case to a full bench, before which it was heard on 24th February 1912.

Argued for the respondent ;—Advocation in regard to the relevancy of a libel was incompetent. If this advocacy were competent, then an advocacy in regard to the Sheriff's decision at the first diet in a High Court case would also be competent. As the law stood before 1853, an advocacy of an interlocutor finding the libel relevant was not possible, because the relevancy was dealt with on the day of the trial and immediately before the jury were sworn to try the case¹; and this was the procedure both in the High Court and in the Sheriff Court.² The present practice of having two diets was introduced by the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1853,³ and in 1855 an advocacy in circumstances similar to the present was held incompetent in Jameson v. Lothian.⁴ The Criminal Procedure Act of 1887⁵ made no alteration in this matter on the practice under the earlier statute; section 28, indeed, specially referred to the existing practice. The

June 18, 1912. authority of *Jameson*¹ was, therefore, in no way impaired.² The decision in that case was supported by considerations of expediency; for to allow advocations from interlocutors on relevancy would be to enable the accused in all cases to protract the procedure in the cause on, it might be, the most trivial grounds,

Muir v. Hart.

Argued for the complainer;—The High Court had inherent power to interpose at any stage of a prosecution in order to prevent injustice, and this was a typical instance of the case in which that power should be exercised, for the ground of advocacy was that the accused was charged on a libel which set forth no crime known to the law of Scotland. The authoritative treatises stated that advocacy was the proper mode of bringing interlocutory judgments under review.³ It was true that the accused might bring a suspension after the trial was concluded; but it was unfair to subject him to the anxiety and expense of a trial, and to the stigma of a conviction, on an indictment which might afterwards be found to be irrelevant. The decision in *Jameson v. Lothian*¹ proceeded on the terms of section 35 of the 1853 Act, under which it was imperative that the second diet should be held at the date fixed unless the prosecutor deserted the diet pro loco et tempore. But the provisions of the 1887 Act, and especially of sections 25 and 42, were in marked contrast with those of the 1853 Act; and further, the 1853 Act had been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. The case of *Jameson*¹ did not therefore bind the Court, and the question was open for decision on its merits.

On 20th March 1912 the Court intimated that the bill was refused, but that the opinions would be delivered on a subsequent date. On 13th June 1912 the following opinions were delivered:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised as regards the competency of the present bill of advocacy and suspension is undoubtedly one of importance. For if such a proceeding as is taken here by the complainer is one that the Court of Justiciary must entertain, there is no doubt that a decision to that effect must have most important results as regards prosecution on indictment in the Sheriff Court. It must be noticed at the outset that what the complainer desires should be done is a thing not known in all previous history of Sheriff Court jury trial procedure. Up to the time of the passing of the Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80), there was no possibility of an advocacy from the Sheriff Court as following on an interlocutor affirming relevancy by the Sheriff, even upon the supposition that Sheriff and jury proceedings could be advocated, during the course of the procedure from the serving of criminal letters until sentence whether on a plea of guilty or on a verdict affirming the libel by the jury. For if the finding of relevancy was duly pronounced by the Sheriff then, unless in his discretion he saw cause to allow the diet to be deserted, the jury were balloted at once from the waiting panel, and the case proceeded in ordinary course. There was therefore no opportunity of which the accused could avail himself to stay proceedings and to bring the procedure which had taken place up to that point under review of the High Court of Justiciary. Anything that might have occurred could only be made ground of complaint after trial if the trial resulted in conviction and sentence. I do not suppose that this was ever held to be doubtful, and certainly there is no trace in any of the books, whether treatises or reports of trials, of any attempt having been made to obtain a stoppage of procedure with a view to High Court review of an interlocutor of relevancy. It must therefore be taken that, until the passing of the Act of 1853, the existing law and practice was that interlocutors in the Sheriff Court upholding relevancy could not be attacked at that stage and procedure to trial stopped by the serving then of a note of advocacy and suspension. There was no law making it competent, or decision declaring it competent, and there was no practice establishing it as legal and therefore competent.

June 13, 1912.
Muir v. Hart.
Lord Justice-Clerk.

It was in that state of matters that the Act of 1853 was passed. It is an Act the title of which set forth an intention "to facilitate procedure in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland." The clause dealing with procedure in criminal cases in the Sheriff Court, namely the 35th, was plainly one to make procedure more convenient by ordering that there should be two diets of compearance, the first on short induciae, and the second on longer induciae, the induciae for the two diets giving the same time before trial as there was under the former law. By this means much convenience was obtained. Where an objection to the relevancy was given effect to at the first diet, or the accused tendered a plea of guilty after the relevancy had been sustained, the case on the criminal letters which had been served came at once to a conclusion. There was no crowd of jurymen nor of witnesses, assembled at inconvenience to themselves and at expense to the State, whose services could not be used. And if the relevancy was sustained no evil could result to the accused, for the time still to run was available for preparation, and gave the same total number of days as under the old system. There was no indication given in the clause that any new rights were to be conferred upon the accused. On the contrary, the statute ordered that "if at the first diet the accused shall plead not guilty, the trial of such party shall take place on the second diet of compearance set forth in the will of the libel."

It is significant that the statute makes no reference in any way to any part of the procedure to be taken before the accused is called upon to plead at the first diet. There is not a word about objections to relevancy, or how such objections if made are to be dealt with. It is at the point of calling on the accused to plead that the statute takes up the procedure as it existed and introduces innovation. There is no indication of any intention that procedure shall be other than that which it had always been when the accused was duly brought before the Court to be dealt with on criminal letters. Innovation only takes place after a plea has been taken and recorded, except in so far as the diet for disposal of relevancy and taking of the plea is held at an earlier date after service than had previously been the case.

Now, it seems to me to be very difficult to hold that, without any words being found in the statute referring by way of enactment to that part of the procedure which deals with relevancy, there should be a total change inaugurated, by which procedure to trial should be barred merely because of the fact that there are two diets and that an interval must pass before

(after a plea) the trial by jury can proceed; in other words, that the accused should by inference be held to have been given by the statute a right to bring his case at that stage before the Court of Justiciary, thereby preventing the case proceeding to the second diet as ordered by the statute. Can it be said that there is to be found in the words of the Act anything which would authorise a transfer of the case to this Court, if such a transfer would not have been permissible under the law and practice which existed before the passing of the Act of 1853? It certainly would be in direct contradiction of the title, for instead of facilitating procedure it would open the door to free exercise of the privilege to hinder and protract proceedings. For, if it is the right of the accused to initiate an advocacy at this stage, it must be the right of every person accused who is advised to have an objection to relevancy stated on his behalf, or who desires delay apart from there being any sound objection to be stated. And the question must be looked upon in that light. Prior to 1853 it was neither the law nor the practice that criminal letters procedure could be brought to this Court at the relevancy stage. So far as the records go no such case of removal ever occurred, nor indeed was any attempt made to remove such a case from the Sheriff at that stage. The question, therefore, arises quite sharply—Is there anything to be found in the Act of 1853 which authorises such a proceeding to be taken? I confess I can find nothing. It is true that the enactment appointing two diets might make it more easy to do such a thing than it was before, but that is a very different thing from the proposition that the law as altered allows it.

Had this question arisen for the first time, my view therefore would have been that as regards what the complainer proposes to do in this case there is no law, as there is no practice, to support it. But I am supported in this view by the case of Jameson v. Lothian,¹ when this very question was brought before a bench of five Judges, and was decided on the competency, as I think this case ought to be decided. From that day to this no similar case has been brought before the Court. Neither has any such attempt been made under the Act of 1887, to which I shall refer presently. Thus no advocacy such as this has been attempted for more than fifty years. I say nothing as to what might be done in any special case, such as was suggested in Jameson's advocacy,¹ where action might be taken at an early stage of procedure, if, as Lord Justice-Clerk Hope said, something was done “which outraged all the principles of the liberty of the subject,” or if, as Lord Ivory said, there was “an objection to the jurisdiction junditus.” Such a case, if it ever occurs, must be dealt with as it presents itself. My attention has been called to two cases *Craig*² and Macrae,³ in both of which advocacy was successful. But, in my opinion, these cases have no bearing upon the present. They were both cases in which the Judge in the inferior Court refused to allow the case to proceed, and brought the proceedings to an end at his own hand, when he had no ground in law for doing so. In short, he did what according to proper order he had no right to do, and so brought the case before him to proceed. This present case does not resemble these cases in any way. Muir v. Hart.

stopped. Nothing has been done which can be impugned as not being according to practice, or that in itself stopped procedure under the indictment. All has been regular and according to statute. All that is said is that the Sheriff has formed a wrong opinion on a point of relevancy. In my opinion we have no duty or right to interfere at such a stage. It has never been done, and therefore not to do it now is in no way interfering with but is upholding law and practice in accordance with the statute of 1853, which expressly directs the trial to proceed at the second diet, and that the trial is to be followed out according to law, unless the diet shall be further adjourned or deserted according to the existing law and practice.

In all that has been said the matter has been dealt with with regard to procedure under the Act of 1853, for it was only as regards that Act that any question could arise as to existing law and practice in the Sheriff Court up to the year 1887 (when the Criminal Procedure Act was passed), and as the case quoted occurred in 1855 it necessarily related to the former Act, and to that Act only. I notice in passing that an Act was passed in 1868¹ by which the principle of two diets was applied to the High Court of Justiciary for the first time. But the adoption of the procedure was optional, and the procedure was cumbrous, and the Act became a dead letter, so far as practice was concerned, in a few years after it was passed by the Legislature.

It remains to consider whether there is anything in the Act of 1887 which should tend to alter or modify the law upon the matter in question. By that Act the procedure on indictment for trial before this Court was altered, so as to conform to the system of having two diets of compareance not optional but compulsory. And it in some respects modified the procedure in Sheriff Court cases, causing all trials in the Sheriff and Jury Court to be on indictment at the instance of the Lord Advocate, the whole procedure being codified to apply to both Courts. It is unnecessary to specify what the changes were. Suffice it to say that as regards the Sheriff Court there was no alteration which could in any way affect the question now before the Court. By section 28, where the case is one to be dealt with in the Sheriff Court only, the Sheriff is directed to proceed according to the existing law and practice, which includes hearing any objections to relevancy, and disposing of them. The existing law and practice was of course that embodied in the Act of 1853, and in such law and practice as existed when it was passed and was not repealed or modified by it. And, as has been pointed out, the law and practice as regards the dealing with relevancy was not altered or modified by that Act. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that no change was made by the Act of 1887 which can in any way affect the decision in the case of Jameson,² which was in my opinion a sound decision under the Act then in force.

As regards the case of Jameson,² I think it right to point out that the Five was then quite a usual bench to consider cases which it was desirable should not be heard by a mere quorum, and was in proportion a fuller bench than that now sitting, all the thirteen Judges being now members of the High Court.

Muir v. Hart.
Lord Justice-Clerk.

It was pointed out at the debate that the provision of the Act of 1853 was repealed under the Statute Law Revision. This was, of course, because the procedure of the Act of 1887 took the place of that of the Act of 1853. But by section 28 of the Act of 1887 the law and practice existing before 1887 is imported as applying to the first diet under the 1887 Act in Sheriff Court procedure. The repeal of the 1853 Act in Statute Law Revision could not take away the operation of the Act of 1887 directing observance of the existing law and practice at the date of the passing of the latter Act. Whatever existed then and was declared to be adopted became part of the system as then codified and modified, and in so far as in any particular it was not modified it was confirmed as the statutory mode of procedure by the power of the later Act, and Statute Law Revision could not affect it.

I have only to say in conclusion that while I thought it right that this question, because of its importance, should be submitted to a fuller bench, it was not because after the first debate I had any doubt what the answer to be given to the complainer's contention should be, but solely that the answer might be fully authoritative and final.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

LORD JOHNSTON.—By this bill of advocation and suspension the complainer seeks to suspend a warrant of apprehension, and to advocate the proceedings against him in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow under a criminal libel, on the ground that the warrant is illegal and the libel not relevant. It is objected for the Crown that the bill is incompetent at the present stage of the proceedings, in respect that it was taken on the disposal of an objection to the relevancy at a first or pleading diet. The objection is founded on the decision of the High Court, by a full bench, in the case of *Jameson v. Lothian*¹ in 1855. Having regard to the eminence of the Judges who then formed the Court, I have the greatest hesitation in suggesting a departure from the precedent which that decision affords. But it was pronounced only two years after the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, which first introduced the system of a pleading diet distinct from the diet for trial, had come into force; and another statute, that of 1887, has been passed since its date, still further simplifying criminal procedure, which I think imposes on us the duty of reconsidering the question.

The obvious object of the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, section 35, in introducing the double diet of compareance was simply to avoid the expense and inconvenience of citing witnesses and summoning a jury in cases where the panel, when brought to trial, was found prepared to plead guilty. The provision was confined at first to the Sheriff Court. The statute said nothing about the disposal of preliminary objections, such as to the relevancy. But June 18, 1912. it followed, as matter of necessity, that such objections must have been entertained and disposed of by the Sheriff before the panel could be asked to plead at the pleading diet. I venture respectfully to maintain that the same views of expediency, founded on considerations of expense and convenience, dictated the desirability of a preliminary objection, such as to the relevancy, so raised and dealt with by the Sheriff, being finally disposed of without the trial having first to run its course, a jury to be empanelled and witnesses not merely cited but examined, before the preliminary point could be taken to review, and that the introduction of the pleading diet afforded an opportunity of this being done, which had not before existed. For I quite concede that under the old system, when trial followed at the same diet immediately on the repelling of any preliminary objection, the right to advocate when such preliminary objection was repelled, and so to interrupt the trial, was not recognised, and as I think rightly from the same considerations of expense and convenience, in respect that witnesses and jury were assembled, and that it was more expedient to assume the Sheriff's judgment to be sound and to proceed with the trial, than to stay procedure and to dismiss jurymen and witnesses until the Sheriff's judgment was reviewed, with the probability of having to recall them to a subsequent diet.

Muir v. Hart.

Ld. Johnston.

But in the case of Jameson,¹ after the introduction of the pleading diet a bill of advocacy of a Sheriff's judgment finding the libel relevant at the pleading diet was unanimously dismissed, without considering it on its merits. However, though the term "incompetent" is used in the rubric of the case, I do not think that the judgment warrants it. Lord Ardmillan uses the term emphatically. But both the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) and Lord Ivory do not discountenance the possibility of the Court staying a Sheriff proceeding with a trial in extreme cases, which makes it difficult to understand how it could be absolutely incompetent so to stay him proceeding in any case. But both Lord Ivory and Lord Cowan rather proceed on the view that it would be in the highest degree inexpedient, and would defeat the object or destroy the advantage of the recent statute so to do; while Lord Handyside was altogether somewhat doubtful on the point at issue. It is evident, then, that the term "incompetent," as used in reference to the matter before the Court, meant no more than that advocacy before trial was not recognised by or in accordance with existing practice, not that there was any inherent impossibility or illegality in it, or that if the Court had thought fit to entertain the advocacy there would have been any want of jurisdiction at that stage to dispose of it. The Court, even discounting the apparent omission of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) to note that the Act of 1853 did not apply to summary prosecutions, seem largely to have been influenced by the idea that to admit advocacy at such stage would have been to open the gates to a flood of advocations, with the result of a great delay in the administration of justice.

For this there was in 1855 some justification. The old form of indictment with its major and minor premisses, &c., was still in use, and was a fruitful source of discussion on the relevancy, often maintained successfully

June 13, 1912. by a panel's counsel. But the system of pleading diet was further extended in 1887 by the Criminal Procedure Act of that year to High Court cases; and what is of more importance, the Act included another reform, viz., the abolition of the old complicated form of indictment which was such a fruitful source of irrelevancy. Under the practice since 1887 objection to the relevancy of a criminal indictment has been as rare as it formerly was common. And I do not think that, had the Court of 1855 been sitting to-day, they would have had the same apprehension of advocations being brought in the great majority of cases, to the delay of justice, if advocacy after the pleading diet were allowed. There are still cases of an exceptional nature—and the present is one of them—in which there may be difficulty about the relevancy of an indictment. The former rule of practice was founded on expediency, and expediency dictates the change in the changed circumstances occasioned by the statutes of 1853 and 1887.

Muir v. Hart.
Ld. Johnston.

The present case is a good example of the inconvenience which must ensue from adherence to the rule of a former system of procedure. I indicate no view that the libel in question is irrelevant, but there is certainly room for discussion on it. Should it happen ultimately to prove irrelevant, then a trial of an exceptionally difficult nature, involving the methods of business on the Stock Exchange and questions of accounting, will in the end prove abortive. Surely it is more practical and expedient to determine at the stage of the first diet whether it should proceed, and for that purpose to postpone the diet for trial.

To refuse advocacy at the stage in question would, as appears to me, be to obliterate the process of advocacy from our criminal procedure, and to make suspension the sole mode of review of proceedings in an inferior Court. Advocacy can only be resorted to pendente processu, and was introduced for the very purpose of correcting errors in procedure of the inferior Court Judge at a stage prior to final sentence. Suspension, with or without liberation according to the form of the sentence, can only be brought of a sentence, and is the only process by which such can be reviewed, though on the ground of error in law or procedure only, and not of fact. The one is the advocacy of a process for correction of procedure before sentence—the other is the suspension of a sentence after the process is concluded.

It is for these reasons that I have ventured to maintain that the judgment in *Jameson's case*¹ ought not to be regarded as binding in the somewhat altered circumstances. The considerations which these circumstances present have led me to the conclusion that to refuse this advocacy as incompetent would be to reject the opportunity, which the passing of the Acts of 1853 and 1887 has afforded, of facilitating procedure, and instead to perpetuate inconvenience and expense.

LORD SALVESEN.—The important question which this case raises is whether it is competent to bring under review a deliverance pronounced by a Sheriff at the first or pleading diet holding an indictment relevant; and another deliverance on the same day, after a plea of "not guilty" had been tendered, continuing the case to the second diet for trial. On this question of competency we must take it that the objection of the complainer is well founded, viz., that the facts set forth do not disclose a crime at common law. If it be incompetent for this Court to entertain a bill of advocacy at this stage, the case must go to trial, with the result that at the best for the complainer he must incur the expense of a trial, and at the worst that he may be convicted on an irrelevant indictment. In the latter case, no doubt, he has his remedy by way of suspension of the conviction; but an injury will have been done him which the quashing of the conviction will only partly repair, and in respect of which he will have no civil action of damages against those who are responsible for the prosecution. It is familiar procedure in the Court of Session that where a defender maintains that the action against him discloses no relevant case we hear and decide this matter on the pleadings, and do not (as I understand the rule to be in England) send the case for trial. This practice is found to be convenient and to save much expense to the parties which would otherwise be wasted, and the question is whether in the case of an indictment at common law there is any reason why a different practice should prevail in the criminal Courts?

June 18, 1912.
Muir v. Hart.

Lord Salvesen.

The leading grounds upon which the argument of incompetency was maintained is that under the practice which existed prior to the Act of 1853 objections to the relevancy of an indictment were disposed of on the same day on which the trial was fixed to proceed. If these objections were repelled by the presiding Judge the case went straightway to trial, and it was therefore impossible to have a bill of advocacy presented in time to stop the trial. By the Act referred to, however, a change was made upon that practice, it being enacted (section 35) that in the prosecution of all criminal offences which were not to be tried summarily, there were to be two diets of appearance, at the first of which the panel was to be called upon to plead, and if he pled not guilty the trial was to take place at the second diet, which was to be not sooner than nine clear days after the first diet. An interval was thus provided which made it possible for the accused party, if he maintained that the libel was irrelevant, to present a bill of advocacy and suspension to the High Court, and thereby bring the Sheriff's judgment on the relevancy under review. The question of the competency of such a procedure was raised in the case of *Jameson v. Lothian*¹ about two years after the Act of 1853 had come into force. The Court, which consisted of the Lord Justice-Clerk and four other Justiciary Judges, held that such a proceeding was incompetent, and the point does not appear to have been raised in precisely the same form since that decision was pronounced.

When this case came before a sitting of the High Court, which, as it happened, consisted of four Judges of the Second Division, we were of opinion that the question was so important that it was desirable that the decision in the case of *Jameson*¹ should be reconsidered by a full bench. Had I been of the opinion, which I understand is held by some of your Lordships, that a full bench could not reconsider the decision in Jameson's case,¹ I should certainly not have been a party to subjecting the complainer

Muir v. Hart. said, I think a full bench consisting of the two heads of the Court and Lord Salvesen. five Lords of Justiciary is quite entitled to review the decision of a Court of five Judges presided over by the Lord Justice-Clerk. I do not think such a tribunal has the authority of a full bench ; and even if it had, I do not think such a sanctity attaches to a decision of our predecessors that for us it should have the force of statute, having in view that during the sixty years that have elapsed since that decision was pronounced there has been a great change in our methods of procedure and in the attitude of the bench in dealing with crime. It is not on these lines we are accustomed to deal with decisions pronounced in the Court of Session, although it is less important in such cases, where an error may at any time be rectified by the House of Lords, than it is where we are sitting as a Court whose judgments cannot be reviewed. I can see no distinction as to the competency of reviewing a previous judgment, whether it has been pronounced by a Court of three Judges, or five Judges, or even of seven Judges. Yet it is not at all unknown that a Court of three Judges has deliberately reversed the decision of an equal number, who for the time being constituted the High Court, and whose decision in the particular case had complete finality.

Being, therefore, as I conceive, free to consider the decision in Jameson's case,¹ I proceed to examine the grounds of that decision. There is apparently a full report of the observations made by each Judge in deciding the case, but I cannot say that any of their reasons commend themselves to my mind. The Lord Justice-Clerk commences by saying,—“I do not mean to enter on the question whether such extreme cases may not occur as may induce this Court to stop an inferior Judge from proceeding with a cause pending before him.” If this be so, then there is no procedure known to our law which can be used for that purpose except a bill of advocation such as we have here. But if a distinction may be made in an extreme case, why is it to be assumed that the case before us does not fall within that category? We have had no argument on the merits ; and we are bound at this stage to assume that the objection is well founded—that the indictment does not disclose a crime at common law. His Lordship goes on to say,—“But I must say that the notion of stopping, in the manner here attempted, a criminal trial before the Sheriff, between the interlocutor of relevancy and the next diet of the cause, appears to me most extraordinary. This Court is not to try the cause, but we are asked to prohibit the Sheriff from going on with it.” I confess that it strikes me in exactly the opposite way. I think it would be extraordinary that we should allow a man to be tried on a criminal complaint which did not disclose that any crime had been committed. Cases may easily be figured where a crime is statutory, but where there is a limitation in the statute which prevents proceedings being taken under it. If such a crime be charged at common law, is this Court powerless to prevent the trial proceeding although eventually it is plain that a conviction, if obtained, would be immediately quashed?

The Lord Justice-Clerk goes on to say,—“Were the procedure here attempted found competent we should have advocations in the great majority of such cases, and great delay of justice would be the result." An June 13, 1912. argument based on inexpediency is no doubt quite legitimate in considering competency; but the alleged inexpediency appears to me to be visionary. Muir v. Hart. It is a poor compliment to pay to the framers of our criminal indictments that in the great majority of cases such indictments are open to objections to relevancy; and I cannot imagine that any Judge of this Court would grant the necessary warrant for service if it appeared that there was no stateable question to try. Apart from this an accused has nothing in the ordinary case to gain by delaying proceedings by means of unfounded appeals. He only adds a further period of confinement to that which may be imposed upon him at the end of the day. Lord Salvesen.

Lord Ivory's opinion is, in my judgment, not more convincing. He said,—“I think if the case were one of declinature of the jurisdiction of the inferior Court where the objection was to the jurisdiction funditus there might perhaps be something to say for the competency of this proceeding. But where the matter is a mere question of relevancy, I think it is sufficient for us, that to admit the course proposed would be in the highest degree inexpedient, and would altogether defeat the object of the Sheriff Court Act.” Now, if it is competent, as the learned Judge indicates, to present a bill of advocation against an interlocutor repelling a plea of “No jurisdiction,” I cannot see any ground why it should be incompetent to do so where the complaint is that the indictment discloses no crime. In the former case, just as in the latter, the Court would be taking the course which the Lord Justice-Clerk described as “most extraordinary” of stopping a criminal trial before the Sheriff between the interlocutor of relevancy and the next diet of the cause. A question of jurisdiction may be just as difficult or as easy to determine as one of relevancy; and, although it is not so often raised, the objection of inexpediency seems to be equally applicable. No other reasons are added by the other Judges who concurred (one of them, Lord Handyside, doing so with some difficulty) except that Lord Cowan pointed out what is probably the strongest plea, that a bill of advocation would not have been competent because impossible under the old system, and had not been expressly declared to be competent by the statute of 1853.

We were not referred to any authority, apart from the decision in the case of Jameson,¹ which supports the view that advocation of an interlocutor pronounced by a Sheriff finding the libel relevant is incompetent. The institutional writers seem to take it for granted that such a process is competent. Thus Hume says (p. 509) that there are three forms of process in which decrees of the inferior Courts may be submitted to the revisal of the Lords of Justiciary, namely, advocation, suspension, and appeal, and he goes on to point out that advocation is the proper remedy before a trial has taken place, just as suspension is that which applies after conclusion of the trial in the inferior Court to hinder execution of the sentence. With regard to advocation he says,—“This form of redress seems to be universally applicable with the exception only of the sentences of the Court of Admiralty, with respect to which all advocation is absolutely forbidden by the

June 18, 1912. statute of 1681, cap. 16." It is true he does not expressly mention that Muir v. Hart. advocacy is competent in order to review a finding upon relevancy, but LordSalvesen. he says that "the manner of the process seems to have been thus. That on a bill offered to the Lords of Privy Council, or Council and Session, an order was made and intimated enjoining the inferior Judge not to proceed."
 This was before the Court of Justiciary was established ; and shortly after that Court came into existence Hume says,—“The Lords of Justiciary attained to the quiet and exclusive possession of the right of passing bills of advocacy for themselves in all cases which fall properly within their charter.” Further, there are two recent decisions which seem not entirely consistent with the case of Jameson.¹ In *Craig v. Galt*² the Sheriff had dismissed a criminal libel at the instance of a private prosecutor with concurrence of the public prosecutor, because of the non-production, the day before the first diet at which the case was called, of an article libelled as to be produced at the trial. The complainer thereupon brought a bill of advocacy and contended that “in criminal cases before the Sheriff productions did not require to be lodged till the day before the trial, and that the trial was now regarded in practice as being at the second diet.”
 The Court were of opinion that the Sheriff had erred ; and they sustained the advocacy, recalled the interlocutor complained of, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed according to law. Now, under the old practice, as there was only one diet, it is plain that the objection would have been a good one ; but it was held to be bad, not because of any new act of adjournal regulating the time for production of documents, but because of the introduction of two diets, and the practice which had followed upon that introduction. In the subsequent case of *Macrae v. Cooper*³ the Sheriff had deserted the diet simpliciter in a criminal trial, because at the first diet the prosecutor was not personally present, although a person holding a commission from him was in attendance. On a bill of advocacy being presented, the Court advocated the cause, reversed the judgment of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to proceed according to law.

It would thus appear that where at the first diet an interlocutor is pronounced adverse to the prosecutor, it is competent for him to bring a bill of advocacy, and for the Court to remit to the Sheriff who has finally decided the cause to proceed with the trial. If that be so, I can see no reason in principle why the same privilege should not be accorded to the accused ; and there is nothing, so far as I know, either enacted by statute or in our mode of administering justice in criminal causes which requires that we should discriminate thus unfairly between the remedies open to the prosecutor and those open to the accused.

On the question of the expediency of advocating a deliverance sustaining the relevancy of a libel I have already pointed out the advantage to the accused of not having to undergo a trial on an irrelevant indictment. From the public point of view the expediency is even more obvious. If a mistake has been made in framing an indictment on which the accused has been tried and convicted, the conviction may be quashed by the High Court. The mistake may have been a formal one, and the conviction just on the facts proved at the trial, but the accused person having tholed an June 18, 1912. size cannot again be indicted. If, however, the same decision had been pronounced in an advocacy on relevancy the prosecutor would have an opportunity of serving a new and relevant indictment which would obviate the risk of a guilty person escaping all punishment because of a formal and technical defect in the original indictment.

Muir v. Hart.
Lord Salvesen.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that this advocacy is not merely competent, but that it is expedient in the interests both of the accused and of the administration of justice, and that we should entertain it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in the result of the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion. But I think it right to say that, at the first hearing of this case, I was inclined to agree with Lord Salvesen both as to competency and as to expediency. I have not changed my opinion on expediency. It seems to me an anomaly that the question raised in this advocacy (namely, whether an indictment, which is said to contain no charge of any crime by the law of Scotland, should be allowed to go to trial) cannot be brought before this Court. With our simplified forms and accelerated procedure, I do not believe that it would be found worth while to bring frivolous advocations. On the whole, I think a right of appeal on relevancy, such as the complainer contends for, would be in the interests of justice, although it may be that it would involve closer scrutiny by us in passing bills than has ordinarily been the custom.

But, on the question of competency, I have come to be of opinion that the Lord Justice-Clerk is right, and that this advocacy must be held incompetent. The statute of 1887, by sections 28 and 29, distinguishes sharply between the case where the second diet is to be in the Sheriff Court, and the case where it is to be in the High Court of Justiciary. Section 28 enacts that "where the case is one the second diet of which is to be in the Sheriff Court, the Sheriff shall proceed according to the existing law and practice." Therefore, the only question is, what was the law and practice existing in 1887. As to the practice, it is admitted that there is no known case of a question of relevancy being held competently brought by advocacy before the High Court. As to the law, that seems to me to have been settled by the case of Jameson v. Lothian,¹ decided fifty-seven years ago, and followed in practice ever since. In my opinion that case was decided on the question of competency, as well as on grounds of expediency. It is true that the Lord Justice-Clerk reserves the question of what might happen in a certain extreme case which he puts; but he makes it clear that, if a remedy for such a case exists, it would not be by way of advocacy.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—As your Lordships are aware, by the constitution of this Court, I have no vote in the deliberations of your Lordships, unless the other members of the Court are equally divided, and, at the last consultation, before we gave judgment in this case, I put it to your Lord-

June 13, 1912. ships to vote "Yea" or "Nay" upon the question of competency. Upon that occasion the votes were equal and, consequently, I had to give my casting vote. I make this explanation because I am left in a little doubt by the opinion which has been last delivered as to whether my brother Lord Guthrie has or has not changed his mind since the last consultation. The learned Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion is based not upon inexpediency but upon absolute incompetency—although I doubt not that if his Lordship were outvoted on that matter he would then vote for inexpediency.

Muir v. Hart.
Lord Justice-General.

Upon the question of competency my opinion can be put very shortly. After all, what has first to be considered is whether this Court has power of review in the matter at all, because there are certain matters in which we have no power of review—for instance, we never do review the verdict of a jury on the facts. As regards that matter, I do not think there is any doubt. Nobody doubts that the Court has power of review where a person is convicted in an inferior Court upon an irrelevant indictment. Once you have got that length, it seems to me that the question of the competency of advocacy or suspension is a question of what is the convenient and appropriate form of process and nothing else. Prior to 1853 advocacy was not applicable, because it was not practicable—you could not advocate under the old system of trial by jury in the Sheriff Court, and, consequently, nobody ever heard of an advocacy of the indictment before 1853. When the practice of the double diet was introduced in 1853 it became possible to advocate, and, accordingly, that was attempted in the case of Jameson v. Lothian.¹ The decision in that case was against the practice of advocacy on the question of relevancy; but I confess that I agree with what Lord Salvesen has said, namely, that when you come to read the judgments narrowly, although the word "competency" is used, the decision is not really a decision upon competency, it is really a decision upon expediency. The moment that it is said, as the Lord Justice-Clerk there says, "I do not mean to enter upon the question whether such extreme cases may not occur as may induce this Court to stop an inferior Judge from proceeding with a case depending before him," it seems to me that you decide in favour of competency. And, accordingly, both upon that ground, and also upon the ground that after all, once it is settled that we have the power to review, the question of advocacy or suspension is a mere question of appropriate procedure, I think this advocacy is competent.

As your Lordships are aware, I gave my vote at consultation in favour of competency. When I put the question to your Lordships whether it was expedient to allow advocacy in circumstances such as these, there was a majority of your Lordships against allowing it, and therefore I had no vote. But, in accordance with ordinary practice, I shall state my opinion.

My opinion here is against allowing the advocacy at this stage, and again I put it upon very simple grounds. I hold Jameson's case¹ to have been a decision to that effect, and I cannot see that, so far as the Sheriff Court is concerned, any change whatsoever has been made by the Act of 1887. I am aware, of course, that there are certain sections of the Act of 1887 which supersede sections of the Act of 1853, which sections indeed have since, I understand, been decently interred by the Statute Law Revision Committee. But in substance the matter is left entirely where it was. Now, if that is so, it seems to me that it would be necessary for those who desire to introduce a change to show that there had been some inconvenience or difficulty arising from the working of the law since the decision in *Jameson*¹; but nobody has been able to say anything of the kind. I look upon this, after all, as a practical question depending on the balance of convenience. It is quite easy to put cases—as Lord Salvesen did—in which there might be undoubtedly a certain hardship to the individual. There is almost no system in which you cannot figure a case of hardship to the individual, and I can quite see that, if a man is convicted upon what afterwards turns out to be an irrelevant indictment, the individual is prejudiced to a certain extent in his pocket and perhaps also in his reputation by the fact that he did not get rid of the charge at an earlier stage instead of having to wait for a suspension. But is that a very practical consideration? Lord Salvesen said he did not think that in the vast number of indictments in our system of prosecution any large number were irrelevant. A really irrelevant indictment is a very rare thing. And, on the other hand, if we upheld the expediency we should afford an obvious opportunity to the person who is desirous of getting delay. I think that those considerations balance each other, and that it is inexpedient to change the practice of over a quarter of a century which has been found to be a practice that has done nobody any harm. Therefore my vote, if I had to give it, would have been in accordance with the view of the majority of your Lordships.

Muir v. Hart.
Lord Justice-General.

I just wish to say one word more. Lord Salvesen said that he did not suppose a Judge would sign a bill of advocacy if he thought it was a mere pretext for delay, and I understand that Lord Mackenzie—although he did not actually express it—would be in favour of allowing an advocacy at this stage if some check could be devised. I may say that at consultation we considered the question of allowing an advocacy at this stage with leave of the Sheriff, i.e., an advocacy on what might be called a probabilis causa view. But the large majority of your Lordships came to be of opinion that that was beyond our powers, and that we could not give a power of that kind to the Sheriff. Such a power might be given to us by statute if it were thought expedient, but at present we have not got the power.

THE COURT refused the bill.

 (5 Geo. IV. cap. 83), sec. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 15.*

The Vagrancy Act, 1824, sec. 4, as amended and applied to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 15, includes among those who are liable to imprisonment as rogues or vagabonds “every suspected person or reputed thief frequenting . . . any street or any highway, or any place adjacent to a street or highway, with intent to commit felony.”

Held that the entrance hall and staircase of the Central Station Hotel in Glasgow, which opened directly on to a public street, was a place adjacent to a street or highway in the sense of these sections.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 General.
 Lord Kinnear.
 Lord Mac-
 kenzie.

ON 20th January 1912 Bertrand Morton alias Edward Guerin was charged in the Central Police Court at Glasgow on a complaint at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, which set forth that “you are charged at the instance of the complainer that, being a suspected person and reputed thief, you did, on the 27th day of October 1911, frequent and loiter about in the Central Railway Station Hotel, being a place adjacent to a street, namely, Gordon Street, Glasgow, with intent to commit felony, videlicet:—Theft, contrary to section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as amended and extended to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, section 15, and as further amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, section 7, whereby you are liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three calendar months with hard labour. And further, being a suspected person and reputed thief, you did, on the 16th day of January 1912, frequent and loiter about in the Central Railway Station Hotel, being a place adjacent to a street, namely, Gordon Street, Glasgow, with intent to commit felony, videlicet:—Theft, contrary to section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as amended and extended to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, section 15, and as further amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, section 7, whereby you are liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three calendar months with hard labour.” *

* The Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. cap. 83), which does not apply to Scotland, provides, sec. 4, that certain classes of persons shall be deemed to be rogues and vagabonds within the meaning of the Act, and shall be liable to imprisonment, including, inter alios, “every person being found in or upon any dwelling-house, warehouse, coachhouse, stable, or outhouse, or in any inclosed yard, garden, or area, for any unlawful purpose: Every suspected person or reputed thief frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street, highway, or place adjacent, with intent to commit felony.”

The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 15, after quoting the above provision, enacts:—“And whereas doubts are entertained as to the construction of the said provision, and as to the nature

On 23rd January 1912 the Stipendiary Magistrate (Neilson) found the charge not proven, and, at the request of the Procurator-fiscal, stated a case for the opinion of the High Court. June 21, 1912.
M'Intyre v.
Morton.

The case stated :—"The case was called before the Central Police Court, Glasgow, on 20th January 1912, when respondent, who was not represented by an agent, pled not guilty. My attention was not called to any question of relevancy, and I allowed the case to go to proof. Proof was led, but at the end of the hearing, on my referring closely to the terms of the statutes founded upon, I thought it necessary to adjourn the case until 23rd January, and ultimately determined to give an opportunity to the Procurator-fiscal and to any law-agent who might appear for respondent to discuss a point of law and fact which had emerged. On 23rd January I heard the Procurator-fiscal and the law-agent for respondent, after which I found the charge not proven.

"The following are the facts proved :—The respondent is a suspected person and reputed thief. On 16th January 1912 he frequented and loitered about in the Central Railway Station Hotel, one entrance to which is situated in Gordon Street, Glasgow. He was observed examining the hotel register, which is kept lying in the entrance hall on the ground floor, looking at the keyboard where the keys of unoccupied rooms and keys of rooms left by residents in the hotel were hung, and at the telegraph board. Several times he went up and down the main stair. He was also in the smoke-room, lounge-room, and lavatory on the first floor or entresol of the hotel. He was in the hotel for about an hour, but he did not reside there, and did not know anyone residing there. Although while in the hotel he did no act in itself illegal or overtly indicative of an unlawful purpose he gave no satisfactory explanation of his being in the hotel. His movements were such as to rouse the suspicions of the hotel servants, and in consequence detective-officers were sent for and on his leaving the hotel he was followed to Dennistoun, Glasgow, where he was apprehended."

of the evidence required to prove the intent to commit a felony: Be it enacted, firstly, the said section shall be construed as if instead of the words 'highway or place adjacent' there were inserted the words 'or any highway, or any place adjacent to a street or highway'; and, secondly, that in proving the intent to commit a felony it shall not be necessary to show that the person suspected was guilty of any particular act or acts tending to show his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case, and from his known character as proved to the Justice of the Peace or Court before whom or which he is brought, it appears to such Justice or Court that his intent was to commit a felony; and the provisions of the said section, as amended by this section, shall be in force in Scotland and Ireland. For the purposes of this section, in Scotland the word felony shall mean any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft, which in respect of aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude, any forgery, and any uttering of any forged writing."

The Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 69), sec. 7, enacts that sec. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, as amended by sec. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, "shall be read and construed as if the provisions applying to suspected persons and reputed thieves frequenting the places and with the intent therein described, applied also to every suspected person or reputed thief loitering about or in any of the said places and with the said intent."

June 21, 1912.

M'Intyre v.
Morton.

The magistrate further stated:—"If the locus of the offence is construed as within the particular provision of the statute libelled, I shall have to say that it appeared to me from respondent's proved character and from the whole circumstances of the case that his intent was to commit felony in some form of theft from the hotel. The matter of locus, however, was vital, as the competency and effect of the evidence depended upon it.

"The provision when in its original form as part of section 4 of the Vagrancy Act appears to have been open to the interpretation that the words 'place adjacent' might mean only place adjacent, not to street or highway, but to a dock, wharf, or place of public resort. In the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, section 15, the amendment of the Vagrancy Act designed to clear away this doubt did not in terms deal with the sense of 'place,' but raised any street or highway into a substantive locus under the provision and made the word 'adjacent' mean adjacent to a street or highway.

"On the facts, the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 25, covering buildings as well as streets and places adjacent to buildings, would have precisely applied, but upon the charge neither that Act nor the clause of the Vagrancy Act, applicable to a person found upon a dwelling-house for an unlawful purpose, was available. The question was whether under the Vagrancy Act, as amended in the phrase 'any street or any highway or any place adjacent to a street or highway,' the term 'place adjacent to a street' included a large hotel.

"Earlier in the section libelled the phrases 'street, road, highway, or public place' and 'street, road, highway, or other open and public place' seemed to me to compel the interpretation of 'place' as ejusdem generis with street, and to exclude a building such as a hotel. For the words 'place adjacent' occurring later in the particular provision founded upon, the same interpretation appeared to me to be imperative, equally in view of the history of the amendment and the general ineptness of the alteration to include buildings, and in respect of the immediate context, the generic absence of buildings from the particular provision as a whole, and the contrast instituted, not only by explicit mention of 'dwelling-house' in the clause immediately preceding, but also by the careful distinction between buildings and places of a different character observed in the whole section of the Vagrancy Act.

"Had I been able to conclude that the Central Station Hotel was a 'place adjacent to a street' within the meaning of the clause libelled, I would have convicted on the second count. But having regard to the considerations above set forth upon the merits, I held that the hotel was not such a place, and, therefore, I found the whole charge not proven."

The following questions were submitted for the opinion of the Court:—" (1) Was the complaint relevant? (2) No preliminary objection to relevancy having been raised, and the case having gone to proof, was I right in holding on the merits the charge not proven? or (3) Ought I to have held it proved that the Central Station Hotel was a 'place adjacent to a street' within the meaning of the clause libelled? and (4) Ought I to have found the respondent guilty of the second charge libelled?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 21st June 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The doctrine of ejusdem generis which had been the stumbling-block to the magistrate was quite inapplicable. The Central Station Hotel was "a place adjacent to a street or highway" in the ordinary sense of these words, and was accordingly covered by the statute. Further, it was just such a place as the statute was meant to protect, the object of the section being to include all public places in which it was possible for persons to loiter with intent to commit felony. The protection afforded by the statute was not confined to places which were at all times open to the public. In any case this hotel, if it were not a "place adjacent to a street or highway," was a "place of public resort" in the sense of the statute. Similar words in other statutes had been held to apply to a railway station platform,¹ and to a railway carriage²; and the provisions of the section had been held to apply to a private house in which an auction sale was being conducted.³ They should a fortiori be applied to this station hotel.

June 21, 1912.

M'Intyre v.
Morton.

Argued for the respondent;—The magistrate had decided rightly. The expression "any place adjacent to a street or highway" must refer to an open place of the nature of a street to the exclusion of the interior of a building. In any case, there could be no conviction of intent to commit felony, because the crime of theft had not been effectively included in the definition of felony in section 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act. Theft was not a plea of the Crown; and no theft in Scotland was punishable by penal servitude "in respect of aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen."

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—From the facts which the learned stipendiary magistrate supplies, it appears that the respondent here was a suspected person and reputed thief, that he loitered about the Central Station Hotel, which is near Gordon Street, Glasgow, that he was observed in the entrance-hall of the hotel, going up and down the main stair, and in the smoke-room, lounge-room, and lavatory of the hotel. Then the learned stipendiary goes on to say: "If the locus of the offence is construed as within the particular provision of the statute libelled, I shall have to say that it appeared to me from respondent's proved character and from the whole circumstances of the case, that his intent was to commit felony in some form of theft from the hotel." He would then have found the charge proven, but he did not do so, because he did not consider that the Central Station Hotel could be called "a place adjacent to a street or highway," inasmuch that he thought "a place adjacent" must be ejusdem generis with "street or highway," and that this Central Station Hotel was not ejusdem generis with "street or highway."

I do not come to that conclusion. In the first place, I think that this is not a question to which the doctrine of ejusdem generis can be applied. The object of the statute is to prevent the loitering about places of public resort with an intent to commit felonies. Be it observed that there is nothing said as to where the felony is to be committed or the intent to commit the felony is to be formed. I can see no reason why felonies which M'Intyre v. may be meant to be committed in a private place, and a very good illustration of it, to wit, burglary, would always be committed in a private place.

Morton.
Lord Justice-General. The mischief struck at by the statute is loitering about public places with a view to, so to speak, departing from them for a criminal expedition. In order, then, to prevent a too meticulous consideration of whether a place is public or not, the words "any place adjacent to a street or highway" are added. That seems to me to mean that a man may still be held to be loitering upon a street or highway if, not being actually upon a street or highway, he is somewhere very near to the street or highway—always presuming that the intent is made out against him and that he is a person of the class described in the section. But if that is so, the doctrine of ejusdem generis has nothing to do with it. Even if it had, I do not think it would have availed the respondent here, because if you take the ejusdem generis doctrine, you must be able to find something which is ejusdem generis with the genus as disclosed by all the enumerated instances, not as disclosed by the last of them only, and if amongst the enumerated instances you find a "place of public resort," and if this place is a place of public resort, it is obviously ejusdem generis with the enumerated instances.

I must not omit to deal with an argument which Mr Duffes brought before us, because it would seem, if I did so, that I did not pay attention to it. He argues that this statute does not apply to Scotland at all, because it is said in the 15th section of the Prevention of Crimes Act that "for the purposes of this section in Scotland the word felony shall mean any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft, which in respect of aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude." Well, I think he has shown that the gentleman who drew that section had not a very correct notion of Scots law, but I do not think it helps Mr Duffes here, because it says any theft which may be punished by penal servitude, and according to Scots law every theft is so punishable.

On the whole matter, I think we ought to answer the questions by saying that, as the learned stipendiary has come to the conclusion on the facts that the respondent was there with intent to commit a felony, he ought to have convicted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree. I can see no ground for the difficulty which the learned magistrate found from the necessity of construing the words of this statute as set forth in the charge as being ejusdem generis with other words in the same statute. The rule of ejusdem generis has been applied where a series of particular instances having some common characteristic is followed by general words which may reasonably be supposed to cover omitted instances of the same kind. But the words under construction do not bring other places within the scope of the statute in general terms so as to suggest some implied limitation. They are just as specific as the preceding words descriptive of place, and they define the new place not by its resemblance but simply by its proximity to a street or highway. The hall of a large hotel opening to a public street on one side and to a railway station on the other does not appear to me to be so different in character from the other places of public resort specially mentioned that “a June 21, 1912. suspected person or reputed thief” may frequent it without coming within the intention of the statute. M'Intyre v. Morton.

But I agree also that, if there were any limitation of these words by a reference to the kind of place which the statute must be supposed to regard as being a probable locus of the mischief it was to prevent, I should say that this hotel in Glasgow was just the kind of place. Lord Kinnear.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal: Find in answer to the questions in the case that as the stipendiary magistrate found in fact that the respondent was a reputed thief, and that he was in the Central Hotel, Glasgow, on the dates libelled with intent to commit a felony in some form of theft, the stipendiary magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent.”

Statutory Offences—Coal-mine—Failure to provide “facilities for check-weigher”—“Shelter from weather”—Shelter not artificially heated—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 13 (2)—Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 9), sec. 1 (4). Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, v. Mackenna.

Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 13 (2), and the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, sec. 1 (4), colliery owners are bound, under a penalty, to afford facilities to the check-weigher, including a “shelter from the weather.”

Held that the fact that the owners of a colliery provided no means for the artificial heating of the check-weigher's weigh-house did not constitute a failure to provide him with “a shelter from the weather.”

THE DALMELLINGTON IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Ayr, on a complaint at the instance of Peter Fraser Mackenna, Procurator-fiscal, with the consent of the Home Secretary, which set forth:—“You are charged at the instance of the complainer that continuously between 4th January and 15th February 1912, at No. 3 Coalpit, Sundrum Colliery, parish of Coylton, Ayrshire, of which pit you are the owners, you did not afford to Michael Colrain, Kayshill, Drongan, check-weigher at said pit, proper facilities for enabling him to fulfil the duties for which he was stationed there, in respect that you did not provide for him a shelter from the weather, —contrary to the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, section 13 (2),* HIGH COURT.

 Dalmellington Iron Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Mackenna.
 The Sheriff-substitute (Shairp) found the accused Company guilty as libelled and imposed a fine of £1, and, at their request, stated a case for appeal.

The following summary of the facts stated in the case is taken from the opinion of the Lord Justice-General:—“The building concerned [the weigh-house occupied by the check-weigher] contained the furniture prescribed by the statute, and was of the necessary cubic capacity. There was no fault to be found with it as a structure. It is equally clear that this colliery is in an exposed situation, that its buildings are liable to be affected by draughts, and that in cold weather they become very cold. There is also a finding in fact to the effect that the check-weigher concerned was on several occasions absent from duty in consequence of having contracted a cold. Now, it is not easy to say that anyone can enjoy immunity from cold in Scotland in the months of November and January. It should be noted also, that it is found that this man did not wear a greatcoat. The matter comes to this, that no fault is alleged against the Company except that they did not heat this place artificially.’

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was:—“Did the appellants fail to provide for the said Michael Colrain, as check-weigher at the coalpit mentioned in the complaint during the period therein libelled, a shelter from the weather in respect that the said weigh-house was not artificially heated; and was the Sheriff-substitute right in convicting the appellants of a contravention of the statutes quoted in the complaint by failing to provide proper facilities for enabling the said Michael Colrain to fulfil his duties as check-weigher at said coalpit during said period?”

The appeal was heard before the High Court on 21st June 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The statute only contemplated the provision of a structure in which the check-weigher might conduct his work in shelter from the elements; it did not aim at securing for him any high degree of comfort. Before the passing of the Act of 1905 the check-weigher’s duties were conducted in the open air, and the facilities prescribed by the Act of 1887 were only facilities for performing these duties without molestation. The Act of 1905 added to the “facilities” so prescribed the provision of a “shelter from the weather” furnished with certain named accessories. Among these accessories there was no mention of any apparatus for artificial heating, which clearly showed that no such apparatus was contemplated. The Acts were penal statutes, and must therefore be construed strictly. As matter of fact the check-weigher would never have suffered from the cold weather had he adopted the ordinary precaution of wearing a greatcoat.

the owner agent and manager of the mine shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means to enforce to the best of his power the requirements of this section.”

* The Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 9), enacts:—Sec. 1 (4). “The facilities to be afforded to a check-weigher under section 13 of the principal Act shall include provision for a check-weigher of a shelter from the weather, containing the number of cubic feet requisite for two persons, a desk or table at which the check-weigher may write, and a sufficient number of weights to test the weighing machine.”

Argued for the respondent;—It was not contended that such a June 21, 1912. shelter should in all circumstances be artificially heated. But the statute required that a “shelter from the weather” should be provided, and it was a question whether, in the circumstances of each case, the shelter provided was, on a fair reading of the words “a shelter from the weather” capable of affording the check-weigher reasonable protection. Conditions of temperature were as much conditions of weather as those of moisture. It could not be contended that a shelter which admitted rain would comply with the statutory requirement, and it was hard to see any practical distinction between such a shelter and one which subjected the check-weigher to an excessive degree of cold. It had been shown that the shelter in question had the latter defect, and that in consequence the check-weigher had been unable to perform his duties with efficiency. The conviction should therefore stand.

Dalmellington Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Mackenna.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a stated case in which the Dalmellington Iron Company, Limited, appeal against a conviction on a complaint in which they were charged with not having afforded to one of their check-weighers proper facilities to enable him to fulfil his duties, in contravention of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, section 13 (2), and of the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, section 1 (4). The question which is raised in the case is quite fairly put by the Sheriff-substitute when he says: “Did the appellants fail to provide for” the check-weigher “a shelter from the weather, in respect that the said weigh-house was not artificially heated?”

The Sheriff-substitute has stated the facts of the case at considerable length, but I think they may, for the purposes of this decision, be materially abbreviated. [Here followed the summary quoted supra.]

I am of opinion that the facts do not warrant the conviction. The statute under which check-weighers were originally appointed, the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, provided, section 13 (2): “A check-weigher shall have every facility afforded to him for enabling him to fulfil the duties for which he is stationed, including facilities for examining and testing the weighing-machine, and checking the taring of tubs and trams where necessary.” Now if that provision had stood alone I should have no doubt of the meaning of the word “facility,”—that this did not apply to the provision of any structure in which a check-weigher’s duties might be performed, but only that he should be allowed to perform his duties unmolested. No question of the kind we are now considering could have arisen under the Act of 1887. The Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, makes this provision: “The facilities to be afforded to a check-weigher under section 13 of the principal Act shall include provision for a check-weigher of a shelter from the weather, containing the number of cubic feet requisite for two persons, a desk or table at which the check-weigher may write, and a sufficient number of weights to test the weighing-machine.” This attaches a new and statutory meaning to the term “facilities.” Accordingly it is now necessary that the proprietor of the colliery should supply the things so described, but there is specification of what he is called upon to provide. He must provide a “shelter from the weather.” That the meaning of that is a structure only is clear from the June 21, 1912. words which follow describing the accessories of the shelter. Not a word is said about the temperature which has to be maintained there.

Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, v. Mackenna.
 Lord Justice-General.

It must be observed that this is a penal statute, and must therefore be construed strictly, and that to support a conviction it must be proved that the shelter which has been provided is not a shelter within the meaning of the Act. That has not been done in the present case, and I think it could not be done; and I am accordingly of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered both branches of the question of law in the negative: Sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

Statutory Offences—Weights and Measures—Sale—Implied representation as to weight—Label "Not sold by weight"—Fraudulent intent—Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. cxlvi.), sec. 60.

The Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907, sec. 60, enacts that, if the weight of articles sold by weight does not correspond with the weight represented by the seller, the seller shall be liable to a fine, unless he proves that the deficiency in weight "has arisen without any fraudulent intent."

A boy entered a shop belonging to a limited company and presented a written order for $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of butter. The salesman, without remark, handed him a mould or print of butter contained in a wrapper on which was printed "This article is not sold by weight." The butter weighed only 3 oz. $7\frac{1}{2}$ drams, and the sum paid by the boy was the price, according to the current wholesale rates, of that quantity of butter. The company had instructed their employees not to sell butter by weight, but this instruction was not always obeyed.

The company having been convicted of a contravention of the section, held (1) that the butter had been represented as being of the weight asked for, the notice on the wrapper not being sufficient to displace the representation implied in the transaction between the buyer and seller; but (2) that the company had proved that the deficiency in weight arose without any fraudulent intent, and conviction quashed.

GALBRAITH'S STORES, LIMITED, grocers and provision merchants, Glasgow, were charged in the Police Court of the city of Glasgow on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, at the instance of J. J. M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal. The charge in the complaint was "that you did on the 2nd day of December 1911, in your shop at 268 Cumberland Street, South, Glasgow, sell to Crawford Mess, eleven years of age, son of and residing with James Mess at 111 Watt Street, South, Glasgow, on behalf of Charles Findlater MacDonald, an inspector of weights and measures of the city of Glasgow, one print of fresh butter, represented by you to weigh 4 ounces imperial weight, which was found to be of less weight than the weight so represented, contrary to the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907, sec-

The case set forth :—

"The following are the facts proved :—

"On the evening of 2nd December 1911, Charles F. MacDonald, an inspector of weights and measures, sent a boy named Crawford Mess to the shop of the appellants at 268 Cumberland Street, South, Glasgow, with a specific order in writing, marked A of process, in the following terms, viz :—

$\frac{1}{2}$ stone potatoes.
 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. fresh butter.
 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. best cheese.
1 $\frac{1}{2}$ vegetables.

The boy went to the shop as instructed and presented the written order to a shop lad named William Craig, in the employment of the appellants, who supplied him with potatoes, fresh butter, and cheese, but in handing back the written order, A of process, with the goods, told Mess that he could get the vegetables two doors down the street. The boy tendered 1s. in payment of the goods and received 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. change. The butter supplied was made up into a mould or print, and was wrapped in a paper wrapper, labelled outside,— wrapper of the butter. No remark, other than that about the vegetables, was made to him. On his going towards the door of the shop he was met by Inspector MacDonald, and at once taken back to the counter of the shop. The boy pointed out the shop lad Craig (who is about sixteen or seventeen years of age) as having supplied him with the goods ordered, which Craig admitted. Craig also admitted to the inspector that the goods were in the same condition as when supplied by him. Inspector MacDonald then in accordance with the statute founded on, had the goods weighed in his presence, and in presence of the shop lad and the shop manager, James Clark. The weighing was done on the shop scales after the inspector had tested them and found them correct. On being weighed the potatoes and cheese were found correct. The butter was found to be short of a quarter pound, and to weigh only 3 ozs. 9 drams, inclusive of the wrapper, and 3 ozs. 7½ drams exclusive of the wrapper—a deficiency exceeding 10 per cent. The price of the butter supplied was 3½d. When the butter was being weighed the shop manager, James Clark, told MacDonald that it was not sold by weight, and referred him to the notice on the wrapper, this being the first verbal intimation to either MacDonald or his messenger, Mess, of the terms of the notice. The manager also stated that all the employees of the shop, including Craig, had instructions to sell the fresh butter by print and not by weight—a statement which Craig at the time denied, but at the trial admitted. Butter is a commodity customarily sold by weight. The practice in Glasgow is to sell fresh butter in prints similar in shape and appearance to the print in this case, but always by imperial weight. The wholesale price of prime fresh butter at the date of the libel, viz., 2nd December 1911, was 1s. 4d. per pound.

“ Appellants' explanation given at the trial was to the following effect. They have about fifty shops, and until about eighteen months ago they sold their fresh butter in prints of a quarter pound and a half pound imperial weight. Owing, however, to a complaint by a weights and measures inspector of short weight in some quarter-pound prints of fresh butter and overweight in others which had been exposed for sale in one of their suburban shops, the appellants resolved, while continuing to sell their salt butter by weight, not to sell their fresh butter by weight, but in small and large prints. They accordingly issued a written instruction to their shop managers and inspectors, not to sell fresh butter by weight, but in small and large prints, and also to point out to customers when purchasing that it was not sold by weight. Two customers testified that in the case of purchases by them of fresh butter this instruction had been carried out. Some verbal instructions were also given to salesmen to alter written orders for a quarter or a half pound of fresh butter by the substitution of 'small print' or 'large print,' instead of 'quarter pound' or 'half pound.' No intimation was made to the public of the change by written or printed notice, it being left to the shopmen to intimate to individuals, whether formerly customers or not, the new method of dealing. There was no proof of renewal of these instructions or insistence upon them. It was admitted by the shop lad Craig that he had on one or two former occasions sold fresh butter as quarter and half-pound prints, and had made no intimation to the customers of the fact that the butter was not sold by weight, and the shop manager Clark also admitted that there might have been occasions on which he had sold prints of fresh butter under similar cir-circumstances without making any intimation. The appellants receive June 25, 1912. their fresh butter in bulk at their store in Paisley, where it is made up into small and large prints and sent out to their various shops. The managing director's explanation was that the price and size of the prints had been varied from time to time according to the market rates. He said that when butter was cheap the size of the print was increased. But he also said that when butter rose in price the prints were raised in price also. No intimation was made to the shopmen about any increase or decrease in weight of the prints. At the date libelled, viz., 2nd December 1911, the small prints weighed $3\frac{1}{2}$ ozs., and the large prints 7 ozs., and the prices were $3\frac{1}{2}$ d. and 7d. respectively. Only the appellants knew the weights of the small and large prints of fresh butter, as it was on their instructions to their store employees in Paisley that the variations in weight were made. Questions put by the Court failed to elicit whether the reduction in weight from a quarter pound began at once eighteen months ago, or whether the reduction had been a gradual subsequent process. The shopmen did not, or at least professed not to know what the actual weight of the prints was. About 3000 pounds of fresh butter are made into small and large prints weekly, and at the appellants' shop at 268 Cumberland Street from sixty to seventy dozen small prints of fresh butter are sold weekly.

"I held (1) that in the sale of the butter to the message boy who presented the order for a specific weight of butter, the statement on the wrapper, not confirmed by knowledge and acceptance of the purchaser, was not reasonable and was no part of the contract; (2) that in the absence of such knowledge and acceptance by the purchaser the delivery of the butter by the shop lad in silent response to a specific order constituted a representation of the quantity ordered; and (3) that in such a transaction, which was within the scope of the shop lad's employment, the appellants were liable for his act, notwithstanding any general instructions given to him. Accordingly I found the facts libelled in the complaint to have been fully proved, reserving for separate consideration the defence set up under the statute that the deficiency of over ten per cent in weight had arisen without fraudulent intent. On this head I was so far from being satisfied that I came to the conclusion from appellants' own explanations in defence, that their extraordinary system of dealing in fresh butter was inherently fraudulent, not only conducing to but producing as a practically inevitable consequence, the incident founded upon in the prosecution. I convicted the appellants as libelled, and fined them £5."

The questions of law were:—“(1) Whether on the facts proved I was right in holding that the appellants represented the weight of the butter sold and delivered by their shop lad to the message boy to be a quarter pound? (2) Whether appellants are liable under the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907, section 60, in respect of the deficiency? (3) Whether on the facts proved I was right in holding that the appellants had failed to establish that the deficiency in question had arisen without any fraudulent intent? (4) Whether, in the circumstances, the conviction was justified?”

The appeal was heard before the High Court on 12th and 13th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The section libelled made it an offence to sell goods which were not of the weight represented. The prosecutor must prove, therefore, that a representation as to weight was made.¹ Here the appellants had made no representation, as appeared from the notice on the wrapper. Nor had their salesman made any representation; and, even if he had, the appellants were protected by that notice.² (2) Whether there was or was not a representation, there was no fraudulent intent in this case, and fraud was of the essence of the offence. There must be mens rea on the part of the accused.³ But, in the first place, a corporation could not be guilty of an offence if the statute creating the offence required mens rea on the part of the accused.⁴ In the second place, the element of fraud was excluded by the instructions given by the appellants to their servants, and by the fact that the price paid was the price of the amount of butter actually sold. (3) The conviction was bad as the appellants were not a "person" in the sense of the section said to be contravened. It was a question of circumstances whether that word included a corporation.⁵ Here, as the section struck at fraud, it appeared that "person" was not meant to comprehend a company; for while a company might be answerable civilly for the fraud of its servant, it could not be convicted of a fraudulent offence.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The butter sold was represented as weighing $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. It was true that nothing was said as to the weight of the butter, but a representation might be made rebus et factis.⁶ Here the sale was a sale by weight. The boy handed in a paper in which the butter he desired to purchase was described as $\frac{1}{4}$ lb., and the salesman in handing over the butter handed back the paper unaltered, thereby adopting the description and making the paper to all intents and purposes an invoice of the goods supplied. It was immaterial to inquire as to the correspondence between the price paid and the amount supplied, because if a purchaser asked for a pound of butter and got half a pound it would be no answer to a charge against the seller to say that in fact the purchaser was charged only for half a pound. Nor did the notice on the wrapper safeguard the appellants, because (a) the general intimation contained in that notice could not qualify the terms of a particular contract if those terms were inconsistent with the intimation; it could be read into the contract only in the case where it did not conflict with the express terms of the contract; and (b) the wrapper was not seen by the purchaser at the time when the contract was made; it was put round the butter for the purpose of preserving it from being soiled; no one would expect to find a term of the contract printed on the wrapper, and the purchaser had no opportunity of examining it until the butter was in his hands after the conclusion of the contract. If the salesman had acted in accordance with the notice he would have refused to sell the butter by weight, June 25, 1912. and the notice laid it upon him to do so. If there was a representation, as submitted, then the appellants were responsible because it was made by their servant while acting within the scope of his employment.¹ (2) It was not necessary to prove fraudulent intent on the part of the appellants. In the section libelled the words "fraudulently" or "falsely" did not occur. The section contained an absolute prohibition of the sale of goods of less weight than was represented, and if goods under weight were sold the offence was committed unless the accused could prove—and it lay on him to do so²—that the deficiency arose from an innocent cause. That defence could not be maintained here. The notice on the wrapper showed that the deficiency did not occur through mistake or accident. As for the written instruction, it was not addressed to, and there was no proof that it reached, the salesmen; the appellants took no care to ensure that it was obeyed; and it proved that the appellants did not rely on the notice on the wrapper, for it called on their employees to point out to buyers that the butter was not sold by weight. The appellants' mode of selling was calculated to entrap the public, for they had formerly sold their butter by weight, and when they departed from this practice they made no alteration in the shape or appearance of their prints, but merely put a notice on the wrapper. What was meant by fraud in cases of this kind was defined in Starey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Company.³ It was possible to hold that the appellants had acted fraudulently although they were a company, because in the case of statutory offences fraud might be attributed to persons who could not be guilty of fraud in the sense of the common law. The case of *Derbyshire*⁴ was distinguishable as the charge there was for contravention of a section of a statute dealing with "false" warranties. (3) The conviction was not open to objection on the ground that the appellants were not a "person." The word "person" included a company, and a company might, therefore, be convicted under the section.⁵

At advising on 25th June 1912,—

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case the appellants were charged with having sold to a boy of eleven, who was in fact the messenger of one of the inspectors of weights and measures of the city of Glasgow, a print of fresh butter, represented by the appellants to weigh 4 ounces imperial weight, which was found to be of less weight than the weight so represented contrary to the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907. The facts proved are that the boy presented a specific order in writing for, inter alia, $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. fresh butter, that he presented it to a shop lad in appellants' employment, who supplied him with a mould or print of butter in a paper wrapper which had

Lord Salvesen.

On these facts, if they had stood alone, and assuming the relevancy of the complaint which was not challenged, I think the magistrate would have been justified in holding that there had been a contravention of section 60 of the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1907. It was argued that there was no representation that a particular weight of butter was supplied, but I am unable to agree in that view. If a specific weight is demanded by a customer, and he receives a quantity of the material ordered as in implement of his order, I think there is a representation that the weight demanded has been supplied, and that it is not per se sufficient to displace this representation that on the wrapper there are printed words to the effect that the article is not sold by weight. These words are not inconsistent with the idea that the weight asked for has been supplied, any more than the words relied on in the case of Souter,¹ "Not guaranteed three per cent," were held to be inconsistent with the milk from the can so labelled being sweet milk and not, as in fact it was proved to be, a mixture of sweet and skim milk. It would be a different case if the label had stated the exact weight of the article supplied in such a way as to notify the customer who received it that he was not getting the weight he had specified, or if the customer had been verbally informed that the print of butter was not sold by weight, and that it was only approximately of the weight demanded.

It is, however, open under the same section of the statute for the accused to elide a conviction if he proves "that the deficiency in weight . . . has arisen without any fraudulent intent." On this matter the facts are as follows: About eighteen months before the incident out of which the complaint arose the appellants resolved not to sell their fresh butter by weight but in small and large prints of approximately ¼ lb. or ½ lb. in weight. They accordingly issued written instructions to their shop managers and inspectors to this effect; and it was part of these instructions that special wrappers containing the words previously quoted must be used, and that if customers asked ¼ lb. or ½ lb. the shopman was always to point out that the article was not sold by weight. Verbal instructions were also given to salesmen to alter written orders for ¼ lb. or ½ lb. of fresh butter by the substitution of small print or large print. Two customers testified that the verbal instructions had been carried out in their case when they made purchases of fresh butter, and no customers apparently were brought to give evidence to a contrary effect. It was admitted by the shop lad by whom the sale in question was effected that on one or two former occasions he had sold fresh butter as ¼ and ½ pound prints, and had made no intimation to the customers of the fact that the butter was not sold by weight; and the manager of the branch shop also admitted that he might have sold prints of fresh butter in similar circumstances without having made any similar intimation. It was also found as a fact that the wholesale price of prime fresh butter at the date of the sale was 1s. 4d. per lb., and that the butter sold to the inspector through his messenger was exactly at the rate of 1d.

per ounce or 1s. 4d. per lb. On these facts the magistrate came to the June 25, 1912. conclusion that the appellants' "extraordinary system of dealing in fresh butter was inherently fraudulent, not only conducing to, but producing as a practically inevitable consequence, the incident founded upon in the prosecution."

Galbraith's
Stores,
Limited, v.
M'Intyre.

Lord Salvesen.

I am unable to concur in that conclusion. It was admitted that there is nothing illegal in an article like butter being sold in prints or moulds without reference to weight. If, therefore, the appellants' instructions had been duly carried out, as we must assume it was intended that they should be, customers would have been informed of the appellants' system of dealing, and would not have been entitled to rely on a print of butter being of any particular weight. If, notwithstanding their instructions, the appellants had connived at their shop assistants selling a small print in response to an order for a quarter of a pound, they would not have been able to escape conviction. But no facts are found that would justify such an inference. On the contrary, as I read the facts, their instructions were carried out at the shop in question, although through carelessness or other causes the shop assistants in isolated cases neglected to observe them. Now, the proviso in the section is, I think, intended to protect the seller where he is able to show that an apparent contravention of the Act has been due to innocent mistake; in other words, that the deficiency in weight has arisen without any fraudulent intent on his part. It may be, as the magistrate says, that the system which the appellants have adopted is one which lends itself to fraud; and if they had taken no reasonable means to prevent such fraud, they would have incurred the penalty prescribed by the Act. Here, however, I am clearly of opinion that they took reasonable means to secure that the customers should be apprised that they were not selling fresh butter by weight; and, indeed, counsel for the respondent were unable to suggest any other practical precaution which they could have used to that end. Had their instructions been carried out a customer would never have been in doubt as to what he was getting; and even in the case libelled, where the customer was not apprised before the delivery was made that the print was not of the weight ordered, I am unable to see that he suffered any prejudice, as the price charged was exactly proportionate to the amount supplied at the wholesale rates of the day.

Another general question was argued at the bar, namely, whether the appellants, being a limited liability company, could be properly convicted of an offence which presumes a fraudulent intent. That is not one of the questions stated in the case, nor is it necessary that we should consider it even if we could competently do so. I do not propose, therefore, to express any opinion on a matter that is not unlikely to come before us in some other proceeding.

I propose that we should answer the first question in the affirmative, and the second, third, and fourth questions in the negative.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur in that opinion, and have nothing to add.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. The appellants maintained that no representation had been made by their servant of the nature contemplated by the statute. I think the stipendiary magistrate came to a right conclusion

June 25, 1912. when he found that in the absence of "knowledge and acceptance by the purchaser, the delivery of the butter by the shop lad, in silent response to a specific order, constituted a representation of the quantity ordered,"—that is, that the quantity ordered had been supplied.

Galbraith's
Stores,
Limited, v.
M'Intyre.

Lord Guthrie.

The difficult question arises under the defence which the statute allows the trader to prove, if he can, namely, "that the deficiency in weight . . . has arisen without any fraudulent intent." I concur in the result favourable to the appellants, which your Lordships have reached, but I do so not without difficulty. If the question were whether the appellants had taken all reasonable means to certify to the public, at the start of the new system and since, that they were going to sell, and were selling, their fresh butter not by weight, as formerly, but in large and small prints, which had necessarily the appearance to the eye, and the apparent weight to the hand, of the previous half and quarter pounds, while they were continuing to sell their salt butter as before by weight, I should have decided as the stipendiary magistrate has done. But this is not the question we have to determine. It is enough for the appellants, even if they might have done more and should have done more, to prove that they have done enough to show that the deficiency in weight arose without any fraudulent intent on their part. I do not wonder that the stipendiary magistrate came to an opposite result. But, on the whole, I think they have established the statutory defence in view of (1) the reason which led to the change of practice; (2) the appellants' written instructions to their shop managers and inspectors, and their verbal instructions to their salesmen; (3) the terms of the label on the wrappers, unsatisfactory as they are; and (4) the fact that the butter was sold at the wholesale price of prime fresh butter at the time.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the other questions in the negative, and quashed the conviction.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 430, enacts that certain specified officials may enter any building in which any article is sold or exposed for sale by weight, measure, or number, or in which any article is weighed, measured, or numbered; and he may seize the same if the weight, measure, or number does not correspond with that represented "by the person who has sold, or made up, or kept, or exposed the same for sale, or who weighed, measured, or numbered the same

. . . and the magistrate may sentence the person who has sold, or made up, or kept, or exposed the same for sale, and who has incorrectly weighed, measured, or numbered the same " to a penalty.

Masterton v.
Soutar.

Held (1) that, as the section in terms imposed a penalty only on persons who both sold and also incorrectly weighed goods, a complaint which charged the accused merely with selling goods under weight was irrelevant.

Collier v.
Soutar.

Semble, decision in Barty v. Hill, 1907 S. C. (J.) 36, 5 Adam, 235, differed from.

Held (2) that under the section the powers therein conferred were confined to the officials mentioned, and could not be delegated; and that, accordingly, a sale to a messenger sent by one of these officials for the purpose of purchasing the article would not support a charge of contravention of the section.

Statutory Offences—Weights and Measures—Sale of goods under weight—Goods weighed along with wrapper—Absence of fraudulent intent—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 430.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 430, imposes a penalty on persons who incorrectly weigh and sell goods under weight, unless they prove that the deficiency in weight "has arisen without any fraudulent intent."

A firm of provision merchants was in the practice of making up their tea in packets in readiness for delivery to purchasers. The tea contained in the packets, which were sold as $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. packets, fell below that weight by $5\frac{1}{2}$ drams, the weight of the paper wrapper of the packet; and on the outside of the wrapper was printed "This packet is guaranteed gross weight." It appeared that in the district where the firm carried on business "gross weight" was understood to mean the combined weight of an article and its receptacle; and that in the grocery trade it was a general practice for a grocer, when he was weighing tea in the presence of the purchaser, to put a paper bag along with the tea into the scales.

A purchaser having been supplied with one of these packets in response to a request for $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of tea—

Held that the above section was not thereby contravened, as it appeared from the circumstances that the deficiency in the weight of the tea was not due to fraudulent intent.

So held also in circumstances which were similar, except that the words printed on the packets were: "Full weight of tea including wrapper."

On 2nd November 1911 Thomas Masterton was charged in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline under a summary complaint at the instance of John S. Soutar, Procurator-fiscal. The complaint contained two charges, the first, which was alone the subject of appeal, being in these terms:—"Thomas Masterton, Simbur Place, Bowhill, as shop manager and the person locally in charge of their retail premises at Bowhill, Auchterderran Parish, Fife, of the affairs of the company known as Dick's Co-operative Institutions, Limited, and having its registered or head office at Bonnar Street, Dunfermline, you are charged at the instance of the complainer that (1) on 12th October 1911, at said premises at Bowhill, when locally in charge as aforesaid, you did, in response to a demand in your presence upon your assistant, James Dowie, by Alexander Loudon, Cupar, assistant to and acting as messenger for Robert Robertson, an Inspector of Weights and Measures for the county of Fife, appointed by the County Council of Fife, for a half pound of tea sell and deliver by Collier v.

On the same date Margaret Collier, shopmanager of the retail premises of the Buttercup Dairy Company at Bowhill, was also charged on a summary complaint in the same Court. The charge was in substantially the same terms as that quoted above, the only material variation being that in Collier's case the words printed on the paper bags were, "Full weight of tea including wrapper."

In both cases objections were taken to the relevancy of the charge. These objections, which are stated in the argument for the appellants infra, were repelled by the Sheriff-substitute (Umpherston); and, after evidence led, the accused were convicted.

* The second charge (which was found not proven by the Sheriff-substitute, and with which this appeal was not concerned), dealt with certain other packages, which were seized as not being of the weight represented.

† The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), enacts:—Sec. 430. "Chief Constable or inspector to have power to enter premises and require articles to be weighed.—The chief constable, or any other constable specially appointed to perform the duty by the chief constable, or any inspector of weights and measures in the burgh, may, at all reasonable hours, enter any building or part of a building, or other place within the burgh in which any article is sold, or is made up, or kept or exposed for sale by weight or measure, or in which articles are sold or are set apart, or kept or exposed for sale in numbers, or in which any article is weighed or measured, or any articles are numbered with a view to their being bought or sold, or he may stop any cart or carriage, or any person carrying or in charge of any basket from which such articles are sold, or kept or exposed for sale, on the street, public or private, and require such article or articles to be weighed, measured, or numbered in his presence; and if the weight, measure, or number thereof ascertained does not correspond with the weight, measure, or number thereof which has been represented by the person who has sold or made up, or kept or exposed the same for sale, or who weighed, measured, or numbered the same with a view to purchase or sale, such chief constable or other constable or inspector may seize, impound, and convey such article or articles to the police office, or to an office provided for the purpose by the Commissioners, and the magistrate may sentence the person who has sold or made up or kept or exposed the same for sale, and who has incorrectly weighed, measured, or numbered the same with a view to purchase or sale, to a penalty . . . unless such person shall prove to his satisfaction that the deficiency in weight, measure, or number has arisen without any fraudulent intent."

The above section was applied to counties outwith Police Burghs by section 10 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 62).

Both of the accused appealed on stated cases. In the case stated June 25, 1912. for Masterton the following facts were set forth as proved:—“(1) That the appellant was, on 12th October 1911, shopmanager and the person locally in charge, at their retail premises at Bowhill, Auchterderran, Fife, of the affairs of the company known as Dick's Co-operative Institutions, Limited, having their registered office at No. 3 Bonnar Street, Dunfermline. (2) That the said company carry on a retail business as grocers and provision merchants in Dunfermline and West Fife. (3) That the employees of the said company on the company's instructions at their said premises at Bowhill make up tea and other groceries in packets of various weights in readiness to meet the orders of their customers. (4) That, in weighing and making up these packets, the weight of the paper bag and of the article are intended together to make up a pound, a half-pound, or other quantity, and the weight of the bag is thus included in the weight of the article asked for by the purchaser. (5) That the bags in which the said company make up such packets of tea are of material as light in weight as is practicable for their purpose, and upon each bag there is printed, inter alia, the words, 'This packet is guaranteed gross weight.' Nothing except the article asked for and sold was contained in the said bags. (6) That there is a custom in the retail grocery trade when articles are sold and weighed in presence of the buyer to weigh the paper wrapper along with the article sold; that this custom does not apply to all articles; but that it does apply to tea when it is sold in quantities of less than one pound. (7) That within recent years a practice has grown up among wholesale dealers having retail shops and wholesale dealers selling through agents of selling tea in quarter-pound, half-pound, and one pound packets, such packets not being weighed in presence of the purchasers; that this practice is followed by many retail dealers; that some of such dealers include the paper wrapper in the weight of the packet, but that others give the full weight of tea exclusive of wrapper. (8) That Bowhill is situated in a mining district, and that the words 'gross weight' are well understood by miners to signify a weight inclusive of an article and of the receptacle in which it is contained. (9) That Alexander Loudon, Cupar, an assistant to Robert Robertson, Inspector of Weights and Measures for the county of Fife, on the instructions of, and as a messenger for, the said Robert Robertson, on 12th October 1911, personally ordered in the appellant's presence from James Dowie, an assistant employed at the retail premises of said company at their premises at Bowhill, Auchterderran, 'half a pound of tea and two pounds of sugar.' (10) That James Dowie then sold and delivered to Alexander Loudon a half-pound packet of tea in a bag labelled as stated, having printed thereon the words, 'This packet is guaranteed gross weight,' and a two pound packet of sugar, both of which had already been made up according to the practice and in the manner narrated in findings 3 and 4 hereof, and both wrapped up in brown paper as a parcel. (11) That Alexander Loudon's attention was not directed to, nor did he see, the words on the tea bag. He left said premises, taking his said purchases with him, and delivered them to the said Robert Robertson, with whom he afterwards returned to the premises when Robert Robertson required the tea in the said packet to be weighed. This was done in the presence of Robert Robertson and the appellant by Alexander Loudon. (12) That the weight of tea therein was 122½ drachms. (3) That, apart from the representation contained in the sale, there was no proof of any dishonesty or fraudulent intent on the part of the appellant."

The case continued:—"Upon these facts, I found that the directions in section 430 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, as applied to counties by section 10 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1908, had been observed by the said Robert Robertson, as an inspector of weights and measures, and that the appellant had not discharged the onus laid on him by the statute of proving that the deficiency in weight had arisen without any fraudulent intent, and that he was guilty of the offence charged.

"With regard to the question of selling tea in packets, I found that there was no proof of a custom of trade under which the weight of the wrapper is included in the weight demanded by the purchaser of so universal and notorious a character that any person purchasing tea in packets must be understood to contract that the wrapper should be included in the weight."

The facts stated in Collier's case were substantially the same, except that the words printed on the bags were "Full weight of tea including wrapper."

In both cases the questions of law were:—" (1) Is the complaint relevant? (2) On the facts as above set forth, was I entitled to convict the appellant of the offence charged?"

The two appeals were heard together before the High Court on 15th and 19th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The charge was irrelevant in two respects. In the first place, it was only inspectors of weights and measures and constables who were entitled to act under section 430 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, and there was nothing in the section to warrant the employment as here of a substitute or messenger by an inspector. Secondly, the procedure contemplated in the section was the seizure and impounding of goods. Here the proceedings set forth in the charge were of the nature of a trap-sale. The language of the section was obscure: but it was clear at least that the facts libelled could not constitute an offence under the section. (2) On the merits the conviction fell to be quashed. There was no misrepresentation as to the weight of the tea, for nothing was said by the salesman, and the printing on the wrapper sufficiently disclosed to the purchaser that the weight of the wrapper was included in the weight of the packet.¹ Moreover the practice of weighing the tea and the paper together was well known, and there was therefore no evidence at all of fraud.² The accused accordingly had proved that "the deficiency in weight" had "arisen without any fraudulent intent."

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The complaint was relevant. Under section 430 of the Burgh Police Act (which was considered in *Barty v. Hill*³) the offence consisted in selling or exposing for sale goods under weight. (2) On the merits the charge was proved. The appellants' case rested entirely on the printing on the wrapper of the June 25, 1912. packet. But that would not protect them, for the contract here was a verbal contract and the seller could not alter the offer or qualify his acceptance by means of a notice on the packet. Again, such a notice was material only if it was brought to the knowledge of the purchaser at the time when the contract was made: and in the present cases the purchasers were not at that time aware of the notices. Further, such notices would protect the seller only if they were in clear and explicit terms,¹ whereas the notices in question were of studied ambiguity. Accordingly the appellants had failed to prove that the deficiency did not arise from fraudulent intent.

Collier v.
Soutar.

At advising on 25th June 1912,—

Masterton's Case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case arising under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act of 1892, under section 430 which relates to frauds in selling articles by weight. The circumstances set forth are that Robert Robertson, an inspector of weights and measures, sent Alexander Loudon as his messenger to the shop of the appellant to ask for half a pound of tea, and two pounds of sugar, and that in response to that demand the person serving in the shop handed to Loudon a packet of tea weighing half a pound, but the weight of the wrapper being from five to six drachms, the quantity of tea was deficient by that amount. Conviction followed on this charge, which went to trial, the judge having repelled an objection to relevancy, stated on the ground that the clause of the statute did not authorise the inspector to purchase goods by another, but only authorised him to do so himself. This objection was insisted in at the debate, it being maintained that the Act does not show an intention to take notice of purchases made to entrap the seller—and this plainly was the case here, there being added an order for sugar to give it the appearance of a bona fide purchase—but is directed only to authorise the seizure of goods represented to be of a given weight, on the representation as to weight being found to be false when the goods are placed on the scale before the inspector.

It is necessary to examine the terms of the enactment closely. It empowers the person appointed under its authority to enter buildings where articles are sold, made up, or kept, or exposed for sale by weight, or in which any article is weighed with a view to purchase or sale, and to seize such article if deficient in weight. By a most unfortunate want of care in drafting, the section does not clearly point to the weighing taking place in presence of the inspector where the article is in a shop or other premises. The words seem to apply only to a different case—that of a person in charge of articles in the street for sale on the street. If the words are read strictly, they do not cover the case in question. It cannot be doubted that the words in question were intended to apply in both cases, but it is not for the Court to insert words which have been omitted, in order to make a statutory provision operative beyond its express terms.

June 25, 1912. But this point is of little consequence, as I hold that the case can be disposed of on other and more direct grounds.

Masterton v.
Soutar.

Collier v.
Soutar.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

It is next provided that if the weight does not correspond with the weight which has been represented by the person who has sold, or made up, or kept or exposed the same for sale, or who weighed the same with a view to purchase or sale, the person authorised to make the demand may convey such article to the police office, "and the magistrate may sentence the person who has sold, or made up, or kept or exposed for sale, and who has incorrectly weighed . . . the same with a view to purchase or sale, to a penalty not exceeding £5." Here, again, the drafting seems to have been unsatisfactory, for while in each of the two statements the words describing the two things struck at are the same, in the statement of them as regards the occurrence at the time of the offence, they are disjoined by the word "or," while in the statement of what the magistrate may do, they are conjoined by the word "and." Can this latter statement, which is truly the setting forth of the offence for which the magistrate may inflict a penalty, be read otherwise than as requiring him to be satisfied that both branches have been proved? I do not see how the Court can do otherwise than so hold. To hold that both parts of the statement quoted need not be proved would be to read "and" as if it meant "or"; and, although in some cases where the context seemed to justify it the word "and" has been read disjunctively, I cannot see upon what ground that can be done in dealing with the clause before us. If that be so, there do not seem to be any facts which would justify its being held that the accused had offended in both particulars, which, according to the strict reading of the clause, would be necessary before any conviction could follow. And indeed both are not charged in the first charge. It is most unfortunate that the clause is so framed as to lead to what, it may well be, is a miscarriage—according to the intention of the Legislature—but it is not for this Court to correct blunders in order to give effect to supposed intentions. The statutory enactments must be dealt with as their words require they should be, whatever be the consequence. The complaint here states in the first charge the first part only of what it is said will justify the infliction of a penalty. Everything after and including the word "and" is left out, and this must, I think, be held fatal to the charge.

Again, when the clause is examined, it is found that it has one procedure by the officer in contemplation, and one only, viz., that he may enter premises, and there proceed to act. There is nothing in the section to sanction proceedings under it by the officer sending someone else to go into premises, and there buy an article and remove it from the premises, out of the sight of the person from whom he received it. The Act seems to contemplate that all that is done up to the time of seizure shall be done in the premises in which the article which forms the subject of investigation is at the time, the intention plainly being that the official investigation shall take place where the article is, and then and there in the presence of the keeper of the premises in which it is offered for sale. This seems only fair, for if the article were taken away the person who had it in his premises would have no opportunity of seeing the weighing and checking it. He is entitled to see that those who charge him with incorrect weighing do the check-weighing correctly. And this is what the statute secures to him. June 25, 1912. It does not deal with general sales, but with a sale on a representation to a proposing purchaser made in the premises, and followed at once with a weighing operation, while the article is intact, and in presence of the person offering it for sale. If this view be sound then the complaint does not set forth what is required by the statute, as the narrative is that one Alexander Loudon, acting as the official's messenger, bought the article, and it is stated in the facts found that he left the premises, taking his purchase with him. That was plainly not the sequence of events contemplated by the Act.

Masterton v. Soutar.

Collier v. Soutar.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lastly, the Act contains a proviso that where there is deficiency of weight, the person selling may escape conviction if he can prove that there was no "fraudulent intent." The Sheriff held that the accused had failed to prove this. It is therefore necessary to look at the facts found proved to see whether they should not have been held to constitute such proof. These facts are:—(1) That the appellant's company sell their $\frac{1}{2}$ -lb. packets with these words printed on them,—“This packet is guaranteed gross weight.” (2) That it is the custom in the grocery trade when articles are sold by weight in the buyer's presence, to weigh the paper wrapper along with the article, and that this custom applies to tea sold in quantities of less than a pound. (3) That it has been a custom in recent years to sell such packets without their being weighed in presence of the purchaser, and that some dealers include the wrapper in the weight, and some give full weight exclusive of the wrapper. (4) That in the district in question “gross weight” is well understood to signify weight inclusive of the article and the receptacle in which it is contained. (5) That Loudon asked for half a pound of tea and two pounds of sugar, and received a packet of tea on which the words “This packet is guaranteed gross weight” were printed.

Now the Sheriff has held that these proved facts did not amount to proof that there was no “fraudulent intent.” That is a decision in law, and in my opinion it was erroneous. The packet being sold as “gross weight,” and so declared on the wrapper, and “gross weight” being known to mean weight including wrapper, the evidence negatived fraudulent intent, for the representation in handing over the packet was not a representation that the packet contained half a pound of tea, but represented only that the tea and cover, together as a packet, were of a gross weight of half a pound, which was true. I would have come to the conclusion on these facts that the onus was discharged, even had there been no precedent for that view. But in the case of *Bridger*¹ it has already been held in practically similar circumstances that it cannot be said that there was a presumption of guilt of fraud. I think the appellant is entitled to say: If, in the same circumstances as occurred here, it has been held that fraud is not proved, does it not logically follow that I discharge the onus laid on me by the Act by proving that the circumstances are the same?

It is unnecessary to notice the second charge, as the Sheriff gave a verdict of acquittal.

I would move your Lordships to answer both the questions in the negative.

Masterton v.
Soutar.

Collier v.
Soutar.

LORD SALVESEN.—The complaint upon which the appellant in this case was convicted is laid on section 430 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. The substance of the first charge is that on a given date the appellant, in response to a demand made by Alexander Loudon (who acted as a messenger for Robert Robertson, an inspector of weights and measures) for a half pound of tea, sold and delivered to Loudon a packet of tea which weighed half a pound including the paper wrapper, but was some drachms short of the full weight of tea demanded. On this charge the Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused. The second charge is to the effect that on the same date and in the same premises the appellant represented to Mr Robertson that several other quantities of tea each weighed half a pound, and that on several of these being weighed in his presence they were found not to do so, but were deficient in weight to the extent of the weight of the paper wrapper. This second charge the Sheriff-substitute has found not proven. The facts show that the only difference between the two cases was that in the former Loudon asked for half a pound of tea and that a packet which did not contain a full half pound of tea was handed to him without remark by the shopman in charge, whereas in the other case the inspector simply demanded that certain packets which he found in the shop should be weighed, and there was no express or implied representation as to the amount of tea they contained.

At the first diet the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground that section 430 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, only authorised the inspector of weights and measures, and not an assistant, to purchase goods. This objection was repelled. At the debate before us the objection to relevancy was pressed in a somewhat enlarged form, and in particular it was maintained that section 430 does not contemplate trap purchases but the seizure of packages represented to be of a given weight, which is ascertained to be false on their being weighed by the official on whom the power is conferred.

I have found this objection attended with much difficulty. The heading of the section is "Chief Constable or Inspector to have power to enter premises and require articles to be weighed," and according to the ordinary meaning of the sequence of clauses this seems to be a fair description of it. The first clause is devoted to conferring power on the chief constable, or anyone specially appointed by him to perform the duty, or any inspector of weights and measures, to enter any building in which an article is sold, or is made up, or kept, or exposed for sale by weight, or in which any article is weighed with a view to its being bought or sold, or he may stop any cart or any person carrying any basket from which such articles are sold or exposed for sale on the street, and require such article to be weighed in his presence. I pause here to observe that the words "in his presence" have no proper correlative in the case of an entry of a building such as that with which we are concerned here, but directly apply to the other case dealt with of a person carrying or in charge of any basket from which articles are sold, or kept, or exposed for sale on the street, and this is an instance of the extremely bad draftsmanship which is characteristic of the Act as a whole. It may readily enough be assumed that the draftsman intended the words "in his presence" to apply not merely to the person carrying or in charge of a basket, but to a person in charge of the premises described in the June 25, 1912. section, and entered under its authority, but no such person is mentioned, ^{Masterton v.} and on a strict reading of the section it would appear that it is only in the Soutar. case of a person who is stopped in the street carrying any articles sold by ^{Collier v.} weight, or in charge of a basket containing such articles, that it is impera- Soutar. tive that the weighing should be done in his presence. Such a distinction ^{Lord Salvesen.} is of course meaningless and can scarcely have been intended, and indeed is assumed not to exist by the person who framed the second charge ; but the Court has to deal with statutes as they find them and is not at liberty to interpolate words with the view of making a provision intelligible or consistent. The section then proceeds: "If the weight . . . does not correspond with the weight . . . which has been represented by the person who has sold, or made up, or kept or exposed the same for sale, or who weighed . . . the same with a view to purchase or sale, such chief constable," &c., may convey such article to the police office, "and the magistrate may sentence the person who has sold or made up, or kept, or exposed the same for sale, and who has incorrectly weighed " the same with a view to purchase or sale, to a penalty not exceeding £5. Here, again, a difficulty is created by the use of the word "and" in the last clause. Strictly construed, it would appear that the person who is liable to conviction must not merely have sold the article in question but also have incorrectly weighed it, whereas in the earlier part of the clause it is made clear that a distinction is made between premises in which a thing is sold or exposed for sale, and premises in which an article is weighed with a view to sale. One would therefore have expected that the clause I have already quoted should have been alternative, and should properly have been introduced by the word "or" and not by the word "and." The offence, however, is constituted by the latter clause, and reading it, as I think we are bound to do, strictly, I think it only applies to the person who has incorrectly weighed the article in question, as well as sold, or made it up, or kept, or exposed it for sale. It is true that in certain cases the Court have found themselves entitled to read the word "and" disjunctively and not cumulatively, but I see no ground upon which such a construction would be warranted in dealing with this very peculiar and very ill-drawn clause. If this be a sound view, there is no statement in the complaint (and no finding in fact) that the accused Thomas Masterton, who was in charge of certain retail premises at Bowhill belonging to a company known as the Dick's Co-operative Institution, Limited, had incorrectly weighed the packages in question, although there is a general finding that the employees of the Company at Bowhill were instructed, in weighing and making up packages of tea, to include the weight of the paper bag in the half pound or pound packets in which they sell this commodity.

I am unwilling to base my judgment on relevancy on so technical a point, but there is a further objection which goes to the root of the complaint, viz., that the representation must be made to the chief constable or constable specially appointed by him to perform the duty, or to the inspector of weights ; and that the complaint discloses that the representation relied on here was made to a messenger of the inspector of weights and not in his presence at all. In my opinion that objection is sound. Assuming, for the

June 25, 1912. sake of brevity, that the inspector were the only person authorised to enter the premises, then the section reads that he may enter certain premises and may require certain articles to be weighed; and then it goes on to say that if the weight does not correspond with the weight represented by the person in charge, he (the inspector) may convey the articles to a police office. The kind of case which would clearly fall under the section would be one where articles were displayed on the counter of a shop, in packets marked as of a given weight. The representation would then be contained on the packet itself; and an offence would prima facie be committed by the person in charge of the premises if the weight did not correspond with what was represented on the wrapper. Equally so if an inspector entered the shop and made a purchase of some article by weight and was given a parcel which did not contain the full weight of the article purchased. It is, of course, just as bad to make such a representation to an assistant of the inspector as to the inspector himself. But the same would apply to a member of the public who removed the article sold from the shop and afterwards communicated with the inspector of weights, who found it to be below the weight represented, and I find nothing to suggest that such a case was contemplated by the particular section with which we are now dealing. The truth is, that the section seems to be framed on the footing of preventing fraud on the public by arming certain officials with the power of entry, and not to provide for frauds which have actually taken place. I have therefore come to be of opinion that the objection to relevancy is sound, although I am fully alive to the fact that one of the best modes of detecting and punishing a fraudulent course of dealing, to wit, by means of a trap purchase made by some person who will not be recognised as acting under official instruction, will thus not be available. If the section had intended to deal with such cases it ought to have constituted it an offence for any person to give under-weight in a sale of an article of which a quantity of a given weight was demanded by the purchaser, and then to have armed certain officials with the preventive powers which the section confers. The only reason that occurs to me why the section was not so framed was that the dealer in such a case would not have the protection which the Act intended him to have of having the article immediately weighed in his presence, so that the deficiency in weight could be correctly ascertained. It would be a dangerous thing where a sale had been made to a member of the public who might subsequently have tampered with the contents of the parcel, if it should be open to him thereafter to call in an inspector of weights to ascertain its weight, with the view of making a charge against the seller; and while there can be no suggestion of this having been done in the present case, it affords a reason why the section should have taken the form in which it appears in the statute.

The section concludes with a proviso to which I have not hitherto referred, which is expressed in these terms: "Unless such person shall prove to his satisfaction, that the deficiency in weight, measure, or number has arisen without any fraudulent intent." Now the facts as found here are that each packet of tea had printed upon it the words—"This packet is guaranteed gross weight," and it is expressly found that the bags in which the Company make up such packages are of material as light in weight as is practicable for their purpose; that there is a custom in the June 25, 1912. retail grocery trade, when articles are bought and weighed in presence of the buyer, to weigh the paper wrapper along with the article sold, and that this custom applies to tea when it is sold in quantities of less than one pound. Further, it is found that Bowhill is situated in a mining district, and that the words gross weight are well recognised to signify a weight inclusive of an article and of the receptacle in which it is contained. Moreover, there was no representation except that contained in the delivery of the packet to Loudon, in answer to his demand for half a pound of tea, that the packet contained half a pound of tea. On these facts the Sheriff held that the appellant had not discharged the onus laid on him by the statute of proving that the deficiency in weight had arisen without any fraudulent intent. I am unable to agree with him. I think where a practice has been long established of selling tea in packets, and there is a notice upon the packets that the weight of the wrapper is included in the weight, that the shopman is entitled to assume that the customer who asks for half a pound of tea is aware that he is not getting a full half pound of tea, but only a half pound of tea less the weight of the paper wrapper. I find that so far back as the year 1894, in the case of Bridger,¹ Lord Adam in the course of his opinion said: "Now it seems to be the custom of trade of this company and prevailing throughout the kingdom, in the sale of articles requiring paper to contain them when sold in small quantities, that the paper necessary for that purpose is placed on the scales and weighed along with them. Can it be said that a person following this practice of trade is to be presumed to be guilty of fraud? I think not." These words are all the more applicable to a case occurring eighteen years later, when it may be presumed that the public have become even better acquainted with the practice. I cannot say that I like the form of the notice on the packets in question. I think that it would have been far better if it had been expressed in some such form as "This packet weighs half a pound including the wrapper"; and I confess that I have a suspicion that the peculiar wording of the notice was adopted so as to make this not too clear to the unwary purchaser; but when I find that the learned Sheriff-substitute has found as a fact that the words "gross weight" are well understood by the class of customers who frequent this shop as signifying a weight inclusive of the article and of the receptacle in which it is contained, I have difficulty in understanding how he reached his conclusion. If the notice means this, as I think it does when fairly construed, it was exactly the same as if the shopman in handing the packet to the inspector's messenger had said, "This packet weighs half a pound including the wrapper," in which case it would not have been possible for a conviction to have been sustained. It is true that the onus is laid on the person who has given short weight to prove that the deficiency has arisen without any fraudulent intent, but I fail to see how he could satisfy that onus except by proving such facts as are found in the stated case. If the Sheriff saw his way to convict upon the first charge, I cannot see how he could avoid convicting also on the second; for he expressly

It may be that the law ought to be more stringent; and that it would be desirable in the interests of the public that it should be illegal to include the weight of the wrapper in response to an order for a given weight of the article which the wrapper contained; but there is no law at present which makes it illegal to sell packets of tea or other groceries although the contents of the packets are not of a given standard of weight. After all, it is questionable whether the public require any further protection than they at present have; for, provided the notice on the packet is sufficient, they are informed exactly of what they are getting, and need not receive the packet or continue dealing with a company which adopts the system of including the weight of the wrapper in the weight of the article delivered. On these grounds I have come to be of opinion that we should answer both questions submitted for the opinion of the Court in the negative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in your Lordships' opinions on relevancy, and have nothing to add.

On the question of the appellant's proof that the deficiency in weight arose without any fraudulent intent, that is, without any intention on his part to deceive, I have felt greater difficulty than your Lordships. I have not found it easy to get over the impression, hostile to the appellant, created by the words "This packet is guaranteed gross weight," printed on the packets of tea in question. The appellant did not make any public intimation of the change resolved on by him in his method of selling tea, and there was no universal change among the traders in the district to make such an announcement unnecessary. But the announcement actually made on each packet of tea sold showed that he considered it necessary to make some statement in order to prevent mistakes on the part of the public. If so, the fact that the appellant, instead of saying in so many words that the weight of the packet, including the wrapper, was so much, or that the weight of the paper bag was included in the weight sold, used words so ambiguous is by itself suggestive of an intention, if not to deceive, at least to say as little as he possibly could. And here I may point out that although there is a statement of an understanding in the district of the meaning of the words "gross weight," it is only an understanding among miners, and says nothing either about their families or about other classes of the community.

But, taking the facts proved as a whole, I am not prepared to differ. Traders, however, must not understand that the Court approves of announcements such as that of the appellant in this case. Traders will find it to their interest to see that, when an announcement of a change of practice requires to be made, it should be such as to be universally understood even when hurriedly read by unlettered people.

Collier's Case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—What I have already said in the case of Masterton applies to this case, the circumstances being substantially the same. The only real difference is that in this case the words on the wrapper were,— June 25, 1912.

LORD SALVESEN.—The complaint in this case and the facts found by the Sheriff-substitute are substantially the same as those in the case just disposed of. The only difference in the facts is that the words printed on the packet were as follows:—“Full weight of tea including wrapper.” These words are open to the same objection as the notice in the case of Masterton—that they do not give clear and unambiguous notice that the customer does not get the full quantity of tea demanded. At the same time no evidence was led that the words were not understood by persons who frequented the shop; and I cannot think that anyone who considered their meaning could arrive at any other conclusion than that the wrapper had been weighed along with the tea in order to make up the weight demanded. It would have been quite open for the prosecutor to have led evidence of this kind, as it would have had a bearing upon the sufficiency of the notice and as to whether the implied representation constituted by the sale itself had been displaced by the notice. Having in view, however, the long-continued practice and the presumed knowledge of the persons frequenting the shop, I think the notice was sufficient to displace it, and to clear the appellant of any imputation of dishonesty. As I have so fully gone into the question of relevancy in the other case, it is unnecessary to do so again, there being no material distinction between the two cases. The questions submitted to us will fall to be answered in the negative, as in the case of Masterton.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur.

the percentage of milk fat and solids required by the Regulations, "contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6, and to the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901."

It was proved that the milk did not contain the percentage of milk fat and solids required by the Regulations; that it had not been tampered with or adulterated, but had been sold in the same condition as yielded by the cows; and that the deficiency of milk fat and solids was due to the method of feeding, which had been purposely adopted to produce quantity of milk irrespective of quality.

Held that the milk was "genuine" and that the accused was not guilty of the offence charged.

“ Respondent is a tenant farmer, who is bound under his lease to keep, and does keep, 20 cows. The byre in which these cows are kept is insufficiently ventilated and has been condemned on that ground by the County Sanitary Authority. Want of ventilation, and consequent occasional high temperature, are apt to be prejudicial to the cows, but the particular effect on the milk yielded by the cows was not proved. The cows were Ayrshires and crosses, and were selected by the respondent as likely to yield a large quantity of milk. Respondent fed the cows so as to produce the largest yield of milk, and paid no attention to the quality. The cows were in fair condition, and appeared to be healthy. The respondent has dealt largely in milk in the Airdrie district for several years and no complaints have been made as to the quality of the milk.

“ The sample analysed was taken from a can which contained part of a mixture of the morning milk of seven cows. It was taken about 9.30 A.M. when the respondent was finishing his morning round.

Scott v. Jack.

"I held that the deficiency of milk fat and solids other than milk fat was due to the method of feeding, which method of feeding was purposely adopted to produce quantity of milk irrespective of quality. I further held that as it had been proved that there had been no abstraction of milk fat, of milk solids other than fat, and no addition of water, the presumption afforded by the certificate under the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, had been rebutted, and I assoilzied the respondent."

The questions submitted for the opinion of the Court were:—
 "(1) Whether milk containing only 2·57 per cent of milk fat and 7·51 per cent of solids other than milk fat, the deficiency being due to a method of feeding purposely adopted to produce quantity irrespective of quality, may be genuine milk within the meaning of the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901? (2) Whether on the facts proved I was entitled to assoilzie the respondent?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 19th and 20th March 1912 and was subsequently reheard before a full bench on 13th June 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The offence charged was selling an article which was not of the "nature, substance, and quality demanded,"¹ i.e., which was not genuine.² The Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, set up a standard of quality, and provided that milk which did not reach that standard should be presumed not to be genuine.³ In the present case the milk was proved to be below this standard, and the presumption that it was therefore not genuine had not been displaced. Milk was "genuine" when it came from a healthy cow fed under normal conditions,⁴ and not subjected to "unusual treatment."⁵ In the present case it was expressly found that the deficiency of quality was due to a special mode of feeding. Deliberately to diminish the quantity of milk fat and solids in the milk by a process of feeding while the milk was still in the cow was just as much "abstraction" in the sense of the Sale of Milk Regulations as tampering with the milk after it had been taken from the animal. On the facts proved, the respondent should have been convicted.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 was intended, as appeared from the title and the preamble, to provide for the sale of food in a "pure and genuine condition." To effect this, section 6 made it an offence to sell an article not of the "nature, substance, and quality demanded." This could not apply to the sale of milk in the state in which it came from the cow, which was truly its "pure and genuine" condition. The Act only struck at abstraction (section 9), and adulteration (section 3) as defined by Cockburn, C.J., in Francis v. Maas,⁶ and its "leading purpose" was to "suppress fraudulent imitations or counterfeits," not to ensure uniformity of quality, which would be impossible.¹ There could therefore be no offence under the Act unless there had been adulteration or abstraction,² and both adulteration and abstraction were expressly negatived in the present case. There was no finding that the article sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and without such a finding there could not be a conviction.³ In so far as *Smithies*⁴ decided that it could be an offence under section 6 of the Act to sell milk in the state in which it came from the cow, it was a bad decision, and should be disregarded. The appellant's case was made worse rather than better by his appeal to the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901. The standard of quality which they set up was not absolute, and milk might be "genuine" even though it fell below it.⁵ Further, it was clear on the terms of the Regulations that they could only be infringed in two ways—adulteration and abstraction—of both of which the respondent had been found innocent. The purchaser had, in fact, got the article for which he asked, namely, sweet milk. Nothing had been added to it and nothing had been taken from it, and therefore its genuineness as milk could not be impugned.

Scott v. Jack.

At advising on 13th July 1912,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Stated in its baldest form, the question here is whether if the prosecutor proves that milk, sold as sweet milk, is deficient in fat or solids so as to be below the minimum fixed by the Milk Regulations of 1901, a conviction must follow under the Food and Drugs Act of 1875, as for the sale of milk as sweet milk which is not genuine sweet milk—not of the nature, substance, and quality of milk. It is maintained on the part of the appellant that although the Sheriff found as matter of fact that the milk sold was milk as it came from the udder of the cow, and that there had in fact been no abstraction from it, or addition to it, he was bound to convict, because it was not up to the standard set forth in the Regulations, conform to certificate by the public analyst, and that therefore it should be held not to be genuine.

The clauses of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which seem to bear upon this case are the 6th and the 9th. The first of these strikes against selling to the prejudice of a purchaser that which "is not of the nature, substance, and quality" of the article demanded. The second (section 9) forbids the abstraction of any part of an article of food, so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature before selling it, and thereafter selling it without informing the purchaser. The Act of 1899 confers on the Board of Agriculture power to make regulations as to milk, for the purpose of determining what deficiency in the normal ingredients of milk, or what presence of other ingredients or what proportion of water shall raise a presumption that the milk is not genuine. Accordingly regulations have been

This is, in other words, to say that the expression "genuine" is not applicable where there has been such abstraction or such addition.

Scott v. Jack.
Lord Justice-Clerk.

It appears very clearly, I think, from these quotations that what is contemplated as the thing done is that out of milk taken from the cow something has been removed which was in the milk—fat or milk solids—or that something has been added to the milk, namely, water. It is very difficult to see how the words can apply to milk from which, after the cow parted with it, nothing was taken away, and to which nothing was added before sale, the buyer receiving the article exactly in the form and containing all the substances, and only the substances, which came from the teats at milking. The Acts and the Regulations entitle the prosecutor to a conviction, if he proves the fact that there is deficiency as compared with the standard of the Regulations. But the accused has the right to redargue the abstraction or addition, if he can, by evidence. Now, by what possible evidence can he overcome the prima facie case against him? He can only do so by proving that the milk was the product of the cow, and that no person through whose hands it passed before it reached the buyer either abstracted from it or added to it. It is a question of fact: Has he proved that the milk was not tampered with? If the Judge who tries the case is satisfied as matter of fact that the milk was not tampered with, is he not bound to hold that the prima facie presumption is overcome, and that there can be no conviction? Must not the finding in fact that no abstraction and no addition took place lead of necessity in law to the assoilzieing of the accused from the accusation? I confess I can see nothing wrong in law in such a judgment following on the facts supposed, and these are exactly the facts which the Sheriff found here, and upon which he is final. I am confirmed in this view by the decision in the case of Lamont v. Rodger,¹ where it was held that, if competent evidence was led which, in the opinion of the Sheriff, proved that the milk had not had anything added to or abstracted from it, he was entitled to acquit the accused. The Sheriff in that case believed numerous witnesses who negatived the tampering, but erroneously supposed that as they were the accused himself and his family and servants he was not entitled to act upon their evidence, although he believed it, without further corroboration. In that he was plainly wrong.

But it is suggested that the Sheriff here was bound to convict, because it was proved—indeed, admitted by the respondent—that the cows he kept were selected as being of a breed likely to yield a large quantity of milk, and that they had been fed in such a manner as would produce a large yield. The argument was that the large yield led to a deficiency of milk fat, and that for this the respondent was responsible under the Acts and Regulations, as for selling milk which was not of "the substance, nature, and quality" of milk. I feel bound to say that but for the case of Smithies

v. Bridge,¹ I should have had no difficulty in repelling the argument. It July 13, 1912.
 was in consequence of that case that I thought it desirable that the present Scott v. Jack.
 appeal should be argued before a fuller bench.

The case of *Smithies v. Bridge*¹ appears to me to have been wrongly Lord Justice-decided, and I concur entirely in the dissent expressed by Mr Justice Clerk.
 Darling. As regards the actual decision, the majority of the Court seem to have proceeded upon the view that the decision of the magistrate was only a decision in fact, with which the Appeal Court should not interfere.
 That might be quite satisfactory if the decision was one of fact only, and it must be presumed that matters of fact were for the magistrates alone.
 But there surely was in that case a finding in law which the Courts were entitled to review. The facts found proved were one thing, but the legal effect of those facts was another. When the magistrates gave their judgment to the effect, as stated by Mr Justice Channell, that "this liquid, though it purported to be"—which I assume must mean was in fact—"milk direct from the cow, was not of the nature, substance, and quality of milk," that was not a finding in fact but was giving a construction in law as applicable to the facts. I dissent altogether from the view expressed by Mr Justice Channell when he says: "The magistrates find that as a question of fact, and it was within their province to do so." The finding as regards nature, substance, and quality, was a finding essentially of application of the law to the facts, and when Mr Justice Channell says "we ought not to interfere with their decision," I cannot agree with his view. I think the Court were bound to consider whether the finding applying the words of the statute to the facts found was a sound legal decision on those facts, and if it was not, to quash the conviction. Mr Justice Channell says that the cow was producing "another liquid which did not contain the constituent parts of milk." I cannot understand this reasoning. If the milker goes to the cow and draws off liquid in the ordinary way, how is he to know that "another liquid" is being given off from the udder? But it is unnecessary to go into that matter, for Smithies' case¹ was not under the Regulations to which the prosecutor appeals in this case. He is not entitled to drop his case under the Regulations, and to try to upset the Sheriff's judgment by appealing to section 6 of the Act alone.

The Lord Chief-Justice in his opinion referred to the Regulations, which had then been promulgated but were not in force in the case before him.
 He accepts the view that proof of non-conformity to the Regulations is only prima facie evidence, and that the defendant can redargue it by proof of genuineness. But he then proceeds to express obiter his view that although the article produced by the cow is the result of an abnormal condition of things arising "either from disease or, as here, from unusual treatment of the cow, I think that that does amount to evidence on which the magistrates can find that the article is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded." If that means that when a party is charged with abstracting fat or adding water under the Regulations, a conviction might follow, although the magistrate held it proved that neither thing was done,

July 13, 1912. then I respectfully dissent from the obiter dictum of his Lordship. My Scott v. Jack. view is very clearly to the contrary. The Regulations enable the prosecutor Lord Justice- to throw the onus on the accused of proving "no abstraction" and "no Clerk. addition." To allow him, after the accused has discharged the onus, to demand that notwithstanding his having done so, the Regulations shall be thrown overboard and a conviction pronounced on an interpretation of section 6 alone would seem to me to be little short of oppression.

I will only add that if the prosecutor intends to make a case of something having been effected in the body of the cow, he ought to be required to state this with specification in his complaint. Whether he could relevantly do so may be a question. If it is desired to meet cases of abnormal treatment of the animals, it would probably be necessary—the whole procedure in these matters being statutory—that the Legislature should be appealed to to pass suitable enactments.

On the grounds I have stated, I would propose to your Lordships that the questions be answered in the affirmative.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. The prosecutor here, a sanitary inspector, appeals by way of stated case against the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, who has assolized the respondent. The complaint is of an alleged sale of "three-halfpence worth of sweet milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of sweet milk," the article demanded by the purchaser, in respect that it was deficient to the extents specified in milk fat and milk solids other than milk fat, conform to a certificate of analysis produced, "contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6, and to the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901 made by the Board of Agriculture in exercise of the powers conferred on them by section 4 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899." The prosecutor thus libels, and undertakes to prove, a contravention both of the Act and of the Regulations.
The argument at our bar turned mainly upon the proper construction to be put upon the Regulations. But I have come to the conclusion that the facts found by the Sheriff-substitute do not infer an offence either under the Regulations or the Act of 1875.

The facts disclose, inter alia, that the respondent's cows "were selected" by him "as likely to yield a large quantity of milk. Respondent fed the cows so as to produce the largest yield of milk, and paid no attention to the quality. . . . The milk was not tampered with or adulterated, but was sold in the same condition as yielded by the cows." The analyst's certificate produced and relied on by the prosecutor bears that the sample sold was "not genuine," in respect that it is deficient in milk fat and in milk solids other than milk fat respectively to the extents stated, "whereas genuine milk should contain 3 per cent of milk fat and 8·5 per cent of milk solids other than milk fat, according to the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901." The Sheriff held "that the deficiency of milk fat and solids other than milk fat was due to the method of feeding, which method of feeding was purposely adopted to produce quantity of milk irrespective of quality." He further held "that as it had been proved that there had been no abstraction of milk fat, of milk solids other than fat, and no addition of water, the presumption afforded by the certificate under the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, had been rebutted," and assoilzied the respondent. In my opinion the Sheriff-July 18, 1912.

substitute was right.

Scott v. Jack.

Lord Dundas.

It is, I think, worth while to trace the use of the word "genuine" in the legislative provisions affecting this matter. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875,¹ proceeds upon the preamble that it was desirable "that the law regarding the sale of food and drugs in a pure and genuine condition should be amended." The word "genuine," however, does not occur in any of the sections (3 to 9 inclusive) which are comprised under the fasciculus "Description of Offences." Section 3 prohibits mixing any article of food with any ingredient or material so as to render it injurious to health, with intent that the same may be sold in that state, and selling the same so mixed. Section 4 similarly prohibits the mixing of drugs with injurious ingredients and selling the same. Section 6 enacts that no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, subject to certain provisos. Section 9 prohibits the abstraction of any part of an article of food so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature before sale, and selling it without notice. The ruling idea seems to me to be that food and drugs are not to be tampered with before sale, either by adding to or abstracting from their proper nature, substance, and quality; which is the same thing, I suppose, as is meant by saying that they must be sold "in a pure and genuine condition." The Act of 1899² reverts to the word "genuine," and seems to carry on the idea above indicated, when it confers (section 4) power on the Board of Agriculture to make regulations for determining what deficiency in any of the normal constituents of genuine milk, or what addition of extraneous matter or proportion of water in any sample of milk shall, for the purposes of the Acts, raise a presumption, until the contrary is proved, that the milk is not genuine, or is injurious to health. In pursuance of this power the Board issued in 1901 the Regulations already referred to, which provide (confining one's attention to the sections said to affect the case before us) that where a sample of milk (not being milk sold as skimmed or separated or condensed milk) contains less than a specified percentage of milk fat, or of milk solids other than milk fat, it shall be presumed for the purposes of the Acts, until the contrary is proved, "that the milk is not genuine, by reason of the abstraction therefrom of milk fat," or of milk solids other than fat, as the case may be, "or the addition of water." I think the words quoted are in substance a definition, or at least an explanation, for the purposes of the Regulations and of the Acts, of what is meant by "genuine."

Now, it is clear from the facts found by the Sheriff that in this case there was no abstraction of milk fat or other solids, and no addition of water, and no tampering with or adulteration of the milk after it left the cow's udder. This appears to me to exclude the application of the Regulations altogether. Their language seems to me designedly to confine the presumption that milk is not genuine to cases where milk fat or other solids have been abstracted from it, or water added to it; and I do not think it can be held to apply, if I may so put it, to an alleged adulteration of the ² 62 and 63 Vict. cap. 51.

July 13, 1912. milk while yet in the body of the cow, resulting from, and effected by, a peculiar method of feeding. If this construction is correct, the respondent has, upon the proved facts, successfully rebutted the presumption.

Scott v. Jack.
Lord Dundas. It is right to notice the English case of Smithies v. Bridge,¹ to which the appellant's counsel urgently directed our attention. That decision is not, of course, binding upon us ; but I should see no necessity for differing from it, as a decision, if it can be regarded as merely proceeding upon a finding in fact pronounced by the magistrates which it was within their province to make, and which they had some evidence before them to justify. On that hypothesis, one would readily agree that the majority of the English Court were right in declining to disturb the judgment of the magistrates. I observe, however, from the opinion of Channell, J., that the magistrates found that "this liquid, though it purported to be milk direct from the cow, was not of the nature, substance, and quality of milk." If that was the finding, I am unable to agree with the learned Judge when he says :—"The magistrates find that as a question of fact, and it was within their province to do so. In my opinion they were entitled to come to that conclusion, and we ought not to interfere with their decision." I humbly think that the magistrates' finding involved matter of legal construction, which it was for the Court to determine, as well as matter of fact properly so called ; and it seems to me that the Court ought to have quashed the conviction. I confess that I cannot accept the view indicated by Channell, J., that "the cow was not in fact producing milk, but was producing another liquid which did not contain the constituent parts of milk" ; and I think there is irresistible force in the observation by Darling, J. (who dissented), "Unless we can say that the liquid he got was not milk, we cannot uphold this conviction. . . . But if it was not milk, what was it?" I humbly think that the appellant in Smithies' case¹ ought not to have been convicted of an offence under section 6 of the Act ; and it seems to me that, even if the present prosecutor could escape from the onus he has undertaken of proving a contravention of the Regulations of 1901, his case under section 6 would fail, in the circumstances here proved. The appellant founded upon a passage in the opinion of Lord Alverstone, C.J. (who agreed with Channell, J.), in Smithies v. Bridge,¹ where his Lordship refers to the Regulations of 1901, which were before the Court, though they did not apply to the case then under consideration, the prosecution in which had (I apprehend) been instituted before the Regulations came into force. The Lord Chief-Justice said :—"As to the recent order of the Board of Agriculture, I do not think it purports to set up a standard of what is or is not genuine milk, but only means to say that the want of a certain percentage of fat is to be prima facie evidence that the milk is not genuine, and it will still be open to the defendant to prove that the milk is genuine." So far, I respectfully agree. But his Lordship proceeds :—"If, however, the article produced, although it is produced by the cow, is the result of an abnormal condition of things arising either from disease, or, as here, from unusual treatment of the cow, I think that that does amount to evidence on which the magistrates can find that the article is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded." We are not here July 13, 1912. in the position of reviewing a finding such as his Lordship contemplated, Scott v. Jack. but I must frankly say that I am unable to construe the Regulations as extending to a case like the present, where the indifferent quality of the milk is attributable to "unusual treatment of the cow"; and I respectfully disagree with the obiter dictum of the Lord Chief-Justice if it means (as I gather it does) that, in face of the Regulations of 1901, magistrates could properly find a contravention of section 6 of the Act under the circumstances postulated. I do not think the appellant can take any material assistance from the case of Smithies,¹ and I should add that the subsequent case of *Wolfenden*² does not, in my judgment at all events,—looking to the very guarded opinions of the learned Judges—add anything to its weight or authority. In my opinion the terms of the Regulations, as framed, exclude their application to the present case. If the Board of Agriculture intended to include such a case, they might easily have framed their regulations accordingly; but, as matters stand, they have not, in my judgment, done so. Whether or not it is desirable that under the present, or analogous, circumstances an offence should be declared is, I apprehend, a matter for the Legislature or the Board of Agriculture, and not for this Court to consider. In my opinion the Sheriff-substitute's decision was right, and we ought to answer the questions accordingly.

LORD JOHNSTON.—[In his Lordship's absence, his opinion was read by Lord Mackenzie]—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6, made it an offence to sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser. On this, three things must be noted—First, that by the preamble, the Act proceeds on the desirability of repealing the Acts then "in force relating to the adulteration of food," and of amending "the law regarding the sale of food, &c., in a pure and genuine condition." It is thus clear that "genuine" is used in contradistinction to "adulterated," and that "genuine" means "unadulterated." Second, that the "not of the nature, substance, and quality" of section 6 is really an expansion of the "not genuine," or "adulterated," of the preamble. Third, that there is no provision of any standard for any particular article of food. Accordingly, it is not surprising that there was considerable difficulty in applying the Act, at anyrate in the case of such an article as milk.

This resulted in the enactment of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, section 4, which conferred on the Board of Agriculture a power of making Regulations for determining what deficiencies in any of the normal constituents of genuine milk, or what addition of extraneous matter, or proportion of water, in a sample shall, for the purposes of the Sale of Food, &c., Act, 1875, raise a presumption, until the contrary is proved, that the milk is not "genuine." Here "genuine," assumes a meaning rather more extended than "unadulterated" in the ordinary sense. Negative, as well as positive, adulteration, if it be allowable to use the expression, is suggested—adulteration by abstraction as well as by addition. The Board of Agriculture may

² (1905) 20 Cox's Criminal Cases, 864.

July 18, 1912. then fix a standard, on failure to attain which the article milk shall be presumed not genuine until the contrary is proved. But it is quite consistent with this provision that milk may be deficient in the normal constituents of genuine milk and yet be genuine, else how could there be any room for proving the contrary of the statutory presumption. The whole purview of the statutes leads, I think, to the conclusion that what the Legislature strikes against is tampering with—that is either negatively or positively adulterating—the article milk. What, then, is meant by milk? I think that milk in the sense of the statute is milk as drawn from the cow, not milk in the process of formation in the chyle, in the blood, or in the glands of the cow, and that what the statutes strike at is the tampering with such milk so as, by abstraction or addition, to adulterate or render it not “genuine” milk. It is therefore, I think, going beyond the statute to seek to maintain that the poverty of condition of the cow occasioned by poor feeding, and the consequent poverty of the milk yielded by the cow, constitute a statutory offence. This could only be if the statutory standard were absolute, and not merely a means of raising a presumption capable of being rebutted.

Here the respondent has disproved either the abstraction of normal constituents or the addition of foreign substances, or the addition of water, and he has therefore discharged the onus which the statutes lay upon him.

At first sight the decision in the case of *Smithies*¹ appears to give support to the contrary view, but I hardly think that it really does so. It was decided before the Regulations of the Board of Agriculture, issued under the Act of 1899, came into force, and the true ground of judgment is, as it seems to me, thus stated by Lord Alverstone, C.J.: “The magistrates have found that the article supplied was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, because it came from the cow in such a condition that it could not be described as milk at all. It is impossible, as I think, to say, having regard to the facts, that there was no evidence on which they could so find.” In other words, the magistrates’ judgment could be supported on this consideration—what was demanded was new milk, by which I assume is meant what in Scotland is termed sweet milk; what was supplied was, according to evidence, milk which, owing to neglect, had lain so long in the udder of the cow that it could no longer be termed new or sweet milk, any more than could the milk of a diseased cow. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal could not say that the judgment of the magistrates was against evidence or without evidence. I do not therefore regard the case of *Smithies*¹ as really hostile to the conclusion to which I have come in the present case.

LORD SALVESSEN.—The complaint in this case is not a model of good draftsmanship, for it appears to be self-contradictory to say that the respondent sold sweet milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of sweet milk; and it is also open to the objection that in order to succeed the prosecutor seems to have taken upon himself the onus of proving that the sale in question was not merely contrary to section 6 of the recited Act, but also to the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901. I am willing, however, to take the case on the assumption that the complaint July 13, 1912. had been properly framed and that a conviction might have been sustained ^{Scott v. Jack.} if the sale were found to have been contrary either to the Act or to the Regulations; although I am far from saying that if the technical objections ^{Lord Salvesen.} only had been pressed, they might not have been fatal. The Sheriff-substitute has, however, assoilzied the respondent, and the questions submitted to us are whether he was entitled to do so; and in particular, whether milk containing less than 3 per cent of milk fat and $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of other solids is genuine milk within the meaning of the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, where the deficiency is due to a method of feeding the cows which is purposely adopted to produce quantity irrespective of quality.

As regards the latter question I do not think there is any real difficulty. If a sample of milk contains less than 3 per cent of milk fat or less than $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of milk solids other than milk fat, the Regulations establish a presumption that the milk is not genuine. For the purpose of the Regulations, however, it appears to me that the last words of the clause define what is meant by genuine; and that what the framer of the Regulations alone had in view was that solids might be abstracted from the milk, or that the milk might be diluted by the addition of water. The respondent here was able to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that there had been no abstraction of solids or addition of water, and that he sold the milk exactly as it came from the cows. It is expressly found that the cows were in fair condition and appeared to be healthy, but that they had been selected as being of a breed which was likely to yield a large quantity of milk, and that they had been fed so as to produce the largest yield of milk without any attention being paid to the quality. I cannot hold that if, under these conditions, the cows actually yielded a milk of poorer quality than the standard fixed by the Regulations, there is anything in these Regulations to suggest that an offence has been committed; and I find nothing inconsistent with that view in the decisions to which we were referred in *Lamont v. Rodger*¹ and Gordon v. Love,² to both of which I was a party. In the former of these cases it was held that the onus of establishing that the milk was genuine might be discharged by evidence given by the accused, his mother, and servants, that the milk had not been tampered with if the Sheriff-substitute saw no reason to disbelieve the evidence; in the latter all that was decided was that section 3 of the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, was not ultra vires of the Board of Agriculture.

It was, however, strenuously maintained for the appellant that milk which was sold just in the condition in which it came from the cows might nevertheless not be of the substance, nature, or quality of milk, and so that an offence might be committed under section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875. In support of this contention much stress was laid on the decision in the case of Smithies v. Bridge,³ where a conviction was sustained because, although the milk sold was the product of the cow, its deficiency in milk fat could reasonably be attributed to the circumstance that the cow had not been milked for sixteen hours, and had presumably

July 13, 1912. absorbed into its own system a portion of the milk fat which the milk would otherwise have contained if it had been drawn off some hours earlier.

Scott v. Jack. — Some language that I used in the case of *Gordon v. Love*¹ in referring to Lord Salvesen. this decision was referred to as indicating approval of the decision there come to, and I admit it is open to that construction. It must, however, be borne in mind that the sentence founded on was a mere obiter dictum, and that the authority of the case of *Smithies*² had not been challenged ; while I understand the present case has been remitted to a fuller bench in order that we may determine whether the decision in Smithies' case² should be followed by us. As the result of the argument I have come to be of opinion that the view of the dissenting Judge (Darling, J.) is to be preferred. I agree with him that when there is a sale of sweet milk just as it comes from a healthy cow in response to a demand for sweet milk, it is impossible to say that what the purchaser has got was not of the substance, nature, and quality of the article demanded. I asked the counsel for the appellant to state how he would describe what was delivered to the appellant if it was not to be described as sweet milk, and his only answer was that it was not of the standard quality prescribed by the Regulations. But if the sale was not contrary to the Regulations, then I do not see how the Regulations can be appealed to in aid of the statutory enactment. If the purchaser had demanded sweet milk containing 3 per cent of milk fat or upwards and had got milk of a poorer quality, an offence might have been committed ; but the only demand here made was for sweet milk, and sweet milk unadulterated and not in any way tampered with was what was supplied. It is to be noted that the case of *Smithies*² was decided before the Regulations had come into operation, and I am inclined to hold that, so far as the article milk is concerned, the Regulations define what milk is to be regarded as genuine, to wit, milk which is undiluted by water and from which milk fat has not been abstracted. Further, the subsequent case to which reference was made at the debate³ indicates that the decision in Smithies' case² would not now be implicitly followed even in England. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute came to a right conclusion, and that there are no grounds for disturbing his decision.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In dealing with this case it appears to me to be necessary, in the first place, to consider whether the respondent could possibly, under this complaint, have been convicted on the facts found proved of the offence with which he is charged. The complaint libels the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, so as to make it necessary to prove that these have been contravened, otherwise the charge fails. In my opinion, if the person charged proves that the milk was in the same state as it left the cow, he does not come within the scope of the Regulations, which deal with abstraction of milk fat or milk solids, or the addition to milk of water. The Regulations do not set up a standard of what proportion of milk fat and milk solids, other than milk fat, milk must contain in order to be milk, but merely create a presumption, which the person charged must rebut if the milk on analysis proves to contain less than the percentages specified in the July 13, 1912. Regulations. In the present case it is expressly found that the milk was not tampered with or adulterated, but was sold in the same condition as yielded by the cows; that there had been no abstraction of milk fat, or of milk solids other than fat, and that there had been no addition of water. In the circumstances I am unable to see how the respondent could have been convicted on this complaint. It follows from this that the second question put by the Sheriff-substitute should be answered in the affirmative.

Scott v. Jack.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The case is, however, intended to raise the general question, whether milk may be not genuine though there has been no abstraction of milk fat or milk solids and no addition of water—that is to say, whether a man who sells sweet milk in an unaltered state can be convicted of selling what is not genuine milk—the deficiency being due to an improper method of feeding purposely adopted to produce quantity irrespective of quality. In my opinion he cannot. The Act of 1875 in its original state was entitled “An Act [to repeal the Adulteration of Food Acts, and] to make better provision for the Sale of Food and Drugs in a pure state.” The words in brackets have been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act. The preamble sets forth, “Whereas it is desirable that the Acts now in force relating to the adulteration of food should be repealed, and that the law regarding the sale of food and drugs in a pure and genuine condition should be amended.” Section 6 provides that no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser. This section, in my opinion, deals with the identity of the article demanded, and this view is confirmed by reference to the subsections (1), (2), (3), and (4), which provide that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed in the cases therein specified, all of which deal with what may be called foreign substances. According to the best definition of adulteration it is just the introduction of foreign substances into an article—Francis v. Maas and Others.¹ In the same way section 9 prohibits the abstraction of any part of an article of food before sale so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, and the sale of the same as altered without notice. There could not, in my opinion, be an offence against either section 6 or section 9, if sweet milk was asked for and sweet milk was given in an unaltered state. I cannot find in the Act, and I have already stated that I cannot find in the Sale of Milk Regulations, any warrant for charging an offence because the milk is poor in quality.

It may be that there are circumstances which require that cases of abnormal treatment or improper feeding ought to be regarded as offences. They are not, however, offences at common law unless they involve fraud, and I am unable to take the view that what is not a malum in se has been made a malum prohibitum by the Acts of 1875 or 1899 or the Regulations. As regards the case of Smithies,² I agree with what has been said by my brother Lord Dundas.

The first question in the present case should, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative.

Scott v. Jack.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I think the Sheriff-substitute has come to a right conclusion in assoilzieing the respondent. But in view of the terms of the complaint and the facts found proved, it seems to me that the question before us is truly this—Whether, in consequence of the respondent having proved that the milk was the natural product of a healthy cow, and that he had not tampered with the milk after it had left the cow, was the Sheriff bound to acquit him of the charge as libelled? I say this because I do not wish to prejudge the question which may arise in a future case of treating a cow, healthy or unhealthy, with drugs so that the milk is not in that sense the natural product of a normal animal.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—There being no difference of opinion among your Lordships I have no vote, but I may say that the result at which your Lordships have arrived coincides with the opinion which I have formed.

THE COURT answered both questions in the affirmative and dismissed the appeal.

JOHN DOCHERTY AND THOMAS GRAHAM, Complainers.—J. A. Christie.

NEIL M'LENNAN (Burgh Prosecutor, Kirkintilloch), Respondent.—

Wark.

July 17, 1912.

Docherty and Graham v.
M'Lennan.

Procedure—Proof—Admissibility of witness—Witness present in Police Court when other witnesses examined—Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1840 (3 and 4 Vict. cap. 59), sec. 3.

Section 3 of the Evidence Act, 1840 (which relaxes the common law rule excluding a witness who has heard the evidence given by other witnesses), applies only to proceedings in the Courts specified in the section, among which the Burgh Police Court is not included; and accordingly, in proceedings in that Court, it is a good objection to a witness that he has been present in Court during the examination of other witnesses in the case.

Procedure—Proof—Admissibility of witness—Examination of additional witness after case closed.

Held that it was not competent for the prosecutor in a criminal trial in a Burgh Police Court, even with the leave of the presiding magistrate, to adduce a witness after the case for the prosecution had been closed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Guthrie.

JOHN DOCHERTY and Thomas Graham, labourers, were charged in the Burgh Police Court at Kirkintilloch on a summary complaint at the instance of Neil M'Lennan, burgh prosecutor. The charge against the accused was that they had wilfully and maliciously broken the glass in the window of an unoccupied house.

The accused, after a trial at which they were not assisted by counsel or law-agent, were convicted and fined. They then brought a bill of suspension, in which they averred that at the trial "the respondent adduced the evidence of Walter Hay, Neil Brown, and Sergeant Stephens of the Police Force in Kirkintilloch, and closed the case for the prosecution. Thereafter several witnesses who had been cited for the defence were examined on oath, and cross-examined by the respondent. The case for the defence was closed, and the presiding magistrate was about to deal with the case on the evidence which he had heard, when the respondent called Andrew Matson, bank-agent July 17, 1912. and house-factor, Kirkintilloch, as a witness for the prosecution. During the whole proceedings the said Andrew Matson had been present in Court, and had heard the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses both for the prosecution and the defence.* The presiding magistrate called the attention of the prosecutor to this fact, but the respondent insisted that such procedure was common in the Police Court at Kirkintilloch, and the said Andrew Matson was accordingly examined as a witness for the prosecution. The respondent also recalled the witness Hay, who had already been examined, and had been in Court while the other witnesses were giving their evidence, and further examined him."

Docherty and Graham v.
M'Lennan.

Answers were lodged for the respondent, in which it was admitted that, after the witnesses for the defence had been examined, the respondent asked and obtained leave to examine the witness Matson, and that he was examined as a witness for the prosecution. It was also averred that the witnesses Hay and Brown had deponed that they had seen the accused breaking the glass of the window, while the witnesses for the defence deponed that they had observed the window to be broken before the date libelled, and that Matson's evidence was confined to the condition of the window on the day before that date. It was further averred that Matson was not present when the case was called, but arrived in Court (unnoticed by the respondent) while a witness for the prosecution was being examined; that the magistrate allowed Matson to be examined, although he knew that Matson had heard part of the evidence; that the witness Hay was recalled by the magistrate ex proprio motu and examined by him; and that thereafter the magistrate informed the complainers that they might lead any additional evidence they thought fit, but they intimated that they did not desire to do so.

The complainers stated, inter alia, the following plea:—The complainers are entitled to suspension in respect (1) the said procedure was irregular and illegal, in respect that after the case for the prosecution had been closed, and witnesses for the defence examined, the respondent called another witness for the prosecution who had been in Court during the whole proceedings.

The case was heard before the High Court on 17th July 1912.

Argued for the complainers;—The convictions fell to be suspended as they proceeded upon evidence which was improperly admitted.¹ There were two errors in the Court below. (1) At common law a person who had heard the testimony of other witnesses could not be

* The Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1840 (3 and 4 Vict. cap. 59), enacts:—
Sec. 3. "In any trial before any Judge of the Court of Session or Court of Justiciary, or before any Sheriff or Stewart [the revised statutes omit the words 'or Stewart'] in Scotland, it shall not be imperative on the Court to reject any witness against whom it is objected that he or she has, without the permission of the Court and without the consent of the party objecting, been present in Court during all or any part of the proceedings, but it shall be competent for the Court, in its discretion, to admit the witness where it shall appear to the Court that the presence of the witness was not the consequence of culpable negligence or criminal intent, and that the witness has not been unduly instructed or influenced by what took place during his or her presence, or that injustice will not be done by his or her examination."

examined as a witness.¹ A certain relaxation of this rule was allowed by section 3 of the Evidence Act, 1840²; but the section applied only to trials before "the Court of Session or Court of Justiciary, or before any Sheriff or Stewart in Scotland." "Stewart" was the same as "Sheriff"³; and there was nothing, therefore, to affect the operation of the common law rule in Burgh Courts. (2) It was incompetent to call Matson as a witness after evidence for the defence had been led, as proof in replication was never permissible in a criminal case.⁴

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The rules of evidence were always applied with greater strictness in the case of serious crimes tried before the higher Courts than in proceedings for less grave offences before the lower Courts. The relaxation of the common law rule which obtained in the superior Courts must be allowed also in Burgh Courts. At any rate the witness fell to be excluded only where his testimony was likely to be affected by the evidence he had heard. Here Matson was examined only in regard to the state of the window; and his evidence on that matter could not be affected by the evidence of the previous witnesses. (2) It was open to the magistrate to allow Matson to be examined after evidence for the defence had been led⁵; and, even if the magistrate had erred, no injustice had been caused to the complainers, and, therefore, there was no ground for quashing the convictions.⁶

LORD DUNDAS.—[After stating the facts]—Two objections have been taken to this conviction, viz., (1) that the witness Matson had been in Court during a substantial part of the proceedings at the trial before he gave his evidence; and (2) that it was incompetent to call him as a witness for the prosecution after the case for the prosecution, and also the case for the defence, had been closed.

The first objection appears to me to be well founded. No doubt exists as to the ancient and immemorial rule and practice of our law regarding the seclusion of witnesses. It is laid down in Hume (vol. ii., p. 379) that "before proceeding to proof all the witnesses on either part are shut up in an apartment by themselves, whence they are successively called into Court to be examined; so that it is a good objection to anyone, that he has been left at large, and has heard the testimony of another, or part of it even, by which he may shape his own." The rule is stated with equal emphasis by Alison (vol. ii., p. 542); and practice, so far as I know, has been uniform in the matter. The Evidence Act, 1840, no doubt introduced a certain emendation of the rule. [His Lordship quoted section 3 of the Act.] To that extent a qualification was introduced by the enactment, but I think that it only applies to the Courts mentioned in the Act—Courts which are presided over by experienced lawyers—and thus does not alter or modify the law and practice in regard to a Court such as we are dealing with here. It is immaterial to speculate as to the possible or probable effect of Matson's evidence upon the decision arrived at by the magistrate. I am of July 17, 1912. opinion that the first objection stated for the suspenders must be sustained. Doocherty and

It appears to me that the second objection is also a good one. The Graham v. manner in which Matson was put into the witness-box was quite indefen- M'Lennan. sible. I am clearly of opinion that a prosecutor cannot call a witness after Lord Dundas. he has closed his case. We were referred to Wynn v. Lindsay,¹ where a strong opinion to that effect was expressed by Lord Young, who treated it as a matter of decided authority from remote times. Proof in replication cannot be led in criminal proceedings, and, so far as I know, such proof has never been permitted. It was for the prosecutor, if he thought that Matson's evidence was of importance, to have asked for an adjournment as soon as he discovered that the witness was not present. He was not entitled to call him as a witness once he had closed his case. The Clerk of Court has referred me to the case of Collison v. Mitchell,² in which it was decided that an inferior Judge is entitled of his own motion to recall a witness and ask him any question he may consider necessary, even after the case for both parties has been closed; and I rather think the same course has occasionally been adopted by Judges in the High Court when the Judge, or the jury with the Judge's sanction, desire further information upon some particular matter. But it is unnecessary to deal with such exceptional cases. It is well established that proof in replication is not permissible in a criminal Court. The present case, indeed, does not truly raise any question about proof in replication; what was here done was the quite unwarranted interjection of a witness after proof was closed.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the objections stated are well founded, and that the conviction must be quashed.

LORD SALVESEN and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Held that the Regulations for the Territorial Force and for County Associations fall within this section, and may accordingly be proved by production of a copy purporting to be printed by a Government printer without other evidence ; but that the Court does not take judicial notice of the Regulations, and, therefore, that a prosecutor desiring to found on them must lodge a copy in process before closing his case.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Guthrie.

HUGH COMRIE TODD, a private in the Queen's Own Royal Glasgow Yeomanry, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of Thomas A. H. Anderson, writer, the officer authorised to prosecute on behalf of the Territorial Force Association of the County of the City of Glasgow. The charge in the complaint was that “you did, between the 1st day of November 1910 and the 31st day of October 1911, without leave lawfully granted or on account of sickness or other reasonable excuse allowed in the prescribed manner, fail to attend the number of drills in Glasgow, and fulfil the other conditions relating to preliminary or annual training prescribed for your arm or branch of the service, contrary to section 21 of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907.” *

After a trial the Sheriff-substitute (A. S. D. Thomson) found the accused guilty of having, without leave or reasonable excuse, failed to attend the prescribed number of drills, and imposed a fine.

The accused appealed on a stated case which submitted a number of questions of law, of which, however, only one was answered by the Court, viz. :—“(4) In respect that the Regulations for the Territorial Force and for County Associations were not produced by a witness on oath, were they competently in evidence, and if not could I competently convict the appellant of the alleged contravention ?”

In regard to this question it was stated in the case that it was proved “that in terms of the Regulations for the Territorial Force the number of drills prescribed in connection with the training of the Yeomanry which the appellant required to attend is ten per annum after the first year.”

The case also stated that “the Regulations for the Territorial Force and for County Associations, which are No. 6 of process, were not produced in the course of the trial by a witness on oath, but were tendered and referred to by respondent in the course of the subsequent hearing on the evidence.”

The case was heard on 17th and 18th July 1912. At the hearing it was admitted on behalf of the respondent that the Regulations for the July 18, 1912. Territorial Force and for County Associations were not lodged in process until after the cases for the prosecution and for the defence were closed, and parties were being heard on the evidence by the Sheriff. Todd v.

Anderson.

Argued for the appellant;—The Territorial Regulations were not King's Regulations, nor were they within the category of other documents enumerated in section 163 (1) (c) of the Army Act; and therefore they did not prove themselves, but required to be proved by witnesses. But even assuming that they were within the section, it was necessary that a copy of them should be lodged in process, because the Court did not take judicial notice of such Regulations. As this had not been done, the Regulations were not before the Court; and, as the number of drills which the appellant was required to attend was fixed only by the Regulations, the respondent had failed to prove a material part of his case, and the conviction should, therefore, be quashed.

Argued for the respondent;—In terms of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, section 26 (2), and the Army Act, section 163 (1) (c), the Regulations did not require to be proved by witnesses; and the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, section 28, contained a similar provision as to the proof of such documents. Under these sections the Regulations were endowed with the privileges of statutes, and the Court, therefore, would take judicial notice of the Regulations. But assuming that the Regulations required to be produced in process, this requirement had been in substance complied with before the respondent's case was closed, as his witnesses had spoken to the regulations, and had really incorporated the material portions in their evidence.

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case a great many interesting and to some extent difficult questions have been mooted in the course of the debate. If it were necessary to decide all these questions, we are agreed that we ought to take time to consider our judgment. I have, however, reached the conclusion that this conviction must be set aside upon one of the grounds upon which it is challenged, and I think we are entitled to decide the case upon that ground, having in view the obvious interest of the appellant to have this matter disposed of at once, without having to wait for a considered judgment on the whole of the questions, in which he is really not interested so long as he gets the conviction quashed.

Now, the ground upon which I think that this conviction must be set aside is that which is expressed, although I think not well expressed, in the fourth question submitted for our opinion. It is possible to read that question as simply raising for our decision the question whether the Regulations for the Territorial Force prove themselves, or whether they must be proved by a witness on oath. If that were the only question in the case I should have no difficulty in answering that they do prove themselves—that is to say, you do not require extraneous evidence in order to make them available as evidence in the case. That, I think, follows from section 163 of the existing edition of the Army Act, subsection (1) (c). The Regulations now under consideration are, in my opinion, included in the documents therein referred to, and therefore the subsection applies, which provides that copies of such Orders, printed by the Government

July 18, 1912. printer, shall be evidence of the Regulations. In this respect the Army Act does not appear to lay down any different rule from that which is contained in section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.

Todd v.
Anderson.

Lord Salvesen. But, then, although the Regulations prove themselves, it is a very different thing to say that they need not be produced in the course of the evidence, but may be referred to, as you refer to a statute, at any time after the evidence has been closed, for the purpose of convincing the Court that a statutory offence has been committed. It is not said in the Army Act that these Regulations or Orders shall have the force of statute, but only that a copy of the Regulations purporting to be printed by a Government printer shall be evidence of the Regulations themselves; and that this is a point of substance and not of form appears from the circumstance that these Army Regulations are apparently amended and modified from time to time, and that the Court could not be certiorated by the mere production of such Regulations—although printed by a Government printer, and although having once emanated from a Government department—that they were those that were still in force. I do not doubt that in the present case the Regulations produced were those in force; but the necessity of producing them in evidence before the Crown case was closed arises from the circumstance that unless that is done the accused will not have an opportunity of showing that they have been modified or altered since the date of their issue. In the case of an amending statute it is always open to him to appeal to it, just as the prosecutor can appeal to the statute which he has libelled; but there is no official publication, such as there is in the case of statutes, by which you can obtain access to the Regulations. These are admittedly altered from time to time; and the extent of the changes since the Act of 1907 was passed may be gathered from the black ink markings upon the book for 1910, which appear on almost every page.

Now it is admitted here that without the Regulations the prosecutor cannot succeed. It was contended by the Solicitor-General that, as the Regulations had been referred to in the evidence, they must be held to have been embodied in the evidence, and that they were practically produced. Well, I think it was Lord Halsbury who once said that if you say that a thing has been “practically” done, you mean that it has not been done at all. We had the admission of the Solicitor-General to the effect that the agent who conducted the prosecution was under the impression that these Regulations had the force of statute, and did not require to be produced in process at all, and that the Regulations were only put in after the evidence on both sides had been closed and at the suggestion of the Sheriff-substitute, who, I suppose, by that time entertained doubts as to whether the prosecutor had not formed a wrong opinion upon that matter. If, as was in effect conceded, these Regulations were part of the evidence necessary for a conviction, and they were not produced in process before the case on both sides had been closed, then I think they ought not to have been introduced into the process at all, and that the case for the complainer necessarily failed. I regret very much that we are obliged to quash the conviction upon this purely technical ground; but it would never do to depart from our settled course of procedure and to admit productions which are necessary evidence in the case after the case on both sides had been closed. Injustice might be done in other cases, if not in July 18, 1912. this case; and it is necessary that the rules of procedure, which are intended to secure justice in the conduct of cases, should be strictly enforced.

Todd v.
Anderson.

On that short ground I think we ought to answer the fourth question, not by a simple negative, but by narrating in substance what was made matter of admission at the bar, and hold that the Sheriff-substitute ought not to have convicted the appellant of the contravention charged.

Lord Salvesen.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. I think the case can and ought to be disposed of on the point which, looking to what took place in the course of the debate, may be considered as raised by the fourth question. I do not think the question is fairly raised by that query, or by the statement of the case; and I doubt whether it was really in the minds of those who were responsible for the framing of the case, because the question directly raised is whether the Regulations require to be proved by a witness on oath.

But the frank admission of the Crown that the Regulations were not made one of the productions until not only the prosecution had closed their case but until the whole case was over makes it necessary to consider the fourth question in the way your Lordship has done. I rather think that what took place was probably due to a failure to detect the difference between a document which proves itself and a document which, like a statute, not only proves itself but does not require to be put in evidence. I agree that, while it is clear that the document does prove itself, it is not in the highest category of all—namely, that of a document which is expressly made to have the force of statute.

LORD DUNDAS.—I also agree with Lord Salvesen as to the only point which we propose to determine. Question 4 is badly framed; but I think we should in effect find that though the Regulations mentioned in that question do not require to be proved by a witness on oath, but prove themselves, they do require to be produced and put in evidence; and that, as this was not done in the present case, the conviction cannot stand. I further agree that the better course is for us now to express our opinion that the conviction must fall upon this point alone, rather than make the appellant wait, as we should otherwise have to do, for at least three months, while we deliberated upon the other points, our conclusion on which, whatever it might be, could not alter the decision of the case.

THE COURT found that though the Regulations mentioned in question 4 did not require to be proved by witnesses on oath but proved themselves, they did require to be produced and put in evidence, and therefore that the Sheriff-substitute could not competently convict the appellant of the contravention charged; sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

ROBERT LINDSAY (Food and Drugs Inspector, Midlothian), Appellant.—Macmillan, K.C.—Pitman.
 ANDREW DEMPSTER, Respondent.—Mercer.

Lindsay v.
 Dempster.

Public Health—Food and Drugs—Sale of milk deficient in fat—Unauthorised sale by servant—Liability of master—Master and Servant.

In the prosecution of a dairyman for selling, by the hand of his servant, milk which was not genuine, it was proved that the servant who sold the milk had no authority to do so, his duty being merely to deliver milk to his master's customers.

Held that, as the servant had exceeded his authority in selling the milk, there had been no sale by the accused; and that he must, therefore, be acquitted.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Dundas.
 Lord Salvesen.
 Lord Guthrie.

ANDREW DEMPSTER, dairyman, Edinburgh, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh on a complaint at the instance of Robert Lindsay, the chief inspector appointed by the County Council of Midlothian under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899. The charge against the accused was "that on or about the 7th day of February 1912, at or near Pinkhill Nursery, Corstorphine, within the said county of Midlothian, you did, by the hands of Charles Walker, a servant in your employment, in response to a demand by William Beattie, an assistant inspector appointed by the County Council of the said county of Midlothian under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, acting by direction and on behalf of the complainer, for one pennyworth of sweet milk, sell to the complainer one pennyworth of milk which was not genuine, but was milk containing less than three per cent of milk fat, as is shown by the certificate of analysis made by John Hunter, public analyst for the said county of Midlothian, a copy of which is annexed and signed as relative hereto, contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6, as amended by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, section 2, and the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, made by the Board of Agriculture in exercise of the powers conferred on them by section 4 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899."

The Sheriff-substitute (Orr), after a proof, found the accused not guilty, whereupon the complainer appealed on a stated case.

The case set forth that the following facts were proved:—

"(2) The respondent carries on business as a dairyman and purveyor of milk at Carrick Vale Dairy, Balgreen Road, Edinburgh, which is within the boundaries of the city of Edinburgh. He keeps 40 cows, and the milk is mixed before being made up for his customers.

"(3) Certain of respondent's customers reside within the suburban district of the county of Midlothian; and these customers are supplied by the respondent in terms of orders, previously given, with certain quantities of milk every morning. The milk for each customer is put up for him in a separate pitcher or can, at the conclusion of the milking, before 6 o'clock each morning, and is afterwards delivered by the respondent's vanman, Charles Walker.

"(4) On the morning of 7th February 1912 the said Charles Walker, after having delivered certain quantities of milk within the city of Edinburgh, was sent by the respondent's wife (the respondent himself being then ill and unable to attend to business) to deliver various quantities of milk, which had been made up in separate pitchers as aforesaid, to customers of the respondent who were resident within the suburban district of the county of Midlothian. The respondent's instructions to his said vanman were to deliver to each customer the pitcher or can of milk which had been ordered by and put up for him as aforesaid. The said vanman was not employed by the respondent to sell milk, but only to deliver it. On the occasion in question he had no milk for sale nor measures for selling milk, and he had no authority from the respondent to sell any of the milk in the van.

July 18, 1912.
Lindsay v.
Dempster.

"(5) At 7.50 A.M. on said 7th February 1912 the respondent's servant, Charles Walker, had just delivered the milk which he had received from the respondent's wife for delivery to several customers who resided within the Pinkhill Nursery Grounds, Corstorphine; and on returning to the public road at the gate of the Pinkhill Nursery, where his horse and van were left standing while he was delivering milk to the respondent's customers within the nursery grounds, the said Charles Walker was accosted by William Beattie, one of the appellant's assistant inspectors.

"(6) The said William Beattie was accompanied by another assistant inspector, Allan W. Ritchie, both acting by the direction and on the instructions of the appellant.

"(7) The said William Beattie asked the said Charles Walker, the respondent's servant, for a pennyworth of sweet milk, and the said Charles Walker, who knew that the said William Beattie and Allan W. Ritchie were inspectors, supplied the said William Beattie with a pennyworth of milk. To enable him to do this he took a pennyworth of sweet milk out of the pitcher which contained the quantity of milk which he had been instructed to deliver to another customer at a house named Beechwood, to whom delivery had not yet been made. The said William Beattie then paid Walker a penny for said milk, and told him that he was an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and had purchased the milk for analysis by the public analyst. The said William Beattie thereupon divided the sample of milk which he had purchased into three portions, and labelled and sealed the same. One portion was handed to the said Charles Walker, another was sent to the public analyst, and the third portion was produced at the trial, and forms No. 1 of process.

"(8) The said Charles Walker on his return to the dairy at Balgreen Road told the respondent's wife that he had sold a pennyworth of milk to the inspectors out of the pitcher containing the quantity ordered by the customer above referred to, and had in consequence made a short delivery to that customer. He also handed to her the portion of milk which had been handed to him by the inspectors. Neither the respondent, nor any one on his behalf, sent any intimation to the appellant that his servant, the said Charles Walker, had no authority to sell the milk in question to the inspectors."

The case further stated that the milk was found on analysis to be deficient in fat, and continued:—"On the above facts I held that the respondent's vanman, Charles Walker, was charged only with the duty of delivering the milk from the respondent's dairy to certain customers as made up for them in accordance with the orders previously given by them; that he was not employed and had no authority to sell milk to anyone on behalf of the respondent, and that in selling the sample of milk in question to the inspectors the said Charles Walker acted in breach of his instructions and outwith the scope of his authority; and that accordingly no sale by the respondent to the inspectors had been proved. I therefore found the respondent not guilty of the charge libelled."

July 18, 1912. The question of law was:—"Was I right in holding upon the facts proved that there was not a sale of milk by the respondent to said inspectors imposing liability on him under the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899?"

Lindsay v.
Dempster.

The case was heard on 18th July 1912. At the hearing counsel for the appellant referred to Morrison v. Statter.¹

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts]—I entirely agree with the Sheriff-substitute's decision. It was said by Mr Pitman that the respondent ought at once to have written to the inspectors repudiating the sale, and that by keeping silence he had in some way homologated the transaction. I cannot follow that argument. The respondent could not know what, if anything, was to come of the matter, and I think he acted quite reasonably, and within his rights, in maintaining silence until the time arrived for him to defend his conduct in Court. Then, it was said or suggested, that the result of the Sheriff-substitute's decision would be to prevent inspectors from detecting contraventions of the Acts, or to impede them in their efforts to do so. I think there is no substance in that suggestion. It would have been a simple course for the inspectors to wait until the milk had been delivered to a customer, and obtain a sample of the milk at the place of delivery. On the whole matter, I have heard nothing to make me think that the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion was wrong, and I am for answering the question of law in the affirmative.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I agree. The charge here is that a dairyman did by the hands of a servant in his employment sell to an inspector of food and drugs a pennyworth of milk. Now, it is found as a fact, that Walker, the servant, had no authority to sell milk. His sole duty was to deliver milk to the respondent's customers, and he was in course of doing so when the inspectors accosted him and induced him to give them a pennyworth of milk in exchange for a penny. I cannot see, therefore, how in these circumstances there was a sale to the inspectors by the respondent. There may be cases where an employer may be held to have homologated the act of his servant so as to make what was done truly a sale by him. There is, however, no evidence of anything of that kind here.

It has been suggested that the result of our decision will be seriously to embarrass inspectors in the discharge of their delicate and difficult duties in connection with such matters. I do not see why that should be so, as all the inspector had to do was to inquire of the vanman if he was authorised to sell milk, and if not, was to follow the van to the place of delivery and obtain his sample there. Instead of doing so, he chose, without inquiry, to assume that the milk in the van was for sale. Unfortunately, his assumption has turned out to be wrong, and the result is that he has failed to prove the sale which was the subject of the complaint.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

CASES

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1911-1912.

(Poor) GEORGE CLARK, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—J. S. Mackay. No. 1.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
Cooper, K.C.—E. O. Inglis. Oct. 17, 1911.

Reparation — Negligence — Railway — Private dock — Shunting operations inside dock—Duty to close dock gates or give warning before shunting commenced. Clark v. North British Railway Co.

In a dock owned by a railway company three lines of rails connecting the quays with the main railway system crossed the road leading into the dock on the level at a point inside and opposite the dock gate. A seaman entered the dock by the gate, which was open, and attempted to pass between two wagons which were standing on the crossing. While he was doing so the wagons were shunted, and he was caught between the buffers and injured.

In an action of damages at his instance against the railway company, he averred that the defenders were at fault in neither shutting the gate nor giving warning before beginning to shunt the wagons.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Johnston) that there was no duty on the railway company either to shut the gate or to give warning before beginning to shunt the wagons, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

GEORGE CLARK, ship's cook, Falkirk, brought an action against the 2D DIVISION. North British Railway Company for £700 as damages in respect of Ld. Ormidale. personal injury.

The pursuer averred that the defenders were proprietors of the docks at Bo'ness, access to which was obtained by passing through the west gate at the foot of East Pier Street. (Cond. 2) "Three lines of rails belonging to the defenders, and running from their railway system through said docks, intersect the said access. Said access is one of the ordinary routes from the town of Bo'ness to the said docks, and is open to all persons who require to go to said docks. Between the gate on the south side of said lines of rails and said docks there was on 9th June 1910, and still is, a level-crossing, as shown on the plan produced herewith. The defenders work the traffic over said lines of rails at the level-crossing by means of engines and wagons. The gate at the south side of said level-crossing, in place of being shut constantly, as it ought to have been when defenders or their servants were carrying on the operation of shunting wagons, was usually kept open." (Cond. 3) "On the 9th day of June 1910, between 11 and 12 noon, the pursuer," who was ship's cook on board the s.s. "Kingswood" lying at a berth in the docks, "obtained permission from the mate of the s.s. 'Kingswood' to go into the town of Bo'ness for the purpose of posting a letter. The usual route from the 'Kingswood' to the town was taken by the pursuer, videlicet, over said access and level-crossing. On said date the pursuer on arriving at said level-crossing found his passage blocked by a number of wagons belonging to the defenders. Said wagons were stationary. The gatekeeper, who is in the employment of the defenders, told the pursuer to climb over the wagons if he desired to get to the town. The pursuer accordingly climbed over said wagons and proceeded to Bo'ness. On returning from Bo'ness to his ship, the 'Kingswood,' he again found his way blocked by a number of wagons standing on the middle set of rails at said level-crossing. The said wagons were stationary, and the pursuer had no reason to believe that shunting operations were in progress; and in point of fact the pursuer believed that shunting operations were not in progress. The pursuer in order to return to his said ship attempted to pass over said level-crossing. On the pursuer attempting to pass over said level-crossing and between two of said wagons, the defenders' servants who were in charge of said wagons, without notice to the pursuer, began to shunt said wagons. The said wagons were set in motion, and the pursuer was caught between the southmost buffers of two of said wagons and had his left arm crushed. The pursuer, although he looked both east and west along said lines of rails, did not see any engine near said wagons, and is not aware in what way they were set in motion. . . . At the time of said accident no warning of any kind was given by the defenders or their servants that shunting operations were about to commence." (Cond. 4) "The injuries sustained by the pursuer were caused by the negligence of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible. The defenders and their servants were well aware that persons employed in connection with the shipping at Bo'ness Docks required to make use of said level-crossing as a means of access to and from said docks. The defenders' servants well knew that shunting operations on said level-crossing constituted a risk of injury to persons going out of or coming into said docks. It was the duty of the defenders' servants not to commence shunting operations so long as the gates on the south side of the rails were left open. The facts of the gates being left open and of no warning being given that shunting operations were about to commence led the pursuer to believe that shunting operations were not in progress. It was also the duty of the defenders' servants to see that the railway lines were clear before commencing shunting operations, and to give warning that shunting was about to take place. There was no shunter or coupler at or near the two wagons which crushed the pursuer, as there ought to have been."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having been injured through the fault or negligence of the defenders or their servants, for whom they are responsible, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (4) The accident having been caused, or at least materially contributed to, by the negligence of the pursuer, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

On 14th July 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Johnston for Lord Ormidale) allowed the pursuer to amend his record, approved an issue, and found the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses (modified Oct. 17, 1911. to £3, 3s.), in respect of the amendments made, payment of said sum to be a condition precedent to the action proceeding.

Clark v.
North British
Railway Co.

The pursuer having reclaimed against the award of expenses, the defenders took advantage of the reclaiming note to challenge the relevancy of the pursuer's averments.

The case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, and Lord Skerrington) on 17th October 1911.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer had not relevantly averred any fault on the part of the defenders. The dock was a private place, and those who came there were bound to know that shunting operations were always in progress, and to take reasonable precautions for their own safety. The defenders were not bound to close the gates,¹ or to give special warning before commencing to move the wagons. In any event, the pursuer's averments showed that he had been guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to pass between the wagons without making sure that they would remain stationary.²

Argued for the pursuer;—If this had been a level-crossing over a public road, it would have been illegal, under section 5 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863,³ for the defenders to pass any trains over it in shunting, or to allow the wagons to stand across it. Although this section did not directly apply, this being a level-crossing inside a private dock, the principle to be applied was the same, namely that, where people were in the habit of passing a railway line at a particular place, the Company had a special responsibility to see that reasonable care was exercised in moving their trains over that portion of the line.⁴ It would have been a very reasonable precaution to have kept people from coming on the line by closing the gate, or, if they were on the line, to have given them notice that the trucks were about to be moved. There was no room for the plea of contributory negligence. The defenders acted negligently in leaving the gate open. By so doing they invited the pursuer to come on to the line, and having put him in a position of danger by their own default, they could not found on any subsequent mistake on his part.⁵

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have heard a very good argument in this case, and Mr Mackay has stated his case as clearly and well as it could be stated, and has shown industry in finding cases which could be quoted in support of his case. I am afraid they do not help his case very much. It must be kept in view that this is not the case of a highway at all. It is a case in which a private dock belonging to a railway company has in it rails which are not intended for the running of trains, but are intended solely for the purpose of moving wagons up to ships or moving wagons away from ships in order that they may reach the line of railway. It is essentially a dock

Clark v. into big public works, such as a paper-mill or anything of that kind, where North British for convenience the railway wagon is brought straight to the spot where it Railway Co. has to be loaded or unloaded. Therefore, it is not the same case as a rail-Lord Justice- way crossing on a highway or anything of that kind.
Clerk.

Now, the first thing that is said is that although there were wagons standing on this line, the gates, which lead into the dock and which are opposite to the place where the wagons were, were not closed. I cannot accept that for a moment as a ground of fault. The gates are not intended at all for the protection of people crossing those lines; otherwise the lines would need to have gates on both sides of them, because there is no protection whatever in having gates only on one side. They were the entrance gates of the dock provided by those to whom the dock belongs, in order that they may close them at hours during which they intend to allow nobody to go in or come out. They stand open as a matter of course during the busy part of the day. Therefore there was no fault whatever so far as the gates were concerned, and I see no fault whatever so far as having these trucks upon that particular line of rails was concerned.

Now, what is the state of matters as regards these wagons standing upon the rails in the dock? They are intended to be moved as they are required for purposes of loading and unloading. Some of them may stand for some time on a siding, some of them may stand on the quay, and they may be moved singly or several together. But that is part of the ordinary business that goes on inside the dock, and people who go to the dock are supposed to know that, and do know it. Is it to be said that when a few wagons which are standing on a line require to be moved, there must be some special warning given by the railway company that the wagons are going to be moved to persons who are at the dock, presumably in connection with the dock and presumably knowing what they are about? I cannot accept the view that any such warning is required. That sort of dry nursing inside a dock would not be practicable. It would subject the company to very heavy and improper expense.

But then nothing can be more plain than this, that when trucks are standing quite properly upon a dock, it is not intended or right that people should crawl over the rails below the buffers, or, as in this case, in line with the buffers, so that when the trucks were moved this man's shoulder was caught. I cannot consider the accident to be due to anything but the pursuer's own fault; I see no fault on the part of the Railway Company at all. Therefore, I am for recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissing the action.

In the view I take of the case, it is unnecessary to enter upon the question of contributory negligence; but, in my opinion, the case as disclosed by the pursuer's own record, if it were necessary to say so, would properly be held to disclose a case of contributory negligence.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is an action for damages in respect of the fault or negligence of the defenders, and I have searched the record in vain for any relevant averment of anything approaching fault on the part of the Railway Company. This makes it, as your Lordship has pointed out, quite unnecessary to say anything about contributory negligence; but, if it were necessary to do so, I should agree with your Lordship that the pursuer's own record does disclose a case of his own negligence sufficient to bar his claim. I agree that the action should be dismissed.

Oct. 17, 1911.
Clark v.
North British
Railway Co.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action, with expenses.

Company—Reduction of capital—Objecting creditor—Security for creditor's debt—Debt due to landlord for future rent—Whether debt contingent—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), sec. 49.

poration,

The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, enacts that where a company is seeking to reduce its capital the Court shall settle a list of the creditors entitled to object; and enacts further, sec. 49 (3):—"Where a creditor entered on the list whose debt or claim is not discharged or determined does not consent to the reduction, the Court may, if it thinks fit, dispense with the consent of that creditor on the company securing payment of his debt or claim by appropriating, as the Court may direct, the following amount (that is to say)—(i.) If the company admits the full amount of his debt or claim, or, though not admitting it, is willing to provide for it, then the full amount of the debt or claim; (ii.) If the company does not admit or is not willing to provide for the full amount of the debt or claim, or if the amount is contingent or not ascertained, then an amount fixed by the Court after the like inquiry and adjudication as if the company were being wound up by the Court."

A company, occupying premises under a lease of which four years had still to run, presented a petition for confirmation of a resolution to reduce its capital. The landlords of the premises objected to the reduction of capital unless provision was made to secure the payment of their rent during the remainder of the lease. The company offered to appropriate in security a sum less than the full amount of the rents to become due, and maintained that, the landlords' debt being contingent, the Court should approve of the offer as sufficient.

Held that, as the company admitted the full amount of the debt, and as that amount was neither contingent nor unascertained, the case fell under subsec. (3) (i.) of sec. 49, and the company was bound to provide security for the full amount of the debt; and on the company stating that they were not prepared to do so the Court dismissed the petition.

On 30th March 1911 a petition was presented by the Palace Billiard Rooms, Limited, 95 Hope Street, Glasgow, under section 47 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for confirmation of a resolution for reducing the share capital of the Company. The resolution was 1st Division.

Oct. 19, 1911. in the following terms:—"That the capital of the Company be reduced from £4000, divided into 4000 ordinary shares of £1 each, to £2000 divided into 4000 shares of 10s. each, and that such reduction be effected by reducing the nominal amount of the ordinary shares from £1 each to 10s. each, and extinguishing the liability in respect of uncalled capital on the ordinary shares to the extent of 10s. per share."

poration,

On 11th April 1911 the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills (Skerrington) remitted to Sir George M. Paul, C.S., to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital, and to report, and fixed 22nd April 1911 as the date at which every creditor entitled to any debt or claim against the Company within the meaning of section 49 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, should be entitled to object to the proposed reduction of the Company's capital.

On 21st April 1911 answers were lodged for the City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, the proprietors of premises occupied by the petitioners, under a lease expiring at Whitsunday 1915. The respondents averred;—"The respondents are creditors of the petitioners, being proprietors of the premises occupied by them at No. 95 Hope Street foresaid. The respondents let said premises to the petitioners conform to lease, dated 19th June and 11th July 1900, for a period of fifteen years, from and after the term of Whitsunday 1900. The lease expires at Whitsunday 1915. The rent of the premises is £630 per annum. The proposed reduction of capital involves the diminution of liability, in respect of unpaid share capital, to the extent of, at least, £1714, 10s., and would prejudicially affect the respondents' security for the rent of said premises. In these circumstances the respondents object to the prayer of the petition being granted until the petitioners either consign, in name of the Accountant of Court, a sum sufficient to cover the rent of said premises up to Whitsunday 1915, or otherwise grant satisfactory security therefor."

Sir George Paul having reported,* the case was heard before the First Division on 18th October 1911.

* After dealing with the facts, and the contentions of the petitioners and respondents, Sir George Paul's report proceeded as follows:—"The respondents maintain that the Court, before confirming the proposed reduction, must, under section 49, subsection 3, of the 1908 Act, make provision for security of the future rents of the property and the due fulfilment of the other contingent obligations of the lease during the four years of it which have yet to run.

"The petitioners, on the other hand, point out that while the cancelling of the whole uncalled capital undoubtedly diminishes the now existing security of the landlords, it should be kept in view, in the present case, that when the lease was entered into in 1900 the issued shares were fully paid, and that what the Company now propose to do is simply to revert to the original state of matters, i.e., to have the whole issued capital fully paid up. The shares would no doubt be of the nominal amount of 10s. each as against the original amount of £1 each, but it is not said in the answers that the security which the landlords originally had for their rents and fulfilment of the obligations of the lease, and on the faith of which they entered into the contract, will thus be in any way impaired. If, instead of taking the course they have done, first in 1908 and again in 1911, i.e., paying back to the shareholders 10s. per share out of the fund accumulated

Counsel for the petitioners stated that the Company was willing to pay at once the half-year's rent due at Martinmas, and to appropriate in security of the rents to become due a sum of £630, being a full year's rent, and their reserve fund, amounting to £455, referred to by the Reporter; he further stated that over £3000 had been spent on the billiard tables, &c., in the premises, and argued;—The petitioners' Company being solvent, the security offered was sufficient with the landlords' hypothec. The respondents' claim was not merely future but was contingent, because if the lease terminated before Whitsunday 1915 and a new tenant offered for the premises, the landlord's only claim in a liquidation of the Company would be for the difference, if any, between the petitioners' rent and that of the new tenant. Thus the security offered was a suitable amount to be fixed "if the Company were being wound up by the Court," and was as much as the petitioners should be required to appropriate, they being in the position provided for in the first part of subsection (3) (ii.) of section 49 of the Act.¹

Argued for the respondents;—The petitioners were seeking a privilege, and were bound to comply with the requirements of subsection (3) (i.) of section 49 of the Act,¹ because they had to admit the full from undivided profits, and thus making the fully paid £1 share into a share with 10s. paid up and 10s. uncalled, and thereafter cancelling that uncalled portion, the Company had distributed the undivided profits directly among its members, the landlords would have had no ground of objection. The leasehold subject, with its contents, was in no degree reduced in value by the Company's mode of dealing with the fund which was subsequently created for the Company's own purposes and not on the requisition, possibly even without the knowledge, of the landlords.

"While there seems to be some apparent force in these contentions, the express provision in the 49th section must be kept in view, viz., that where a creditor whose debt or claim has not been discharged does not consent, the Court may, if it thinks fit, dispense with such consent on the company securing payment of the debt or claim by appropriating, as the Court may direct, . . . if the amount is contingent or not ascertained—'an amount fixed by the Court after the like inquiry and adjudication as if the company were being wound up by the Court.' With reference to that and the cases noted—(In re Telegraph Construction Co., 10 Eq. 384; Gooch v. London Banking Association, 32 Ch. D. 41; Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron Co., 11 App. Cas. 332; Oppenheimer v. British and Foreign Exchange and Investment Bank, 6 Ch. D. 744)—Buckley observes,—'It would appear that when a company proposes to reduce its capital, a lessor is entitled to have a sum impounded to meet future rents.'

"As regards the security to be provided, that might either take the form of a satisfactory personal obligation by one or more of the directors or shareholders for payment of the full rents and fulfilment of the tenants' obligations till the termination of the lease, or the setting aside of such a sum by way of security as might be considered equitable in the circumstances. The whole of the reserve fund, which now amounts to £455, with any additions that may be made thereto, might be set apart and appropriated as a special security, together with such an additional sum as with the reserve fund might amount to two years' rents. The additional sum might either take the form of a setting aside of cash or cancellation of a smaller amount of uncalled capital. It has to be kept in view that the rents have been regularly paid, and that only four more full rents are payable. . . ."

amount of the respondents' debt, which, though future, was not contingent. Even if the petitioners' position was that provided for by subsection (3) (ii.) of section 49, the security appropriated must be ample, as suggested by the Reporter, and the security offered by the petitioners was quite insufficient.

At advising on 19th October 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of the Palace Billiard Rooms, Limited, to confirm a resolution to reduce the capital, and we have a report from Sir George Paul. Only one point arises for your Lordships' consideration. The Company propose to reduce their capital by one-half, and, in doing so, to put an end to a 10s. liability which there is at present upon their shares.

Answers have been lodged by a company who are landlords of property which the petitioning Company have got on lease. The petitioning Company was formed for the purpose of keeping billiard-rooms, and it is quite evident from the figures in the petition that, for some reason or another, billiards as a business is upon the wane. While a few years ago they paid very large dividends, they have lately paid nothing at all. At the same time they are, at this moment, perfectly solvent. The compearing landlords object to this diminution of capital unless their rent is secured for the terms which are still to come, which are, I think, seven or eight half-yearly terms.

Counsel for the petitioning Company laid some stress upon the fact that it was really owing only to the action of the Company themselves that they were in the present position, because in the days of their prosperity they returned half of the capital—the shares having been originally fully paid-up shares—they returned half the capital to the shareholders, and put the Company into the position in which it is now of having an uncalled liability of 10s. per share. That is an appeal ad misericordiam, and I am afraid it is one that we cannot take any notice of. We are bound to take things as they are, and the landlords are entitled to the advantage of things as they are.

The whole question comes to be a very short one, and depends upon section 49 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. That section provides for an application of this sort being intimated to creditors; and it provides, by subsection (3), "Where a creditor entered on the list whose debt or claim is not discharged or determined does not consent to the reduction, the Court may, if it thinks fit, dispense with the consent of that creditor,"—now, that is what we are asked to do; the Court is asked to grant the privilege of dispensing with the consent of a person who does not wish to consent—"on the company securing payment of his debt or claim by appropriating, as the Court may direct, the following amount." Now, it seems to me that that is quite absolute. The Court can only do it "on the company securing payment of his debt or claim by appropriating . . .

the following amount," and then come two alternatives: "(i.) If the company admits the full amount of his debt or claim, or, though not admitting it, is willing to provide for it, then the full amount of the debt or claim; (ii.) if the company does not admit or is not willing to provide for the full amount of the debt or claim, or if the amount is contingent or not ascertained, then an amount fixed by the Court after the like inquiry and adjudication as if the company were being wound up by the Court."

Now, the first question that has to be determined is, Which of these two alternatives does this matter fall under? I confess I cannot come to any conclusion but one. I think that this is a case where the Company does admit the full amount of the debt or claim. They do not say that the rent will not be due at the terms when they come, and consequently I think the matter falls within subsection (3) (i.). I do not think it can be held to fall within subsection (3) (ii.). It does not fall under the first part, because the Company does not "not admit," and it cannot fall under the second part, because, in my view, it is not a contingent debt. It is a perfectly certain debt, a future debt but not a contingent debt.

Accordingly, I do not think there is any alternative left to us—that is to say, we can dispense with the respondents' consent only if we appropriate a sum which will secure the full amount of the debt. Of course, inasmuch as the debt is future, the sum will not necessarily be precisely the sum which will eventually be payable, because, by ordinary rules, there must be a rebate for what is equivalent to a present payment. But I come to the conclusion that, unless the Company are in a position to offer some security which will be equivalent to a security for the full amount of the debt when it becomes payable, we should not dispense with the consent.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I experienced some difficulty in this matter, partly because the case was the first, so far as I am aware, that has occurred in this Court where, in a question of reduction of capital, a creditor's interest has been involved, but more particularly from the phraseology of a number of cases in the English Courts directly or indirectly bearing on this matter. I refer to the distinction between admission to claim and admission to proof, and to the use of the qualifying term "contingent" in, as it seemed to me, a different sense from that which it would receive here. But I find that the same difficulty occurred to Vice-Chancellor Hall in the case of Oppenheimer v. British and Foreign Exchange and Investment Bank,¹ and the learned Vice-Chancellor explains the situation in such a way as to remove the difficulty.

As regards the application of the statute, I entirely agree with what your Lordship has said.

The respondents' title on the statute to object is undeniably complete. On your Lordship's interpretation, which I accept, they are entitled as a condition of their consent to require that an appropriation be made to the full amount of their debt or claim.

But this appropriation does not involve immediate payment, but only the

What the Court did in the Telegraph Construction Company's case,¹ under the Acts of 1862 and 1867 (and I do not find that there was any difference in their language from that of the Act of 1908), was to order the full amount of the claim to be paid into Court, with liberty to either party to apply—by which I understand liberty to the creditor to apply for payment pro tanto if the Company did not meet its obligation at any term, and for the Company to apply to have the fund released pro tanto if it did meet its obligations term by term. In the analogous case—*Oppenheimer*²—of a shareholders' liquidation, the lessor's interest for future rent was protected in a similar manner by setting aside the whole amount of his future claims to cover the risk of the sub-lessee's failure. Gooch's case³ is in the same direction. The Company here must, I think, submit to appropriation on similar terms if they want to reduce their capital as proposed.

Counsel for the petitioners having stated that the Company, though solvent, was not prepared to consign the full amount of the future rents of the premises, or to give further security than that offered at the hearing—

THE COURT dismissed the petition.

Trust—Administration—Severance of interests of beneficiaries—Appropriation of investments to particular legacies—Appreciation in value of investments appropriated.

A testator directed his trustee to hold a specified sum for a certain party in liferent, and his issue in fee, and to pay over the residue of his estate "as it accrues and becomes available" to his residuary legatees. The trustee set apart and invested the specified sum for behoof of the liferenter and his issue, and from time to time made payments out of residue to the residuary legatees. On the death of the liferenter it was found that the stocks, in which the sum appropriated to the legacy had been invested, had considerably increased in value.

In a competition between the fiars and the residuary legatees for the amount of this increase, held that the trustee had an implied power under the terms of the trust-deed to set aside and invest the specified sum for the satisfaction of the legacy, and, accordingly, that the fiars were entitled to the benefit of the appreciation in the value of the securities in which it was invested.

Observations upon the distinction between trusts in which a special power of appropriation must be conferred upon trustees, and those in which such a power may be implied.

DR ANDREW VANS DUNLOP died on 27th February 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to William Fergusson and others as trustees. Oct. 19, 1911.
Vans
Dunlop's
Trustees v.
Pollok.

By the eleventh purpose of his settlement the testator provided as follows:—"That in case Mrs Jane Johnston Crawford Pollok or Fergusson, wife of my brother-in-law, the said William Fergusson, shall not have succeeded to the Pollok estates before my death, or before the 1st day of January 1883, I leave and bequeath to the said William Fergusson, but only in the said event, the sum of £5000 sterling in liferent, to be held by my trustees in Europe for his liferent use alienably, and for his lawful issue in such proportions as he, and failing him, as his said wife, may direct and appoint, in fee: Providing always that if his said wife shall have succeeded to these estates as aforesaid, this legacy shall lapse, and shall form part of the residue of my estate." By a codicil the testator left to these legatees a further sum of £2000, to be held on the same terms as the £5000. 1st DIVISION.

The testator's settlement further provided:—"Lastly, With regard to the residue and remainder of my means and estate hereby conveyed, after all the legacies, bequests, and provisions, before mentioned or referred to, as well as any other sum which I have left, or may hereafter leave and bequeath in any codicil, memorandum, or other writing, executed or to be executed by me as aforesaid, have been fully paid and satisfied, or provided for, I hereby nominate and appoint the University of Edinburgh, . . . to be my residuary legatees, . . . declaring, as it is hereby provided and declared, that the funds to be liferented in terms hereof, by" [certain named legatees, among whom his brother-in-law was not included] "shall, after their respective deaths, and so far as not required for the fulfilment of the other purposes of these presents, be held as forming part of the residue of my said estate, and be dealt with accordingly under this purpose of these presents; and I direct my said trustees in Europe to pay and make over the whole of the said residue and remainder of my estate as it accrues and becomes available, to my said residuary legatees; declaring that a receipt or discharge under the hand of the principal or treasurer of the said University for the time being shall be a sufficient discharge and exoneration to my said trustees in Europe for the said residue and remainder of my estate; and in order that my trustees in Europe, and my executors in India, may be able to execute the purposes of the present trust, I hereby confer on them the following powers and privileges, viz.:—[Here followed an enumeration of their powers]: And as a further direction to my trustees in Europe, I hereby advise that they shall retain such of my stocks and shares as they may consider to be good and safe investments, . . . and having estimated the value of these stocks and shares at the market rate of the day, they shall divide them accordingly among the various legatees, or otherwise appropriate them for the purposes of this trust."

William Fergusson, afterwards William Fergusson Pollok, was the only one of the testator's trustees who accepted office. His wife did not succeed to the Pollok estate before 1st January 1883, and accordingly, the legacies of £5000 and £2000 having then vested in him in liferent and his children in fee, he paid the legacy-duty of £350 thereon, and invested the balance of £6650 to meet these legacies. Part of this fund was invested (on a change of investment in 1892) in £1218, 3s. 9d. of British Linen Company Stock, the investment being taken in the joint names of Mr and Mrs Fergusson Pollok, "and the survivor of them in trust for their children." On it being pointed out that the investment should have been taken in Mr Pollok's name as trustee, Mr and Mrs Pollok subsequently signed a minute in token of their wish that the said sum of bank stock should be held in their joint names for behoof of their children, and they thereby acknowledged and declared "that although the investment has been taken in these terms, the same truly forms part of the trust-estate of the late Dr Vans Dunlop, and is subject to the trusts of his settlement relating to the said two bequests of £5000 and £2000 of which it forms part." In the trust accounts the sum of £6650 appeared under the heading "Estate held for Special Purposes," sub-head "Sum held by the Executor for behoof of Mr William Fergusson in liferent and his children in fee."

The University received, from time to time, as funds accrued and became available, large payments to account of residue from the trustee on the trust-estate, amounting (with the exception of some small sums retained to meet contingencies) to the whole residue. For these payments the University granted formal discharges acknowledging their receipt and ratifying and approving of the whole actings, intromissions, and management of William Fergusson Pollok as trustee, but expressly saving and reserving the University's right in those portions of the trust-estate set aside to meet liferent legacies or other bequests or legacies bequeathed by the testator, which might thereafter revert and accrue to the trust-estate and become part of the residue payable to the University.

Mr Fergusson Pollok survived his wife and died on 5th November 1908, when the fee of the legacies of £5000 and £2000 fell to be paid over to his issue. At that date the value of the investment in British Linen Company Stock had appreciated to the extent of some £2000, and questions arose between these legatees (Mr Pollok's issue) and the residuary legatees (the University of Edinburgh) as to the parties entitled to this increase in value.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by the testator's acting trustees (first parties), the issue of William Fergusson Pollok (second parties), and the University Court of the University of Edinburgh (third parties).

The case, after setting forth the facts narrated above, stated the contentions of the parties as follows:—

"The second parties contend that as Mrs Jane Johnston Crawford Pollok or Fergusson did not succeed to the Pollok estates before 1st January 1883, said legacies of £5000 and £2000 at that date vested in Mr William Fergusson in liferent and in his issue in fee, and that the University then ceased to have any interest in said sums. That said sums were at that date properly set aside and appropriated by the said William Fergusson as trustee for himself in liferent and his issue in fee as distinct from the residuary estate in which the University was interested. That . . . the proceeds of the British Linen Bank Stock which formed one of said investments belong exclusively to the second parties, and now fall to be paid over to them.

"The third parties contend that the said William Fergusson Pollok, as trustee foresaid, had no power to and did not legally set aside and appropriate the investments above mentioned to meet the said legacies of £5000 and £2000, and did not competently sever the same from the rest of the trust-estate. They further contend that the second parties are now entitled to payment only of the balance of the said legacies remaining unpaid, and that the appreciation which has taken place in the British Linen Bank Stock, in which the said balance has since 1892 stood invested, enures to residue and is payable on realisation to the third parties."

Oct. 19, 1911.
 Vans
 Dunlop's
 Trustees v.
 Pollok.

The questions of law were, inter alia:—"1. Was the late William Fergusson Pollok, as trustee foresaid, empowered by the testator's testamentary writings to set aside and appropriate particular investments to satisfy the said legacies of £5000 and £2000, so as to sever the same from the rest of the trust-estate? 3. Are the second parties entitled to the benefit of the appreciation which has taken place in the investment in British Linen Bank Stock representing the balance of the said legacies? or, Are the third parties entitled, on realisation of the said British Linen Bank Stock, to the difference between the price realised and the balance of the capital of the said legacies remaining due to the second parties?"

A further question was stated, with which this report is not concerned, as to whether the investments had in fact been sufficiently appropriated to these legacies.

The case was heard before the First Division on 19th October 1911.

Argued for the second parties;—The testator's settlement should be interpreted as conferring power upon his trustees to set apart the sum destined in fee to the second parties, because the trustees were directed to make over the residue as it became available, and it became ascertainable, and so available, in so far as affected by this legacy of £7000, in 1883, when the legacy vested in the legatees. Further, the power given to the trustees to "appropriate" stocks among the various legatees was consistent with their having authority to set apart and invest specific sums to meet individual legacies. The discharges granted by the third parties were absolute in their terms quoad this question, for the reservations therein contained did not apply to such legacies as this, the fee of which had vested in the legatees. The securities representing this legacy were accordingly held absolutely for the second parties, and they were entitled to the benefit of any appreciation which might take place in the value of these securities.¹

Argued for the third parties;—No authority, express or implied, was conferred upon the testator's trustees to sever the sum in question from the trust-estate in such a manner as to deprive the third parties of the benefit of any appreciation in the value of the securities in which it was invested, creating a balance in excess of the amount of the legacy. The saving clause in the discharges granted by the third parties kept open their present claim to the difference between the market value of the securities in which the trustee had invested this legacy destined to the second parties and the balance of capital due to them.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After stating the facts]—The special bequest of £7000 being now free to be given to the fiars, the liferenter being dead, the

Ld. President.

I confess I can see no ground whatsoever upon which that claim can be supported. It seems to me that the trustees have all along held this particular sum of money and this investment for the liferenter and for the fiars designated, and that the appreciation, if any, belongs to them. I can quite understand that where a trust is, in all its terms, a continuing trust but for the benefit of different individuals, it might be necessary to have a special power of appropriation conferred upon trustees in order to allow them to separate up the investments of the trust and tie the fortunes of each beneficiary or set of beneficiaries to particular investments. But it seems to me that, when a trust is of a composite character and is partly for holding and partly for distribution, there is of necessity an implied power upon trustees to set apart the whole, at the time when they have to part with some of the trust for distribution. And I think that not only is Robinson's case¹ an illustration, but that Lord Trayner in the case of Scott,² in the passage which Mr Millar cited as helping his case for the University, fully recognises that fact. He quotes the case of Robinson,¹ and then he says: "In that case appropriation of special funds to meet certain legacies was sustained, although such appropriation had not been directed to be made by the trust-deed. That such a course was intended by the truster in that case might very reasonably be inferred, because such appropriation was necessary to enable the residue to be divided without undue delay, which was the truster's object, and, indeed, direction." And I think you have a good illustration of the opposite class of case in the case of Teacher,³ which was also referred to. Indeed, I think the doctrine put forward by Mr Millar, if carried out, would really be a most inconvenient doctrine in the management of trust-estates, because I think that its stringent application would lead to this—that wherever a truster had directed, inter alia, a certain sum of money to be held by his trustees for the benefit of a liferenter or liferenters and then fiars, it would never be possible for them to pay the other special bequests and the residue, and wind up the trust (with the exception of the sum to be held), because it would always be in the mouths of the liferenters and fiars to say, "Oh, no, you must not part with the estate, because our investment may in future depreciate."

Accordingly, I think that the case is a very simple one, and that questions one . . . and the first part of three must be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question and branch one of the third question in the affirmative.

No. 4.

WATSON, GOW, & COMPANY, Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Duffes.

Oct. 21, 1911.

*Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Injury to knee—Incapacity alleged to be due to similar injury in previous employment—Onus of proof.*Borland v.
Watson,
Gow, & Co.

In December 1908 a workman in the course of his employment felt a severe pain in his right knee on rising from a kneeling position, and on examination it was found that the cartilage was torn. Three years before, while in another employment, he had sustained a "wrench" to the same knee, which had incapacitated him for some weeks, after which he was able to resume his ordinary work. It was not clear on the evidence whether the later injury was connected with the former, or, if so, to what extent it was so connected.

In answer to a claim by the workman for compensation against the firm in whose employment he was in December 1908, the employers maintained that the incapacity was not due to an accident occurring in the course of his employment with them, but to the original injury.

Held that, as the injury in December 1908 was apparently sustained in the employment of his then employers, the onus was on them to show that it was really due to the former accident; that they had failed to discharge this onus; and that they were accordingly liable to pay compensation.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between John Borland, range-fitter, Glasgow, and Watson, Gow, & Company, Limited, Etna Foundry, Glasgow, the Sheriff-substitute at Glasgow (Fyfe) refused compensation, and at the request of the workman stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth the following facts as proved:—“(1) That appellant is a range-fitter to trade. (2) That about three years ago, whilst in the employment of Messrs Mechan & Son at Whiteinch, he sustained a wrench to his knee, and in respect thereof claimant received compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for a period of some weeks. (3) That subsequently, on several occasions, the result has been that, when at work upon his knees, the knee gave him trouble whilst in the act of raising his body from the ground, causing him pain at the moment, but not preventing him continuing to work. (4) That on 4th December last appellant was in the employment of the respondents. (5) That he was then, in the course of his work, kneeling upon the knee which had previously sustained the injury. (6) That in rising from the kneeling position he again felt the same kind of pain. (7) That on being taken to the infirmary it was found that the internal cartilage of the right knee joint was torn. (8) That an operation was performed on or about 22nd January. (9) That he was discharged from the infirmary on 27th February 1909. (10) That he was not then fit for work. (11) That he is not yet fit for work. (12) That the rupture of the knee cartilage on the 4th December 1908 was the result of the strain experienced when appellant was in other employment than that of the respondents.”

The Sheriff found that the appellant had failed to prove that he was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents.

The question of law was:—“Whether the injury which the appel-

Oct. 21, 1911. Borland v. Watson, Gow, & Co. Injant sustained on 4th December 1908 was an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman while with the respondents, entitling him to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

The case was heard before the Second Division on 6th July 1911, when the Court remitted the case to the arbitrator for further findings in fact.

The questions stated by the Court and the Sheriff's answers were as follows:—

"(Ques. 1) Was the cartilage in the appellant's knee ruptured when he was injured in the service of Messrs Mechan & Son at Whiteinch, and received compensation for a time for inability to work? (Ans. 1) The evidence does not disclose whether the cartilage was ruptured then.

"(Ques. 2) If there was rupture, was it completed or was it increased, on 4th December 1908, by exertion made on that date? (Ans. 2) Assuming there was a rupture, it was increased by the occurrence of 4th December 1908.

"(Ques. 3) Were the symptoms which showed themselves on 4th December in any way different from these which had shown themselves on previous occasions when the appellant required to kneel when working? (Ans. 3) No.

"(Ques. 4) Did the appellant receive any new injury while in the respondents' employment, or was the condition in which his knee was found to be on 4th December 1908 produced by the accident three years before, as a natural result of that injury? (Ans. 4) It is not possible from the evidence to say.

"(Ques. 5) In what circumstances, and by whom and when, was he taken to the infirmary? (Ans. 5) On 4th December 1908, when he rose from the kneeling position and felt pain in knee, it was about twelve o'clock, but he stayed on till five, when he was assisted home. At home he was treated by his family doctor till 22nd January, when he was sent to the infirmary by his own doctor."

The case was again heard before the Second Division on 21st October 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant's knee was undoubtedly affected by something which happened on 4th December, and which left it in a different and worse condition than it was in before. This amounted to an "accident" in the sense of the Act.¹ It might be that what happened on 4th December would not have incapacitated the workman but for the injury sustained in Messrs Mechan & Son's employment three years previously, as a result of which his knee was left in a weak condition. But this did not affect his claim for compensation against the respondents in respect of the accident which happened when he was in their employment.² It was for the respondents to prove, if they could, that the present incapacity was due to the original accident, and this they had failed to do.

Argued for the respondents;—The arbitrator had found that the rupture of the knee cartilage on 4th December was the result of the strain experienced when appellant was in other employment than that of the respondents. This negatived conclusively the idea that the injury was due to any accident on 4th December. The appellant had failed to prove his case. The whole burden of proving the conditions necessary to an award of compensation was upon him.¹ There was no evidence to show that his incapacity was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents. This, at least, was the view of the arbitrator, and there were no grounds for altering his judgment.² In fact, the incapacity was not due to any accident on 4th December, but to a previously existing cause.³ The appellant was not without his remedy, for he could still—even after a lapse of years—claim compensation from the persons in whose employment he was when the accident occurred to which his present incapacity was due.⁴

LORD DUNDAS.—This is a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act. There seems to have been an extraordinary amount of unexplained delay in the Court below, because I see that the Sheriff says that the case was heard before him and proof led in July and September 1909, and the appeal was not boxed to this Court till June 1911. When the case came here we found that—whether as the result of the delay or not I do not know—the facts were so imperfectly stated that we thought it necessary to adjust certain questions and remit them to the Sheriff-substitute to answer. This the learned Sheriff-substitute has done, and I am bound to say that, even with the further assistance we have got, the facts are not so clear as we could wish them to be, or as they ought to be. But I think we have sufficient matter before us to enable us to decide the case; and that it will not be necessary in doing so to advert to the numerous authorities that have been quite properly quoted to us at the discussion.

It appears that on the 4th of December 1908 the appellant, while engaged in his employment with the respondents, felt a severe pain as he was rising from a kneeling position, and on his being taken to the infirmary it was discovered that he had sustained rupture of the internal cartilage of his right knee joint. Prima facie that looks very like a case for compensation; but then it is said that some three years before, while in another employment, he had sustained a wrench of that knee in respect of which he received compensation for some time from these former employers, and it was argued that this injury in December 1908 was really just a recurrence of the former injury sustained three years before. I do not think it is clear on the facts whether the later injury was or was not connected with the former, or to what extent it was connected, but as the new injury in December 1908 was apparently sustained while in the employment of the present respondents, and arising out of that employment, I think the onus

Oct. 21, 1911. was on the respondents to make it clear, if they could, that no new injury was really sustained, but that anything suffered on 4th December 1908 was due to the former accident. It seems to me enough for the decision of this case that this workman had, so far as we know, worked continuously as an ordinary workman for some three years prior to the 4th December 1908, and it is plain enough, I think, that the old injury must have subsided and disappeared to this extent that he was able to perform his ordinary work as a workman, whereas something occurred on the 4th December of so serious a nature as to incapacitate him from work. The facts seem to me to show that that injury arose in the course of his employment with the respondents, and out of it, and therefore I think this is a case where compensation ought to be given. Towards the close of his argument, indeed, Mr Duffes took courage and urged that there was here no "accident" at all, but I must say I think that argument, as I understood it, is negatived by decisions of the House of Lords with which your Lordships are familiar. On these short grounds, I think we ought to answer the question put to us in the affirmative.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I think this a very clear case. The Sheriff-substitute seems to have held that his inability to infer from the evidence whether the injury which the appellant suffered was the result of a strain which he experienced at the time, or was the result of some prior strain experienced three years before, made it impossible for him to reach a conclusion in favour of the appellant. I do not think that is so at all. There are only two alternatives. Either the man's cartilage was ruptured on the date on which he was obliged to cease work in the employment of the respondents, or it had been previously ruptured, and what happened then increased the rupture and unfitted him there and then for the very same kind of work which he had been doing for three years. On either view it is quite clear that this was an accident to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies. I have therefore no difficulty in reaching the same result as your Lordship.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This man was engaged in work for some time with the respondents. On a certain day while employed on work which involved his being on his knees, he found on rising that he had some injury which prevented his continuing to work, and which led to his being taken to hospital, where it was discovered that his knee cartilage was torn and that he was in consequence unfit for work.

These facts, if proved, would, in my opinion, entitle the injured man to compensation. He would not need to prove anything more than that the accident arose out of his employment. The facts seem to me to make it impossible to find otherwise. He is just a workman who on a certain day ceased to be able to work on account of something which had happened to him while at his work. That is the ordinary case of accident under the Act. He would need to prove nothing more than I have said. If he prove that, it is still open to the respondents to bring forward evidence that it was not an accident in their employment but something else which incapacitated him, and their case is that that something else happened three years before. I think there is no alternative except either that he met with an accident on the occasion libelled, having never had an accident to his knee before, or that having had a previous accident, he had so recovered that he was able to do his own regular work for a considerable time, and then that something happened to the same part of his body. In both of these cases the ultimate and immediate cause of his being no longer able to work was what happened on the day in question, when, on rising from his knees, it was found that his cartilage was torn, and it could not have been torn during the three years before, otherwise he would not have been able to work during that time as we are told that he did. I think it is one of the clearest cases we have seen, and we do not need to go to the anthrax case¹ in order to decide it. It was an injury by violence occurring to the workman during his work, producing incapacity from which he was not suffering before, and on these grounds I am of opinion that compensation falls to be given, and the proper course will be to answer the question in the affirmative, and remit the case to the Sheriff-substitute to assess the amount of compensation.

Sheriff—Action of separation and aliment—Cause remitted to Court of Session—Power of Court to send it back to Sheriff—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 5. Dunbar v. Dunbar.

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 5, extends the jurisdiction of Sheriffs to actions of separation and aliment and for custody of children, with this proviso:—"Provided also, that on cause shown or ex proprio motu the Sheriff may at any stage remit to the Court of Session any action of separation and aliment or relating to the custody of children."

A Sheriff having, ex proprio motu, remitted an action of separation and aliment to the Court of Session, the Court remitted it back to the Sheriff, holding (1) that the section does not prevent the Court from dealing with a remitted cause as it thinks fit, and in particular sending it back to the Sheriff; and (2) that as the record did not disclose any special difficulty in the case, the Sheriff was not justified in declining to exercise his jurisdiction.

ON 15th August 1911 Mrs Mary Brown or Dunbar brought an action of separation and aliment in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow against her husband, Robert W. Dunbar.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

The pursuer based her claim for separation on the alleged cruelty of her husband, and averred:—(Cond. 3) "About six months after the marriage defender gave way to drink, and he has continued to lead an intemperate life ever since." (Cond. 4) "Both in his fits of drunkenness and when sober defender frequently beat his wife and threatened her life. In particular, on or about the evening of 25th December 1907, in his dwelling-house in Market Street, Bo'ness, defender struck the pursuer a severe blow on the face, and compressed her throat, to her serious injury. In July 1909 defender locked out pursuer, who had to get a night's lodging with Mr and Mrs Harris, Grange-pans. He (defender) again assaulted pursuer by striking her on the face on a day in the month of February 1910, also in his said dwelling-house in Market Street, Bo'ness." (Cond. 5) "Latterly, defender's acts of cruelty towards the pursuer became so frequent and serious that the latter, having regard for her personal safety, was compelled to leave the defender's house, which she did on or about 7th July 1911. The direct and immediate cause of pursuer's leaving defender's house was as follows:—On the date mentioned, 7th July 1911, defender returned home at 5.30 P.M. John Falconer, to whom further reference is made in pursuer's answer 2 to defender's statement of facts, was in the house with pursuer at the time. He was there by appointment with the defender, whose friend he was, and whom he had come to meet, to arrange, it is believed, how they were to spend the following Saturday afternoon. Defender, on entering the house, demanded some dinner. Pursuer explained that this had been ready for him at 1 o'clock, at which hour he had promised to return, but that she would prepare something fresh as quickly as possible. Defender thereupon struck the pursuer a blow on the face, and said he would prepare the dinner himself. Pursuer, referring to defender's systematic ill-treatment of her, and this last instance of it, then said that unless there was a change in his (defender's) way of living she would go home to her folks; to which defender replied, 'Go now, and I'll give you something more to take home with you,' accompanying his remark with a further attempt to strike pursuer, which he was prevented from carrying out by the timely intervention of Falconer. On Falconer interfering, defender flew into a rage and ordered him to leave the house at once, which he did. After Falconer's departure defender lifted the pursuer off her feet and threw her heavily against a bed, gripped her savagely by the neck, and attempted to strangle her. She escaped after a struggle, when he pursued her and struck her a severe blow on the face. Then it was that the pursuer, with ample justification, left the defender's house, where to remain was at the risk of her life."

The defender denied these averments.

On 3rd October 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) ex proprio motu remitted the cause, under section 5 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907,* to the First Division of the Court of Session.†

On the calling of the case in Single Bills on 25th October, counsel for the defender moved the Court to remit it back to the Sheriff-substitute, on the ground that there was nothing in the record which justified the action being remitted to the Court of Session, and that Counsel for the pursuer did not oppose the motion.

Dunbar v.
Dunbar.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of separation and aliment raised in the Sheriff Court in terms of the extended jurisdiction given to Sheriffs by the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, and the Sheriff-substitute has remitted the cause to the Court of Session, his warrant for doing so being the proviso appended to section 5 of the Act, which is in these terms :—" Provided also, that on cause shown or ex proprio motu the Sheriff may at any stage remit to the Court of Session any action of separation and aliment or relating to the custody of children."

Now, it is clearly within the power of the Sheriff to take this step, but I do not think that the Act excludes the power of this Court to deal with the matter as it thinks fit, and in particular to send the case back to the Sheriff.

I have examined the record in this case, and I do not think that it is one that raises questions of delicacy such as sometimes arise in these cases. The law of what entitles a spouse to separation and aliment has been clearly stated in a passage of the opinion of Lord President Inglis in the case of Graham v. Graham,¹ quoting the opinion of Lord Brougham in the case of Paterson v. Russell,² where he says,—“ Personal violence, as assault upon the person of the woman ; threats of violence, which induce the fear of immediate danger to her person ; maltreatment of her person, so as to injure her health ; these are, both by the law of Scotland and the law of England, a sufficient ground of divorce a mensa et thoro ”; and Lord Brougham goes on to state other conduct which is sufficient. Now, where there has been conduct short of the brutal conduct instanced by Lord Brougham difficult and delicate questions are raised sometimes, but here there is a distinct averment of personal violence, and if the pursuer proves this averment there can be no question of difficulty in the case. It seems to me that it involves a simple question of fact, and I think the pursuer is entitled to avail herself of the cheaper procedure in the Sheriff Court, and that we should re-remit the case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the ground upon which this particular case has been remitted to the Court of Session, if it were sound, would justify the same procedure in every case of the kind. Lord President Inglis points out in *Graham v. Graham*¹ that in these cases the Court must always have a very delicate duty to discharge, for reasons which he explains. But that general difficulty does not justify the notion that a jurisdiction which Parliament has expressly conferred upon the Sheriff Court is suitable only for the Court of Session, and that is the ground on which the case has been remitted. It would have been a different matter if the Sheriff had found any special difficulty peculiar to the particular case, and it may be that a question of that kind might still arise. But the Sheriff's absolute refusal on general grounds to exercise his statutory jurisdiction cannot, in my opinion, be supported.

Brown v.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Aliment—Custody—Death of mother—Claim for aliment by maternal grandmother—Denial of paternity coupled with offer to accept custody of the child.

B. gave birth to an illegitimate child and claimed aliment from F., whom she alleged to be the father. F. denied paternity, but offered to pay aliment, and did so for four years until B.'s death, when he offered to take charge of the child himself. The offer was refused by B.'s mother, with whom the child was living and continued to live, and who subsequently brought an action against F. for a finding that he was the father and for payment as aliment of the sums disbursed by her for its support since B.'s death. In his defences F. denied paternity, and renewed his offer to take charge of the child. The pursuer maintained that F., while denying paternity, had no right to the custody of the child, or, in any event, that he had no such right until it was seven years of age.

Held that F.'s offer to take charge of the child, even though coupled with a denial of paternity, was a conclusive answer (irrespective of the age of the child) to the claim for aliment made by its grandmother, who stood in no legal relationship to it and was under no obligation to support it and had no right to its custody.

Keay v. Watson, Feb. 19, 1825, F. C., 3 S. 561, distinguished.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN December 1909 Mrs Margaret Taylor or Brown, Aberdeen, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against David Ferguson, miner, Airdrie. The pursuer craved the Court "to find that defender is the father of an illegitimate male child of which pursuer's daughter, the said Elizabeth Brown (now deceased), was delivered on 29th June 1900 at 9 Canal Street, Aberdeen; to decern against defender for payment to pursuer of the yearly sum of £8 in name of aliment for said child from said 29th June 1900 till he attains the age of fourteen years. . . ."

The pursuer averred that the defender had connection with Elizabeth Brown, her daughter, as a result of which the latter gave birth to an illegitimate male child on 29th June 1900. (Cond. 7) "Prior to the birth of said child, and in the beginning of 1900, defender admitted having 'had to do' with the said Elizabeth Brown, but denied the paternity of said child. He further called at the residence of the said Elizabeth Brown in Aberdeen, when said child was about ten months old, for the purpose of taking said child away, but delivery of said child was refused." Elizabeth Brown went to South Africa, where she died on 8th June 1904. (Cond. 8) "Prior to and since the death of pursuer's daughter, the said Elizabeth Brown, pursuer maintained, and is still maintaining, the said child in family with her, and has disbursed the sums concluded for."

The defender lodged a statement of facts, which was not in substance denied, and in which he averred:—(Stat. 2) “Defender has throughout denied the paternity of the child to which the said Elizabeth Brown gave birth on 29th June 1900, but subsequently, to avoid the heavy cost of litigation, and without admission of paternity, he offered to take charge of the child, and he went to Aberdeen for the purpose. His offer was refused, and ultimately, upon the same conditions, he agreed to pay half aliment.” (Stat. 4) “After the death of the said Elizabeth Brown, which occurred on 8th June 1904, defender renewed in August 1904 his offer to take charge of the child, but pursuer refused the offer.” (Stat. 5) “Defender is still quite willing to take charge of the child, and his mother, who is able to provide an equally suitable home to that of pursuer, has all along been willing to attend to the upbringing of the child.”

Oct. 27, 1911.

Brown v.
Ferguson.

The defender tendered payment of arrears of aliment up to August 1904, and renewed his offer to take charge of the child.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Defender being the father of said illegitimate male child, is bound to aliment same.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Defender not being the father of said child, is not bound to aliment the same. (3) Defender having made a bona fide offer to take charge of said child as from and after 8th June 1904, and said offer having been refused, pursuer is not entitled to decree for aliment after the date of said offer.

On 16th March 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) sustained the third plea in law for the defender, and found the pursuer entitled only to the sum tendered.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 6th July 1910, adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, and Lord Skerrington) on 17th and 18th October 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—So long as the defender denied the paternity of the child, he could not claim its custody,¹ and so could not avoid this action, as an admitted father might do, by offering to take the child into his own house. The mother had expressed her wish that the child should remain with its maternal grandmother, and there being no suggestion that its welfare would thereby suffer, effect should be given to the mother's wishes.² The grandmother was therefore, in these circumstances, entitled to insist in this claim. In any event, the defender was not entitled to the custody of the child till it was at least seven years old,³ and he was therefore liable in aliment up to that time. The pursuer did not now press for an award of aliment beyond the date when the action was raised, but on account of the aliment afforded by her up to that date she was entitled to insist in this action.⁴

Argued for the respondent;—The defender's offer to take the child into his house after the death of its mother was a good answer to the pursuer's claim for aliment since the date of that offer. The cases as to custody and aliment referred to by the pursuer had no bearing, because in all of them the question was raised between the father—or person assuming the father's responsibility—and the mother herself. In the present case the maternal grandmother was in no different position from, and had no higher rights as to custody than, any third party who might give support to the child. She was simply in the position of a stranger maintaining a pauper child and seeking recourse against the person who was responsible.¹ The mother's right to custody, assuming it to exist, did not transmit to the grandmother.² If the defender had admitted that he was the father of the child, he would still have been entitled to discharge the obligation upon him in the manner least burdensome to himself,³ and he could be in no worse position because he had not made that admission. The rule that the father of an illegitimate child was not entitled to its custody till it was seven years old had no application, since the mother of the child, who alone could maintain this point, had died before that age was attained. In any event, there could be no award of aliment beyond the date of raising the action.⁴

At advising on 27th October 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuer is the mother of Elizabeth Brown, who was delivered of a male illegitimate child in June 1900, and died in June 1904. The action is directed against the defender, on the allegation that he is the child's father, for aliment at the rate of £8 per annum from the date of its birth till it attains the age of fourteen ; but at our bar the claim was restricted to one for aliment down to the date when the action was raised. The defender denies paternity, but he explains on record that, for reasons specified, he offered to take charge of the child and, on this offer being refused, agreed to pay the father's proportion of its aliment, and that in August 1904 (the mother having died in June, as already stated) he renewed his offer to take the child, which the pursuer refused ; and he tenders the arrears of aliment down to August 1904, and repeats his offer to take the custody of the child. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have upheld the defender's plea as a sufficient answer to the action. The pursuer appeals, and asks that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court in order that she may establish by proof, if she can, that the defender is in fact the child's father. She maintains that his offer is not a bona fide one ; that he must pay the aliment sued for, unless it is judicially found that he is not the father ; and that he is not entitled to avoid proof upon this matter by accepting the custody of the child.

I think the Sheriffs are right. The pursuer's case resolves itself into a dilemma. If the defender is not in fact the father, it is clear that the pursuer's demand must fail. But if he is the father, I can see no reason why he should not be allowed to implement his obligation as such by taking the child and putting it in the charge of his mother, against whose ability and fitness to attend to its suitable upbringing there is admittedly nothing to be said. The pursuer's counsel however, contended that, as the defender does not admit paternity, he is not entitled to offer custody in lieu of aliment. I think the argument is fallacious, and is not supported by any of the authorities cited to us. Much reliance was placed by the pursuer's counsel on the case of Keay v. Watson.¹ As I read the reports, which are not very full or satisfactory, all that was there decided was that the mother of an illegitimate female child of seven was not bound to accept, as in full of her legal demand for its aliment, an offer to accept its custody made by the defender, who denied paternity but "admitted that he had agreed to become liable for the aliment on the part of the father." One can understand that when the mother in that case sought to establish against the defender by legal process his paternity of the infant and consequent liability at law to contribute to its aliment, a mere offer by him "to take the child into his own house and support it" was rejected by the Court as inadequate "while he denied the paternity." The mother had a clear interest (which the present pursuer has not) to establish, if she could, the fact of paternity while evidence of it was available, as this was the only means she had of relieving herself from the obligation of maintenance which was otherwise legally incumbent upon her. It is also to be observed that in *Keay v. Watson*¹ the child, a female, was only seven years of age, which may well explain why (as Shaw's Report bears) "one of their Lordships expressed an opinion that even the true father of a bastard child had no right of custody." Now, in the present case we are not considering the demand of a mother, but a claim for aliment put forward by a third party, who stands in no legal relationship to the infant, and is under no legal obligation to support it. In a question with her, the defender's offer appears to me to be a sufficient and conclusive answer. I cannot see why, in the admitted circumstances of this case, the defender should be put to his defence in a proof upon the question of actual paternity.

A subordinate argument was advanced for the pursuer as regards the period between the mother's death in 1904 and the date (in 1907) when the child (a boy) reached the age of seven. But this contention, in my opinion, clearly fails, because a mother's right to the custody (even in a question with the father) of her bastard child of tender years is based upon natural considerations, and is purely personal to herself.

For these reasons, I am for affirming the interlocutors appealed against.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred, and intimated that LORD SKERINGTON, who was absent at advising, also concurred.

LORD SALVESSEN, who had not heard the case, delivered no opinion.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutors appealed against, and dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

Poor—Settlement—Derivative settlement—Deserted children—Acquisition by father of new settlement during children's chargeability.

In 1905 four pupil children became chargeable (in respect of their father's refusal to support them) to the parish of Old Machar, where their father had then a settlement. In 1906 the father, who was able-bodied, left that parish and was not traced till 1909, when he was found in Aberdeen, where he had acquired a settlement. The children had in the meantime been supported by Old Machar, and that parish on discovering the father gave notice to Aberdeen of a claim of relief from the future maintenance of the children.

Held that, owing to the location of the father as an able-bodied man with a settlement in Aberdeen, Old Machar ceased to be liable for the maintenance of the children from the date of the notice; that Aberdeen was bound to relieve Old Machar of the sums expended on the maintenance of the children after that date; and that it fell to Aberdeen to take such steps as they might think fit to make the father support his family.

Poor—Relief—"Able-bodied."

Circumstances in which a man, who had supported himself but had not earned, and deponed that he was not able to earn, enough to support his children also, was held to be able-bodied in a question as to the poor-law.

Observed (per Lord Dundas) that a man who is able to support himself, but cannot support his children, is "able-bodied" within the meaning of the poor-law.

Observed (per Lord Salvesen)—"I think it would be dangerous to hold that in determining whether a man is able-bodied within the meaning of the poor-law, regard should be had to anything but the physical (in which I include mental) condition of the man himself."

Knox v. Hewat, (1870) 8 Macph. 397, commented on and distinguished.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine,
 and Banff.

ON 25th February 1910 the Parish Council of Old Machar brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against the Parish Council of the City Parish of Aberdeen. The demand of the pursuers was for decree ordaining the defenders (1) to repay to the pursuers certain sums, with interest thereon, expended by the pursuers on the maintenance of four pupil children of William Taylor since 14th July 1909; and (2) to free and relieve the pursuers of the advances which they might be required to make for the maintenance of these children in the future.

The facts averred on record were not in dispute, and are stated in the following passage from the opinion of Lord Dundas:—"William Taylor, the father of the said children, was born in 1871 in the defenders' parish, but had, by residence in the pursuers' parish, acquired a settlement there prior to 1905. He married in 1894, but he and his wife, though they visited one another, did not live together, Taylor mainly residing with his mother in Old Machar, and his wife with her parents, latterly in the parish of Dyce. In October 1905 Mrs Taylor became insane, and was removed to the Aberdeen Royal Asylum. Dyce claimed and Old Machar admitted liability for her maintenance. In December 1905 the children, whose maternal grandfather had died, were granted relief by Dyce at the request of the grandmother, and Dyce claimed and the pursuers admitted liability for their maintenance. The pursuers called upon Taylor to make arrangements for the support of his children, and, on his failure to do so, brought a complaint against him to which, on 20th February 1906, he pleaded guilty in the Sheriff Court, and (not having paid the fine) went to prison for thirty days. All that the pursuers managed to recover towards payment of their advances for the children was a sum of £10, which was realised by the sale of some furniture belonging to Taylor's mother. The children were boarded out in the parishes of Dyce and Newmills, and the pursuers have had to pay these parishes for their maintenance. About May 1906 Taylor left Old Machar, and the pursuers' inspector did not trace his whereabouts until 9th July 1909, at which date he was living in the defenders' parish, where he had by that time acquired a residential settlement. On 14th July the pursuers intimated to the defenders that Taylor had lost his settlement in Old Machar and called upon them for relief, as from that date, of the children's maintenance. The defenders disputed, and dispute, liability." It was also admitted that all the children were in pupillarity at 14th July 1909. The defenders averred that William Taylor's health had never been such as to enable him to earn sufficient for his own support, but this was denied by the pursuers.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect the settlement of the said [children] is that of their father, the said William Taylor, who had, prior to 14th July 1909, acquired a residential settlement in defenders' parish, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. (2) Alternatively, in respect the settlement of said children is that of their father, whose birth settlement is in the defenders' parish and whose residential settlement in the pursuers' parish had been lost prior to 14th July 1909, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) In respect that the said children had at the commencement of said chargeability a derivative residential settlement in the pursuers' parish, and that said chargeability has continued without interruption, the pursuers' parish remains the parish of their settlement. (3) In respect that the pursuers' parish is the parish of settlement of the said children, the pursuers remain liable to maintain the said children so long as they continue chargeable and are proper objects of parochial relief, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) Alternatively, the said William Taylor, being a pauper in respect of the relief afforded to his children, his settlement remains during chargeability as at the date of its commencement, and the pursuers accordingly remain liable for the maintenance of his said children so long as they continue to be proper objects of parochial relief, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. The following plea was added at the hearing before the Second Division:—(5) On the assumption that the said William Taylor was an able-bodied man, his children were not proper objects of parochial relief, and the defenders are not liable in repayment of the sums disbursed by the pursuers for the maintenance of the said children.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

The parties not being agreed on the question whether Taylor was an able-bodied man, a proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence is given in the opinions of Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen.

On 29th June 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson Begg) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds in fact (1) that in the month of December 1905 the four pupil children of William Taylor mentioned on record became chargeable to the pursuers' parish, in respect of the refusal of their said father to support them; (2) that Taylor was then an able-bodied man, with a residential settlement in the pursuers' parish, and that he has continued to be an able-bodied man; (3) that the pursuers prosecuted Taylor for having neglected to maintain his said children, and that they obtained a conviction against him on 20th February 1906; (4) that since December 1905 the pursuers have maintained the said children having, however, recovered £10 out of a small estate to which Taylor succeeded in April 1906; and (5) that the pursuers now claim payment from the defenders of the sums expended on the maintenance of the said children since 14th July 1909, at which date the said William Taylor is alleged by the pursuers to have lost his residential settlement in their parish and acquired a settlement in the defenders' parish: Finds in law (1) that in December 1905 the said children had a derivative settlement, through their father, in the pursuers' parish; (2) that their settlement remained and remains the same during chargeability; and (3) that the pursuers thus remain liable for the maintenance of the said children while continuing to be proper objects of parochial relief: Therefore assoilzies the defenders"

The pursuers appealed to the Second Division, and the appeal was heard on 13th and 14th July 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—Between May 1906 and July 1909 Taylor had deserted his children. He was not during that period accessible to the parochial authority relieving the children; and this was desertion in the sense of the poor-law.¹ Being deserted, the children became entitled to relief in their own right; and the parish which was bound to relieve them was that of the father's settlement at the time when he deserted them. But when Taylor became accessible to the poor-law authorities in 1909 his desertion was at an end.

* "NOTE.—In consequence of the mutual admissions of the parties, the proof has been practically narrowed down to the question whether Taylor has all along been an able-bodied man, and I think that I must answer this question in the affirmative. The only evidence for the defenders on this point is that of two doctors employed by them on 2nd September 1909 to examine Taylor without any previous acquaintance with him. I prefer the evidence of Dr Mitchell who has known Taylor for many years, and of Hutcheon and Nelson who have known him for some years.

"But, nevertheless, I am of opinion that the law is against the pursuers. Their procurator cited several Local Government Board arbitrations in which their view of the law was sustained, viz.:—Fordyce v. Bellie, Poor-Law Magazine for 1904, p. 46; Govan v. Snizort, Poor-Law Magazine for 1905, p. 31; and Kilsyth v. Cumbernauld, Poor-Law Magazine for 1906, p. 147. But the opinions expressed by the arbiters in these cases have been overruled by the Court of Session in two subsequent cases, viz.:—Paisley v. Row and Glasgow, 1908 S. C., p. 731, and Leith v. Aberdeen, 1910 S. C., p. 404. These cases seem to me to settle authoritatively that even a derivative settlement cannot be altered during chargeability. . . ."

His children ceased then to be chargeable in their own right. At Oct. 27, 1911. this date Taylor had acquired a residential settlement in Aberdeen, there being nothing to prevent this, seeing that he was able-bodied,¹ and was not pauperised by the relief given to his children²; and his children took through their father a settlement in Aberdeen. Any relief given after that date to the children was therefore recoverable from the defenders,³ who might have recourse against Taylor himself. The cases relied on by the Sheriff-substitute⁴ were distinguishable. In these there was no change of circumstances, and nothing, therefore, to interrupt the chargeability of the wife or children, whereas here the discovery of the father in Aberdeen did interrupt the children's chargeability.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

Argued for the respondents;—Whether Taylor was or was not able-bodied, the appellants could not recover from the respondents the relief given to his children. Esto that Taylor were able-bodied, his children were not entitled to relief unless they were deserted.⁵ Here Taylor was not in desertion, for he could easily have been traced at any time between 1906 and 1909, if reasonable search had been made for him by the appellants. But supposing Taylor was held to be in desertion after leaving Old Machar, that desertion certainly ended when he was discovered in July 1909, and, as the relief which the appellants sought to recover was not given till after that date, it was improperly given and could not be recovered. Esto, on the other hand, that Taylor was not able-bodied, then he was the pauper, and as he could not acquire a settlement during chargeability, he remained settled in Old Machar. If it were necessary to consider the evidence as to Taylor's physical condition, it must be held to be proved that he was not able-bodied as he could not by his labour support himself,⁶ or, at all events, himself and his children.⁷

At advising on 27th October 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuers and defenders in this case are the Parish Councils of Old Machar and of the City Parish of Aberdeen respectively. The pursuers in effect claim as against the defenders to be relieved of all liability for the maintenance of four children of the name of Taylor after 14th July 1909, when they gave notice to the defenders of their claim.

The facts of the case, which are, for the most part, undisputed, may be summarised as follows—[Here followed the passage quoted supra, p. 26.]

The only fact about which proof had to be led was whether or not Taylor was an able-bodied man in December 1905, within the meaning of the Poor-Law, and has since continued to be so. The Sheriff-substitute found

Oct. 27, 1911. in the affirmative, and I am of opinion that he was right, but as the matter was fully argued, I shall briefly refer to the evidence. The proof discloses that Taylor was invalided home in 1901 from the South African war with a medal and three clasps, but a doctor on board ship allowed him to go home, instead of to Netley Hospital, when he landed. Then he worked for a time at Grandholm, getting eighteen shillings a week. Some years later he was medically passed for the militia, and served for about four years without a break until he was discharged in May 1909, when his conduct was certified as "very good." Taylor says that his plea of guilty in February 1906 was a mistake, and was given only because he could not get an agent to take up his case. At the proof he deponed: "I have been residing in Aberdeen for some time. I have a house of my own, and have paid my poor-rates, 2s. 11d. Since I have been in Aberdeen I have just been travelling about selling tea, and doing work for farmers at odd times." As regards health, Dr Mitchell, who has known Taylor for sixteen years, says: "I don't remember of him being ever ill. I think he was always a healthy man." When Taylor was brought before the Sheriff early in 1906, Dr Mitchell examined him medically, and says, "At that time I had no doubt he was a man fit to maintain his children." As regards Taylor's account of his ailments in South Africa, including alleged sunstroke, Dr Mitchell states a distinct opinion that South Africa made no change or difference on him, that after his return he was "quite an able-bodied man" and "quite an intelligent man," "fit for a normal man's day's work," but "very much indisposed to doing regular work." "I think he is a Weary Willie." "Apart from his laziness, I consider that Taylor is a normally strong man, physically and mentally." The witnesses Hutcheon and Nelson, who have known Taylor for years, also say that his condition appears to have suffered no material change owing to his South African experiences, and that he was and is quite fit for the work of an able-bodied man. Mr Hutcheon states that when he got work for Taylor as a golf caddie about the end of 1905, the latter refused to do it. Taylor admits the work was got for him, but says he "could make nothing out of it." Against all this evidence, there is only the opinion of two medical gentlemen who merely saw Taylor in 1909, and are disposed to put him down as neurasthenic. But their more or less theoretical opinions do not seem to be inconsistent with the facts above set out, and with Dr Mitchell's opinion pronounced with knowledge of the man. Thus Dr Robertson admits that in describing Taylor as not able-bodied he proceeds on the latter's "subjective symptoms," and on the assumed truth of his own story, apart from which there was nothing which would have led him to the same conclusion. I have therefore no doubt that the Sheriff-substitute's decision on this disputed matter was quite right. Even if it be assumed that Taylor could not, or cannot, support his children, it is clear that he could, and can, support himself, as, in fact, he has done. And that is, according to the authorities, a sufficient basis for the proposition that he was, and is, able-bodied, within the meaning of the Poor Law. I may refer to the well-known decisions in the House of Lords, M'William v. Adams,¹ and

Lindsay v. M'Tear,¹ as establishing that the children of a man who can support himself though he cannot support them, are not, while in family with him, "left destitute of all help," so as to be proper objects of parochial relief; for, as Lord Deas put it in Hay v. Paterson,² "the law presumes every able-bodied father to be capable of maintaining his family, however different the fact may be." In Petrie v. Meek,³ Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis laid it down as "conclusively and directly determined" by these House of Lords cases, "that by an able-bodied man is meant one who suffers under no personal inability, bodily or mental, to work"; and in *Jack v. Thom*⁴ the same great Judge repeated even more explicitly that "the expression 'able-bodied' is a comparative term. What the statute means by an able-bodied man is a man not labouring under any disability (bodily or mental), to work so as to earn his subsistence." I do not think these authoritative statements (and others to the same effect could be readily furnished) can be held as in any way weakened by certain dicta (the accuracy of which I am, for my own part, disposed to doubt) in a very special and peculiar case, Knox v. Hewat,⁵ which was referred to at the discussion.

I assume, then, that Taylor was in 1905, and has continued to be, an able-bodied man. On this footing the learned Sheriff-substitute has decided the case against the pursuers, holding himself bound by two recent decisions to which he refers as settling authoritatively "that even a derivative settlement cannot be altered during chargeability." I cannot help thinking that the Sheriff-substitute has misread, or at least misapplied, the cases on which he founds. They do, I apprehend, lay down a rule (which had already been laid down at least as far back as Beattie v. Adamson,⁶ and has been repeatedly followed ever since) that a derivative settlement cannot be lost during chargeability, but they also indicate clearly enough that the rule is subject to this qualification that the state of matters may be altered when a change of circumstances occurs. I gather that the Paisley case⁷ was sent to a Court of seven Judges in order to define the scope and effect of the decision by the House of Lords in the Rutherglen case,⁸ which "exploded," as Lord Dunedin put it, "the doctrine of desertion as equivalent to death." The Paisley case⁷ disclosed that Daniel Wright was born in Glasgow, acquired a residential settlement in Row, deserted his wife and children in 1901, and had not been thereafter heard of. In 1902 his wife received parochial relief from Paisley, which was reimbursed by Row. But, after a due time had elapsed, Row repudiated further liability on the ground that Wright had lost his settlement there by absence for the statutory period, and that his wife's derivative settlement there had therefore lapsed also. The seven Judges unanimously rejected Row's contention, holding (in accordance with *Beattie v. Adamson*⁶) that the wife was the pauper "in her own right," and that her settlement remained unchanged during her chargeability. But the Lord President's opinion, in explaining his

His Lordship points out that the deserted wife, by accepting relief, became herself the pauper, and that her derivative settlement was thereby fixed, and remained "until there is a change of circumstances"; and he goes on to say that "the only change of circumstances must consist in the discovery of the husband alive, . . . " when, "if he is able-bodied, it is he who is bound to support his wife, . . . the husband, if able-bodied, however poor, is liable to support the wife." The Leith case¹ followed on precisely similar lines, except that the man had not deserted his family, but was incarcerated for a long term of penal servitude. I observe that Lord Dunedin indicated that if, when the father emerged from prison, his children went back to him for a single day and then returned to the Leith Poorhouse, "the change would have operated"; he would by that time have lost his residential settlement, and the children, if still pupils and not forisfamiliarated, would follow his fortunes in the matter of settlement.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

Lord Dundas.

Now, in this case it appears that Taylor had, prior to 14th July 1909, lost his residential settlement in Old Machar and acquired one in Aberdeen. He was, and is, ex hypothesi an able-bodied man. He is therefore, "however poor," liable to support his children; and if he fails to do so, it is, in my judgment, for the parish of his settlement (viz., Aberdeen) to do what may be right in the matter. The pursuers are, in my opinion, free, as from the date of their notice, of liability to maintain the children owing to the change of circumstances, viz., the definite location of Taylor as an able-bodied man with a settlement in Aberdeen. It was said that the pursuers' inspector might, by a very little exercise of energy, have traced this man much sooner than he did, or (as was suggested) he chose to do; but I do not think the proof warrants these inferences, assuming the point to be, in any view, a relevant one.

At the discussion, the defenders asked and obtained leave to put upon record the following supplementary plea:—"On the assumption that the said William Taylor was an able-bodied man, his children were not proper objects of parochial relief, and the defenders are not liable in repayment of the sums disbursed by the pursuers for the maintenance of the said children." I do not think this plea is of any material avail to the defenders. On the assumption (well founded, as I hold) that Taylor was, in the end of 1905, when the children were first relieved, an able-bodied man, it may well be that they were not at that time proper objects of parochial relief. But the pursuers' claim has regard only to the period after 14th July 1909. When Taylor disappeared from Old Machar about May 1906, his children became, I take it, proper objects of relief; and when he was subsequently located in 1909, as an able-bodied man with a residential settlement in Aberdeen, I think, as already explained, that the pursuers were entitled to call upon the defenders to relieve them, as from the date of their notice, of the maintenance of these children, who the defenders maintain on record were paupers in their own right, or to take such steps as they might think fit against Taylor.

I am therefore for sustaining the appeal and recalling the interlocutor Oct. 27, 1911. appealed against. We should, in my judgment, re-affirm the Sheriff-substitute's first four findings in fact; and add others to the effect that, in or about May 1906, Taylor left the pursuers' parish, and was not traced until on or about 9th July 1909, when he was found to be residing in the defenders' parish, where he had acquired a residential settlement; and that on 14th July 1909 the pursuers intimated to the defenders that Taylor had lost his settlement in Old Machar, and called on them for relief of future maintenance of the children. We should, I think, also substitute for the Sheriff's second and third findings in law (the first being re-affirmed) findings to the effect that, as from 14th July 1909, the pursuers are not liable for the maintenance of the children; and that the defenders must take such steps to make Taylor support his children, or otherwise in the matter, as they may be advised; and decern against the defenders for payment of the amount sued for.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.
Lord Dundas.

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case the pursuers seek to recover from the defenders certain sums which they have disbursed since 14th July 1909 for the maintenance of four pupil children of a man named William Taylor. Taylor was married on 7th December 1894, but after a year's residence with his wife he went to live with his mother, while his wife went to live with her own parents. The spouses, however, continued to visit each other from time to time, and as the result of their intercourse five children were born. In October 1905 Mrs Taylor became insane, but the children continued to reside with her parents till December 1905, when, their grandfather having recently died, they were granted relief by the parish of Dyce, where they were then residing. A claim was made on the pursuers, who admitted liability, William Taylor having acquired at that time a residential settlement in their parish. They endeavoured to recover from him the cost of his children's maintenance, and in February 1906 took criminal proceedings against him on a charge of neglecting to maintain his children, "he being able to do so." Taylor pled guilty to the charge libelled, and was sentenced to pay a fine of £5 or to a term of thirty days' imprisonment. He served the term of imprisonment.

On 19th April 1906 the pursuers instructed their law-agent to take proceedings to recover from Taylor the advances made by them for the support of his children, and the law-agent succeeded in recovering £10 on account of said advances. This sum of £10 formed part of the share of his mother's estate to which Taylor had then succeeded. No further steps were taken by the pursuers against Taylor, who in the month of May 1906 left the pursuers' parish and went to the adjoining parish of Aberdeen. The pursuers' inspector made certain inquiries to trace him, but according to his evidence he did not actually ascertain his address until 9th July 1909. By this time Taylor had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Aberdeen, unless he had been already pauperised by the relief given to his children in the pursuers' parish. On 14th July 1909 the pursuers intimated to the defenders that William Taylor had lost his settlement in their parish, and called upon the defenders to relieve them of the future support of the four children then under their charge. This demand was Oct 27, 1911. refused ; and the present action has been raised to determine the defenders' liability.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

Lord Salvesen.

The only question of fact with regard to which the parties are at variance is whether William Taylor was in December 1905 and continued to be an able-bodied person, and this question has been decided in the pursuers' favour by the Sheriff-substitute. The importance of the question is this, that if at the time the pursuers admitted liability to maintain Taylor's children Taylor was himself a pauper, then the chargeability of the pursuers' parish, being once established, could not afterwards be affected by any change of residence on Taylor's part. If, on the other hand, when they admitted liability for Taylor's children, Taylor was in fact able-bodied and not entitled to poor relief but his children were entitled to be maintained owing to his desertion of them, a question of law arises which the Sheriff-substitute has decided adversely to the pursuers.

Up to a certain point there is no difficulty in stating the legal principles that apply here. An able-bodied man is not entitled to poor-law relief either for himself or for his children. If, however, such children have been deserted by their father, they may become proper objects of relief in their own right so long as the residence of the father cannot be ascertained, or where he has succeeded in putting himself beyond the reach of the poor-law authorities. If, on the other hand, relief is granted to the children of a man because he is not able-bodied, the father is the pauper, and the children, as his dependants, take his settlement. It is essential, therefore, in the first instance, for the decision of this case, to determine whether, in point of fact, Taylor was able-bodied in December 1905 and thereafter.

It must be conceded to the pursuers that the first steps which they took after the children were thrown upon them for maintenance were consistent with the view that William Taylor was an able-bodied man. On no other footing were they entitled to bring the criminal complaint against him ; and so far Taylor's attitude in pleading guilty to the charge supports their case. Too much stress, however, must not be laid upon this, as Taylor was without legal advice, and the Court had nothing to proceed upon but his plea of guilty. The subsequent proceedings to recover the estate to which he had fallen heir and apply same in payment of the advances made for the support of his children are consistent with either view. No further proceedings were taken against Taylor, nor was there much time to do so, as he left the parish in May 1906.

Taylor's own account of himself is peculiar. He served in the South African war, but was invalided home in 1901. According to his own evidence he suffered from sunstroke, and has never recovered from the effects. He has never since had a job at which he earned steady wages, except once when he worked for a month, getting 18s. a week. For some time he lived with his mother, who kept a small grocer's shop, in which he assisted her, acting also as a kind of nurse and housekeeper to his mother when she was disabled by illness from attending to her own affairs. Since December 1905, when his mother died, he has supported himself by going round the country as a pedlar selling tea, and also occasionally by doing work for farmers. He says he has never on an average made more than a shilling a day, just enough to keep himself. On the other hand, after he came home from the South African war he joined the militia, and was passed by the doctor ; and between 1904 and 1909 he served 1 year and 199 days in the Special Reserve, and two years and 166 days in the militia. He has also had a house of his own in Aberdeen, and has paid the poor-rates applicable. The medical evidence is conflicting—Dr Mitchell, who has known him for sixteen years, being of opinion that he is able-bodied and quite fitted to maintain his children if he chooses to work, while two doctors examined for the defenders gave it as their opinion, proceeding mainly on subjective symptoms, that he is not able-bodied, and that he cannot perform a day's work of a normally healthy man owing to the nervous trouble from which he suffers as the consequence of his South African experience. Dr Mitchell admits that he is nervous, and that on the morning of the proof, when he talked with him, he noticed "exceedingly slight tremors in the head," which he attributed to excitement. He also stated, "I believe the man himself is convinced that he is not able to work."

Oct. 27, 1911.
Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.

Lord Salvesen.

On these facts I have come with some difficulty to agree with the Sheriff-substitute in holding that Taylor was in 1905 and has since continued to be an able-bodied man in the sense of the Poor Law. It is clear that, if he had had no dependants, he had sufficient capacity for some forms of work to enable him to support himself ; and that he has never required relief from the poor-law authorities. If, therefore, he were not pauperised when his children's support was undertaken by the pursuers owing to his failure to provide for them, he was quite capable of acquiring a residential settlement for himself. It is true that there are some persons who may be able to support themselves without having recourse to the parish who are nevertheless not fit to maintain a family. An illustration of this is to be found in the case of Knox v. Hewat.¹ There a man was burdened with a daughter seventeen years of age who was disabled from earning her livelihood by permanent disease. He was able to earn wages in good weather, but was entirely unable to obtain for his daughter the support which she required. The Lord Justice-Clerk in that case said : "I think it is proved that the father is not able-bodied. He could not probably have demanded relief for himself, but when the question arises in regard to his daughter I think it cannot be said that she is the child of an able-bodied man in the legal sense of these words" ; and Lord Benholme, speaking of the father, in that case said : "His position depends not only on the extent of his means, but on the weight of his burdens." These observations, if they are to be regarded as of general application, create some difficulty, for the position of William Taylor is in some respects not unlike that of the invalid's father in the case of Knox v. Hewat.¹ But there are two points of distinction which I think justify us in dealing with Knox's case¹ as exceptional and special. The first is that the support of a permanently invalided daughter of seventeen is a different kind of burden from the support of children under puberty ; and the second, which is more vital, is that the father was admittedly unable to work in wet weather through physical disability. In Taylor's case there is no physical disablement, although there may be a disinclination for hard work which has become constitutional. I

¹ 8 Macph. 397.

Oct. 27, 1911. think it would be dangerous to hold that in determining whether a man is able-bodied within the meaning of the Poor Law, regard should be had to anything but the physical (in which I include mental) condition of the man himself, and it seems illogical to hold that a person supporting himself by work, and paying poor-rates, and so not entitled to parochial relief in his own right, must be treated as a pauper because of the extent of his family burdens.

Old Machar
Parish Council
v. Aberdeen
Parish
Council.
Lord Salvesen.

As regards the legal question, I concur with Lord Dundas. The only point in the case which makes it special is that the discovery of the deserting father in an adjoining parish very soon after he had acquired a residential settlement there (which is the change of circumstances relied on) rather suggests a suspicion that no very strict inquiry was made as to his whereabouts till it was likely to prove fruitful. But even so taking it, the change had occurred without the connivance of the relieving parish's inspector and by the act of Taylor himself. This acquisition of a new settlement is a positive fact which is to be distinguished from the mere lapse of the period of time which involves the loss of a residential settlement, and in this case, —as in that figured by the Lord President in the Leith case,¹—involved a change of chargeability. I am therefore for recalling the judgment appealed from.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. I hold that the true test to be applied to such a case as this is found in the question—Has it been proved that the pauper is not able-bodied? If the evidence led, on the part of those who aver that he is not, does not prove as a fact that he is not, they cannot obtain a favourable answer to any plea founded on the averment. I think it would be a very dangerous thing to deal with cases where there is a disinclination to work as being cases of inability, except upon very clear grounds in fact. Here I entirely concur with your Lordships that there is no ground for holding that William Taylor was not to be classed among the able-bodied in the sense of the Poor Law. Taylor's children obtained relief, they being necessitous, and therefore proper objects of relief in their own right, being deserted by their father. He was then, when found, dealt with as able-bodied, and therefore capable of acquiring a settlement.

But for Knox's case,² I should have had no difficulty. But as I agree with what your Lordships have said, I do not accept that exceptional case as ruling the present, but concur with your Lordships in holding that this case is distinguishable from that of Knox.²

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Millar v.
Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Collector Refuge falling on stair. Assurance
 Co., Limited.

A collector for an assurance company, whose duty it was to make a door-to-door collection of premiums, fell upon a stair which he had occasion to use while seeking to collect a premium, and was injured.

Held that the accident arose "out of and in the course of" the employment.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 2 (1) (a)— Notice of accident—Want of notice—"Mistake or other reasonable cause."

On 9th May 1910 a collector for an assurance company fell on a stair, which he had occasion to use in the course of his employment, and sustained injuries. A day or two after the accident, and again on 8th June, while he still believed that his injuries were merely of a temporary nature, he gave verbal notice of the accident to the manager of his company, but made no claim for compensation. On 29th June he left the service of the company, and from that date onwards he was incapacitated for work. On 12th September, when he had ascertained from medical advice that his condition was much more serious than he had at first supposed, he gave formal notice of the accident to his employers.

Circumstances in which held that the delay in giving notice was due to "mistake . . . or other reasonable cause" within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and so was not a bar to the maintenance of proceedings for compensation.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—A. S., 26th June 1907, sec. 17 (f)—Process—Appeal by stated case—Order for transmission of process.

In an appeal by stated case the Court remitted to the arbitrator for a statement of the facts on which he had based his judgment. The arbitrator having reported, the appellant stated that the evidence in the arbitration had been recorded in shorthand, and moved the Court, in respect of the unsatisfactory nature of the arbitrator's report, to order the process to be transmitted to the Court of Session. The respondent made no objection, and the Court ordered the process to be transmitted.

Nov. 1, 1911. MILLAR v. REFUGE ASSURANCE CO., LIMITED. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between James Millar, assurance agent, Dundee, and the Refuge Assurance Company, Limited, Oxford Street, Manchester, the Sheriff-substitute at Dundee (Campbell Smith) awarded compensation, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

The case set forth :—“ The Sheriff-substitute found that the respondent, James Millar, who is sixty-five years of age, entered the service of the appellants, the Refuge Assurance Company, Limited, in December 1899; that his work with the appellants consisted in his going from door to door collecting premiums of assurance on their behalf; that on 9th May 1910, while engaged in the course of his employment with the appellants, and engaged collecting assurance premiums on behalf of appellants, the respondent fell down a stair at 134 Blackness Road, Dundee, thereby sustaining injuries to his left side, shoulder, and arm; that a day or two after the occurrence of the accident, and again on 8th June 1910, the respondent gave verbal notice of the accident he had sustained to appellants' manager in Dundee, and having on the last-mentioned date asked for a week's rest, was informed that he had better resign; that respondent on 15th June 1910 handed in his resignation, dated 8th June 1910, and left appellants' employment on 29th June 1910; that on that date he applied for a situation with another insurance company, but did not receive employment from them; that from 29th June 1910 he became worse and remained at home. Respondent stated that he was 'trying to fight it off, but for six weeks he got no sleep as the pain was so dreadful'; that the pains which he had felt since the date of the accident became so acute that on 6th September 1910 the respondent consulted Dr Crichton, and that on 12th September 1910 the respondent's agent gave the appellants formal notice of the accident; that the want of notice was occasioned by mistake (viz., a mistaken belief that his injuries were of a temporary nature, and were not such as to cause him to ask compensation) within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906; that the accident to respondent on 9th May 1910 arose out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants, and that as a result of the injuries then sustained by the respondent the left side of his face has been paralysed, and he suffers from severe pain in the left side of the body, and has been totally incapacitated for work since 29th June 1910; that the average weekly earnings of the respondent were £1, 9s. 4d; and that the appellants were liable to respondent in compensation at the rate of 10s. per week, commencing as from 29th June 1910; and awarded accordingly.”

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Whether the respondent, alleging accident on 9th May 1910, and incapacity for work as from 29th June 1910, and not having given statutory notice of the accident until 12th September 1910, is barred from claiming compensation? (2) Whether the respondent, having voluntarily left the appellants' employment on 29th June 1910 without having given notice of accident as required by section 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, is barred from claiming compensation? (3) Whether there was evidence upon which it could be competently found that the said James Millar sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 9th May 1910? (4) Whether there was evidence upon which it could be competently found that verbal notice was on 8th June 1910, or prior thereto, given by respondent to appellants' manager in Dundee, and whether such notice was sufficient legal notice? (5) Whether there was evidence that the paralysis from which the said James Millar is suffering was a result of the alleged accident, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (6) Whether the appellants, having suffered prejudice by the delay in giving statutory notice, the respondent is barred from claiming compensation?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 9th March 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) Notice.—No written notice of the accident alleged to have occurred on 9th May had been given until 12th September, and no reasonable cause was shown why that notice should be held to have been given "as soon as practicable" as required by section 2 (1) of the Act. Further, that notice was not given before the respondent "voluntarily left the employment" of the appellants, and the onus was on him, and had not been discharged, of showing that they had not been prejudiced in their defence thereby.¹ The sixth question of law showed that in the opinion of the arbitrator the appellants had suffered prejudice. A mistaken belief as to the degree of the injuries sustained was not, by itself, a "mistake" in the sense of section 2 (1) (a) of the Act to which want of notice could be attributed. The use of that word in the section clearly referred only to such mistakes as a mistake in the dispatch or receipt of a notice. Neither could the delay in giving notice be said to have been occasioned by any "other reasonable cause" in the sense of the Act, because it was necessary to read these words as referring to something ejusdem generis with "absence from the United Kingdom." In the case of *Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company*² the Court did not find it necessary to consider the difference between "mistake" and "other reasonable cause," and that case was distinguishable from the present. The proviso could not be read so as to make the rule as to notice a practical nullity; as would be the case if it was held to be sufficient excuse for delayed notice by an injured man that his injuries had proved more serious than was at first supposed. (2) Occurrence of the accident.—It had not been proved that there had been any accident at all; still less that there had been an accident "arising out of and in the course of" the respondent's employment, because the manner in which the alleged accident happened was left wholly unexplained. The onus of proof was on the respondent, and as he had failed to discharge it he had not established his right to compensation.³

Argued for the respondent;—(1) Notice.—Verbal notice of the accident had been given a day or two after it occurred, and that was sufficient to dispose of the allegation of prejudice. But even assuming that the appellants had been prejudiced by delay in serving a statutory notice, the proviso in section 2 of the Act with regard to mistake was independent of prejudice, and the arbitrator had found that the want of notice was occasioned by mistake within the meaning of that proviso. The respondent, therefore, was not barred from obtaining compensation.⁴ (2) Occurrence of the accident.—The arbitrator had found that the respondent had fallen down a stair while engaged in Millar v.

Refuge
Assurance
Co., Limited.

On 9th March 1911 the Court pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—" Hoc statu remit the cause back to the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator to state the facts proved before him on which he found that the respondent sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 9th May 1910, and to report."

The Sheriff-substitute reported in the following terms:—"The Sheriff-substitute, as arbitrator, found it proved on the evidence of the respondent, and the witnesses Mrs Isabella Lindsay or Hutton and Mrs Kennedy, who resided at 134 Blackness Road, Dundee, that the respondent was in the stair there on 9th May 1910 for the purpose of collecting premiums of assurance due to the appellants by the witness Mrs Kennedy: Found it proved that the respondent fell, that fact never having been denied—the allegation regarding the fall in defence being that sufficient legal notice of it had not been given to the defenders—and sustained injury on the said stair on the occasion above set forth, and from the following facts which I found proved (1) on the evidence of the respondent and that of his wife, that on going home from said stair he at once told his wife of the accident and where and how it had happened; that she at once applied external remedies to the injured parts; that prior to that day respondent had never been indisposed in any way, but had been a strong, healthy man; that respondent ceased to work on account of said accident; that his wife continued to treat respondent's injuries until Dr Crichton, the family doctor, was called in in the beginning of September 1910; (2) on respondent's own evidence and that of the appellants' district manager (Mr Isaac Jones), the respondent informed the district manager within two days after the occurrence of the accident that he had been injured as stated; (3) on the medical evidence of Dr Don and Dr Crichton that the respondent's physical condition was such as was likely to be caused by the fall of which he complained, and was in their opinion due to it."

On the case being put out, on 8th June 1911, for hearing on the report, counsel for the appellants stated that shorthand notes of the evidence in the arbitration had been taken for the parties, and moved the Court, in respect of the unsatisfactory nature of the Sheriff-substitute's report, to order transmission of the process from the Sheriff Court.¹

The respondent did not state any objections to the motion.

The Court ordained the Sheriff-clerk at Dundee to transfer the process in the arbitration to the Clerk of the First Division.

The case was further heard on 17th June 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—Though there was evidence that the respondent had been seen upon the stair in question one day, his presence there on 9th May was not proved. There was no evidence as to the manner in which the alleged accident had happened, and the evidence was consistent with its having happened independently of the respondent's employment. Therefore, the onus which lay upon him of showing how the accident happened so as to establish that it arose "out of and in the course of" his employment had not been discharged.²

Argued for the respondent;—There was sufficient evidence to support the Sheriff-substitute's finding that the accident arose out of the respondent's employment; and this was corroborated by his having gone home and told his wife about it, and having told his employer of it two days later, when he had no object in misrepresenting the fact, because he did not then consider that he had been seriously injured.¹

Nov. 1, 1911.
 Millar v.
 Refuge
 Assurance
 Co., Limited.

At advising on 1st November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case, after some very unsatisfactory procedure, to which, under the circumstances, I need make no further allusion, your Lordships are in possession of the whole facts in the case; and what may be called the main question is, undoubtedly, whether there was any evidence to show that the claimant met with an accident “in the course of and arising out of” his employment.

According to his own story, he was a collector for the Assurance Company which he sues—that is to say, his business was to go round and collect premiums from the various persons who were assured for small sums in this Assurance Company; and while he was doing his business, and going up a certain stair to get a premium from a lodger who, he thought, lodged at the top of it (as a matter of fact the lodger in question had removed), he fell upon the stair and hurt himself. At the time he did not think the injury serious, but afterwards it developed and, we are told, caused hemiplegia, which incapacitated him for further work.

I do not hesitate to say that this case has given me great difficulty. As far as the law of the matter is concerned, it is one of those cases where, in one sense, there is no difficulty in stating the law. The difficulty is in the application of it. I do not think I need say more about it, because there has been a very recent case in the House of Lords, the case of Kitchenham,² where their Lordships approved in terms of the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal is given in the twin cases of *Kitchenham*³ and Leach,³ which, read together, afford a very good contrast and a very good example of the criteria upon which such cases should be decided. And the judgment there which had the special approbation of the House of Lords was the judgment of Fletcher Moulton, L.J.

The distinction that is there drawn is between accidents which happen to a man, and are, so to speak, brought upon him by his business, and accidents which, although a man may be in one sense upon his business, are just accidents which may happen to everybody. Now, the distinction even between those two classes comes to be very fine, and it would be quite impossible to frame any definition or set of rules which ab ante would embrace all the cases; and, in particular, there would be an obvious difference according to the class of employment which a man is in. Take the case, for instance, of a street accident. Everyone has to go into the street, and if a man's business does not actually take him to the street, well, then, although the accident may arise in the course of his employment, it scarcely arises out of his employment. But, on the other hand, there may be an accident to a person whose business actually takes him to the street. For instance, I cannot doubt that if a sandwichman—whose actual business is to wander up and down the streets all day—if a sandwichman in the course of his wanderings was run over by a taxi-cab, I cannot doubt that that would be an accident arising not only in the course of, but also out of, his employment.

Ld. President.

Well, now, when you come to the application here, I arrive at the conclusion that if this man was on this stair simply and solely for the purpose of his business, namely, to go to the person whom he was calling upon, this accident fairly arose out of his employment as well as in the course of it.

But there remains the question whether he did meet with his accident on the stair, as he says, and that is the part of the case that has given me personally most trouble, because I must be fair in stating that if I had been the arbitrator I should have come to the conclusion that there was not enough evidence to show that he had been there. But, then, that is not exactly the criterion which I am entitled to apply here. I think that it is well settled that all these questions which depend, so to speak, on pure fact—I do not mean that there are no other considerations as well, but where pure fact underlies them—the duty of this Court is not to reverse the arbitrator unless his judgment, so to speak, cannot be supported. Therefore I say that, although I should have come to another conclusion myself, I cannot hold that there was no evidence on which the arbitrator might go; and therefore I do not feel myself entitled to interfere with his judgment.

There were two subordinate questions in the case, which I do not think give any trouble, as regards the giving of notice. It seems to me here that there was a reasonable excuse, because I think it was quite probable that the claimant was not aware of the seriousness of his accident, and that, when he did come to know of the seriousness of the accident, he did give notice.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, although, I confess, not without doubt and hesitation, I think the judgment the Sheriff-substitute has given cannot be said to be unsupportable, and that your Lordships should dismiss the appeal. I do not think it necessary to answer all the questions as they are put in the stated case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the preliminary question as to whether the statutory provisions have been complied with or not, I should not think of disturbing the Sheriff-substitute's judgment except upon much stronger grounds than I find in this case, because the question whether there has been a reasonable excuse for delay is really a question of fact upon which I do not think we should interfere if there was evidence before the Sheriff on which he could reasonably have reached his conclusion, and in the present case it is impossible to say that there was no such evidence.

Then upon the question whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, I agree with your Lordship that there is difficulty upon the facts. But I cannot say that there was no evidence before Nov. 1, 1911. the Sheriff-substitute upon which he might reasonably find the facts as he did, and I therefore take his findings of fact as conclusive. But then it is a mixed question of fact and law whether the accident—supposing it to have happened as the Sheriff-substitute holds it did—is one that arose out of the workman's employment. As to that the case of *Kitchenham*¹ is, of course, of paramount authority, but the line of division between the two classes of case—those which fall within the rule of *Kitchenham*¹ and those which are outside it—is a fine one, and in this case I think there is some difficulty in applying the rule.

Millar v.
Refuge
Assurance
Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

The general rule, as stated by the Lord Chancellor, is that if an accident arises from a risk that is common to everyone and not specially connected with the work and employment of the person claiming compensation, then it cannot be said to have arisen out of his employment in the sense of the Act. And, accordingly, it is said that this tripping upon a stair is a thing which might happen to anybody who goes up and down a stair, and therefore is a risk which is not specially connected with the particular work of the respondent. I think there is force in that; but then, on the other hand, I think that a risk is specially connected with a man's employment if it is due to the particular place where his employment requires him to be at the time. I think Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton's illustrations of two kinds of case, in the opinion to which your Lordship has referred, bring that distinction out clearly enough. The learned Judge's opinion deals with two different cases which were decided at the same time. In each of these cases a sailor had been on shore with leave, and while returning to his ship fell into the water and was drowned. In one, that of Leach,¹ he had reached a gangway which was the means of access to his ship, and fell from that gangway into the water, and it was held that the accident arose out of the employment. In the other—*Kitchenham*¹—the man was shown to have been crossing the wharf, but it was not shown that he had reached the gangway, and if the accident was due to a slip on the wharf when the man might have been engaged in some purpose of his own, it was said that it was not caused by a danger incidental to his employment, because it was not proved that he was in the fulfilment of his employment when the accident happened. Then the learned Judge pointed out that it is not the duty of the Court to speculate as to these matters, but that the applicant must prove his case. But in the present case the accident was due to the means of access to a place where the man was bound to go in fulfilment of his employment. I have come to the conclusion, although not without difficulty, that we ought not to disturb the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, because there was evidence on which he might reasonably hold that the man was hurt in consequence of a risk specially connected with his employment, in respect that he was required by his employment to make use of the stair.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship, though I have great doubt in coming to the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence in the

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

Property—Common interest—Pro indiviso ownership—Division of property.

A division of heritable subjects proposed by one of three pro indiviso proprietors was resisted by the others on the ground that a bond, which had been granted by the co-proprietors, existed over the subjects, and that the bondholders refused to allocate it in the event of division. The bond contained a provision that £500 should be paid annually towards reduction of the principal sum, and that so long as the interest and this annual payment were made the bond should not be called up or repaid for five years, of which only one had expired.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Guthrie) that the pursuer was entitled to insist in her common law right to a division, in respect that it did not appear that a division would sacrifice the interests of any of the parties, and that, in entering into the bond, the co-proprietors could not be held to have bound themselves to refrain from resorting to a division during the subsistence of the bond.

Thom v. Macbeth, (1875) 3 R. 161, distinguished.

2D DIVISION. ON 16th December 1909 Mrs Margaret Hannah Kirk or Morrison Lord Guthrie. brought this action against Robert John Kirk and others for division or sale of certain heritable properties in Leith, of which the pursuer was pro indiviso proprietor to the extent of one-third, and the defenders to the extent of two-thirds.

The defenders opposed the division of the property, and averred;—
“At Whitsunday 1909 the sum of £22,000 was borrowed on the security of all the properties from the Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners, the debtors in the personal obligation in the bond being the pursuer and the said two defenders. It was made a condition of this loan that the loan was not to be called up or repaid prior to Whitsunday 1914, and this condition was confirmed in writing by a back-letter dated 15th May 1909, granted by the Clerk to the said Commissioners. It was a further condition of the loan, confirmed in the same way, that the sum in the bond should be reduced by the sum of £500 annually.” * This loan was, by arrangement between the

* The back-letter was in these terms:—“With reference to the settlement of this loan to-day, I have to explain that, notwithstanding the terms of the security-deed, the loan is not to be called up or repaid prior to Whitsunday 1914, provided that interest thereon at the rate of 3½ per cent, and the necessary fire insurance premiums are duly paid; and further, that

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer and defenders . . . being joint proprietors pro indiviso of the said subjects, the pursuer is entitled to insist in the present action against the defenders for division thereof.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer is barred by personal exception in respect of her actings set forth in the defences, from insisting in the present action in hoc statu. (2) In view of the bond over the subjects, and the agreement with regard thereto condescended on, division or sale of the subjects is presently impracticable. The action is premature and ought to be dismissed. (3) In respect that it is impossible or at least impracticable or otherwise would be injurious or prejudicial to the interests of the defenders to divide the properties in question into three equal shares, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusion for division of the subjects.

On 17th March 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) remitted to Mr Ormiston, land valuator, inter alia, “to examine the subjects libelled, and to report whether they are incapable of division among the pro indiviso proprietors thereof, and whether it is proper and necessary that they should be sold, with due regard to the interests of the parties.”

Mr Ormiston reported, inter alia ;—“(3) The total value of these subjects, in the opinion of the reporter, is Thirty-six thousand six hundred and forty-five pounds (£36,645), all as detailed in valuation. (4) That the subjects libelled are capable of division among the pro indiviso proprietors thereof. (5) That they can be divided among three proprietors in three nearly equal divisions, either by choice or by ballot, the one receiving the properties with the slightly larger values paying over the difference in money to those receiving the lesser valued lot. (6) That to attempt to sell the properties now would be greatly to the disadvantage of the estate.”

A correspondence was also lodged, from which it appeared that the Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners refused to allocate their bond on the three lots into which it was proposed to divide the property.

On 8th July 1910 the Lord Ordinary dismissed the action.*

a sum of £500 towards reduction of the principal sum is repaid annually, by instalments of £250 at each term of Whitsunday and Martinmas, during the continuance of the loan.”

* “OPINION.—In this case the pursuer proposes that certain properties in Leith, held pro indiviso by her and the defenders, should be divided. A remit was made to Mr Ormiston, ordained surveyor, to consider and report whether the properties are incapable of division among the pro indiviso proprietors thereof, and whether it is proper and necessary that they should be sold with due regard to the interests of the parties. Mr Ormiston reports in favour of division and against sale. Had I nothing to consider but his report I should find that the properties can be divided, and give effect to the division which he proposes. All parties agree in the fairness of the division proposed by him, and they also agree that to attempt to sell the properties at present would be to the serious disadvantage of the estate. Nobody proposes that I should order a sale; the question is whether I should order a division, in view of the bond for £22,000 in favour of the Morrison v.

Kirk.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 27th and 31st October 1911.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The pursuer was entitled as a matter of right to a division of the property¹ unless, owing to some special circumstance, division was impossible without prejudice to the rights and interests of parties.² No such circumstance had been averred. The existence of the bond was no obstacle, and would not affect the defenders' interest in case of division, for if the bondholders proceeded against any one of the three proprietors, that proprietor could get an assignation of the bondholders' rights against the other two.³

Argued for the respondents;—The special circumstances which, in the present case, made division inequitable were, in the first place, that the bondholders refused to allocate, and accordingly the market value of each lot would be diminished in consequence of its share of responsibility for the management of the other two. Further, there

Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners which was borrowed on the security of the properties at Whitsunday 1909. The Commissioners not unnaturally have declined to allow an allocation, and insist on the obligations, at present existing against the pursuer and defenders, remaining down to the expiry of the loan at Whitsunday 1914. The pursuer says that, notwithstanding, she is entitled to have a division of the properties. The defenders reply that division in these circumstances would lead to an inequitable interference with their rights, and therefore should be refused.

“In the leading case of Brock v. Hamilton (19 D. 701), Lord Rutherford observed:—‘He does not, however, think the pursuer bound to show equity for division or, where division is impossible, for sale. He considers the pursuer's right in that respect to be clear. But circumstances may easily exist in which the defender may show in equity a good defence against the demand for division or sale.’ His Lordship does not give any indication of what kind of circumstances would raise this equitable defence. But in the case of Thom v. Macbeth (3 R. 161), where it was found that division, although physically possible, would be inequitable—the estate was a feuing estate, and its full value could only be realised if it were feued as a whole—the three Judges referred to the kind of case in which this equitable consideration would arise. Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff said:—‘The deduction which I draw from the judgment of Lord Rutherford in the case of Brock is that, when division is not reasonably practicable without sacrificing to an appreciable extent the interests of some or of all the parties, the only resort is a sale and division of the price.’ Lord Ormidale referred to the case of Brock and the other cases of Anderson (19 D. 700) and Craig (1 Macph. 612), and said:—‘The expressions “impossible” or “impracticable” as used in these cases, clearly means impossible or impracticable, having a due regard to the just rights of all the co-proprietors.’ And, lastly, Lord Gifford said on page 165:—‘Considerations of expediency, of expense, and of deterioration cannot be left out of view, and, in most cases, it is just upon these considerations that the question depends whether a subject shall be specifically divided, or whether it shall be sold and the price distributed.’

“In this case Mr Wilson maintains that, looking to the interests of his clients, the defenders, the division proposed is not reasonably practicable, because it would prejudicially affect their legal rights. He pointed out that, at the present moment, although each of them is liable for the whole debt, nothing can be done without joint consent; each of them has full control was the burden of the payment of £500 a year, and the condition that the bond should not be paid up for five years, and it was an implied stipulation in the family arrangement at the time when the bond was granted that no separation of the property should be made so long as the bond remained unpaid. It was not argued that in every case a bond precluded division, but in view of these special circumstances, division in the present case could not be effected with due regard to the rights of parties.¹

Nov. 4, 1911.
Morrison v.
Kirk.

At advising on 4th November 1911,—

LORD SALVESSEN.—The pursuer and defenders in this case are pro indiviso proprietors of certain properties in Leith ; and the pursuer has brought this action for division of the properties ; or, if it should turn out that division is not practicable, to have the properties sold and the price divided. The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr Ormiston to examine the subjects libelled, and to report whether “they are incapable of division among the pro indiviso proprietors thereof, and whether it is proper and necessary that they should be sold with due regard to the interests of the parties.” Mr Ormiston accordingly presented a report, the substance of which is that “the properties can be divided among three proprietors in three nearly equal divisions, either by choice or by ballot, the one receiving the properties with the slightly larger values paying over the difference in money to those receiving the lesser valued lot.” He further reported that “to attempt to sell the properties now would be greatly to the disadvantage of the estate.” The parties were heard upon this report ; and the Lord Ordinary thereafter dismissed the action, thus in effect holding that the pursuer must remain for the present in communione with the defenders as proprietors of the common property.

In my opinion this judgment cannot stand. Unless a pro indiviso proprietor has barred himself by contract from resorting to an action of division or sale he has an absolute right at common law to insist in such an action. If it should turn out that division is impracticable, or would operate unfairly, then his remedy is to have the properties sold and the price divided. The defenders pleaded a family arrangement under which they say it was implied that none of the co-proprietors should resort to an action of this kind until at least the year 1914. Under this arrangement a loan of £22,000 was obtained in 1909 for five years over the whole properties, over the whole properties subject to the debt. If the proposal is carried out, and the property is divided, and the debt is left unallocated, then each of them will have full control over his own portion, but no control over the other two-thirds. In the parts of the properties not under their control dilapidation might take place ; the subjects might be applied to speculative and unremunerative purposes, and even such a matter as keeping up the fire insurance might, from inattention, not be looked after. In short, the defenders say that they would lose all control of the other parts of the property, a control which is in the market recognised as representing a valuable asset.

“It seems to me that, following the views which were given effect to in the case of Thom v. Macbeth, I am bound to hold that the division here, although physically practicable, is not reasonably practicable, with due regard to the interests of the parties, and in particular the interests of the defenders. I must therefore dismiss the summons.”

Nov. 4, 1911. on the footing that so long as the interest was punctually paid, and also an annual instalment of £500 in reduction of the principal, the loan should neither be called up nor paid up during that period. Under this arrangement one of the defenders factored the properties; but after a year's trial the pursuer complained of his failure to keep proper accounts; and he was superseded by a judicial factor appointed in the Bill-Chamber. This gentleman is now managing the properties, and of course charging for his services in doing so.

Morrison v.
Kirk.
Lord Salvesen.

In my opinion there is no relevant averment of any agreement by the pursuer that she should not resort to her common law rights as a pro indiviso proprietor. A division of the properties now cannot affect in any way the rights of the bondholders. All the properties will continue to be the subject of their security whether they form a common property or are divided among the owners. The personal obligation of the three borrowers will also be available to the bondholders. The Lord Ordinary seems to have taken the same view, because it is not on this ground that he has dismissed the action. He seems, however, to be apprehensive that if the subjects were divided one or other of the owners might allow dilapidation to take place, or apply the subjects to speculative and unremunerative purposes. That is a risk, however, which the pursuer runs just as much as the defenders; and it might be said in every case where there was a bond over undivided properties which could not be called up or paid up for a period of years. The risk besides does not appear to be a very real one, as it is of course in the interest of each proprietor to make the most out of his or her property. The matter of the fire insurance, I think, need scarcely be considered, because the bondholders will of course see to it that the premiums are duly paid. Considerations of this kind have never been regarded as sufficient to exclude the common law right to have the property divided; and the case of Thom v. Macbeth,¹ to which the Lord Ordinary refers, is no authority for such a view. There the estate was a feuing estate, the full value of which could only be realised if it were feued as a whole; and while division was refused as inequitable to some or all of the parties, the Court directed the property to be sold and the price divided. In the face of Mr Ormiston's report it would never do to resort to a sale of the properties, with which we are here dealing, in the present state of the property market; and the only alternative seems to be to grant the pursuer's demand for division.

The only point which at one time gave me a little concern has reference to the stipulation that a sum of £500 is to be repaid annually to the bondholders towards reduction of the principal sum half yearly. These instalments have hitherto been paid out of the surplus rents belonging to the whole proprietors pro indiviso; and it is conceivable that the pursuer might not contribute her proportion out of the property which was handed over to her on a division, with the result of endangering the continuance of the loan. I cannot think that there is very much substance in this objection. In the first place, the pursuer runs exactly the same risk as the defenders in this matter. Either or both of them might equally fail to contribute his proportion of each instalment. If so, however, any of the proprietors might Nov. 4, 1911.

pay up the balance, or leave the bondholders to take action against the proprietor who had failed to pay his or her proportion of the instalment due. Morrison v. Kirk.

It is scarcely to be assumed that the bondholders would act capriciously or inequitably in such a matter; or that if one proprietor paid up more than his share of an instalment he would not be entitled to a remedy against the defaulting proprietor quoad that proportion. At all events, I think it cannot be affirmed that division will sacrifice the interests of some or all of the parties, which was the ground on which it was refused in Thom's case.¹ I am therefore of opinion that we must recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and remit to him to give effect to the division which Mr Ormiston proposes. Lord Salvesen.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer here—I quote Lord Deas' language in the case of *Anderson*²—"seeks to enforce his common law rights, which entitle the pro indiviso proprietor to have the subject divided, and, if not divisible, to have it sold. The ordinary rule is that no man is bound to remain longer in communion than he pleases."
The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that, though the subjects are physically divisible, "the division proposed is not reasonably practicable"; but owing, as I gather, to some misapprehension, instead of pursuing this view to its logical conclusion by ordering sale, he dismissed the action. It appears to me that neither the considerations which the Lord Ordinary deals with, nor the further objections stated by the defenders' counsel at our bar, form any sufficient answer to the pursuer's demand for division. The grounds of my opinion are substantially these which have been so fully explained by my brother Lord Salvesen. I agree, therefore, that the interlocutor reclaimed against ought to be recalled, and the case sent back to the Outer House, in order that the subjects may be divided at the sight of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur. I do not think any grounds have been stated why this pro indiviso proprietor, who wishes the subjects divided, should not have them divided.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the said Lord Ordinary to give effect to the report by Mr William Ormiston, No. 9 of process, with due regard to the interests of the parties, and to proceed in the cause as accords: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remit the same," &c.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Negligence of original trustee—Action by assumed trustees—Alleged delay and contributory negligence of pursuers—Right to maintain action for behoof of beneficiaries—Mora—Personal Objection.

One of the original trustees acting under a trust-disposition and settlement died in 1887, and in the same year two new trustees were assumed, one of whom was also a beneficiary under the trust. In 1909 these new trustees, suing in their capacity as trustees, brought an action against the representatives of the deceased trustee for recovery of funds which they alleged had been lost to the trust-estate through his negligence. The defenders pleaded that the pursuers were barred by mora, and by the fact that they had themselves been guilty of negligence which had contributed to the loss.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that, assuming the truth of the allegations against the pursuers, they were still entitled to prosecute the action for behoof of the beneficiaries whom they represented.

Held further that, although one of the pursuers was a beneficiary under the trust, the question whether her rights as a beneficiary were excluded by her conduct as a trustee could not be decided in an action to which as an individual she was not a party.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mackenzie. ON 27th April 1909 William Schulze and Mrs Mary Lees or Schulze, his wife (trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Hugh Lees, writer, Galashiels), Mrs Schulze (as an individual), and Mrs Elizabeth Lees or Brown, brought an action against John Sanderson Dun and others, being beneficiaries, and the representatives and trustees of beneficiaries, in the estate of the deceased John Dun of Gilston. The summons concluded against the defenders jointly and severally, or to the extent to which each of the defenders was lucratus from John Dun's estate, for payment to Hugh Lees' trustees of the sum of £1040, with compound interest thereon from 31st May 1870.

Mr Hugh Lees died on 3rd December 1858, survived by his widow and by four children, Eleanor (who died in minority), Richard (who died in 1902 as aftermentioned), and the pursuers—Mrs Elizabeth Lees or Brown and Mrs Mary Lees or Schulze.

By his trust-disposition and settlement Mr Lees, inter alia, provided that upon his eldest child attaining the age of twenty-five, his trustees should realise his whole estate and divide it among his children equally, and that in the event (which happened) of his wife surviving him and being alive when his oldest child attained the age of twenty-five, his trustees should, previous to making the above division of the capital of his estate, provide for her "such free yearly income as my estate may appear to them to be able to afford." The testator further conferred on his son Richard, on attaining the age of twenty-five, the right of purchasing his dwelling-house in Abbotsford Road, at a price to be fixed by valuation, but under the obligation, if he bought it, of finding a suitable house for his mother and unmarried sisters if they did not live with him. The will further declared that "neither trustees, tutors, nor curators shall be liable in any way, excepting only for his own actual intromissions with the funds of my estate."

Nov. 4, 1911.

Lees' Trustees
v. Dun.

The following narrative of the circumstance which gave rise to the action is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie):— [After referring to the provision in the testator's will with regard to the purchase of the house in Abbotsford Road by his eldest son] "His eldest son Richard intimated to the trustees some time before attaining the age of twenty-five, which he did on 20th May 1870, that he wished to avail himself of this provision in his favour. The acting trustees at that date were Mrs Lees, the widow, Mr George Lees, Mr Robert Lees, Mr William Sanderson, and Mr John Dun. A meeting of the trustees was held on 26th April 1870, at which Mr Dun was not present. The trustees gave instructions that a valuation should be obtained of the house, and directed that, thereafter, a conveyance should be prepared in favour of Mr Richard Lees. The trustees further directed 'that the agents proceed to prepare states of their intromissions and of the funds of the estate for submission to a meeting of the trustees, preparatory to the period of division.'

"The agent who had been appointed by the trustees was Mr Stewart, the partner of the truster. When Richard Lees attained the age of twenty-one he had been assumed as a partner by Mr Stewart. Though never appointed as such, the firm thereafter acted as agents in the trust, and Richard Lees was regarded by trustees and beneficiaries alike as the agent who looked after the trust affairs.

"He was in 1870 engaged to be married to a lady in England, and he proposed to convey the Abbotsford Road house to the marriage-contract trustees. The English solicitors of the lady requested Messrs Fyfe, Miller, & Fyfe, S.S.C., Edinburgh, to attend to her interests. A valuation was got, and the price to be paid, after allowing a deduction, was £1040. On 25th May 1870 Richard Lees wrote to Mr Miller, S.S.C., asking him to get the draft disposition he enclosed extended, as he could not get a stamp of the necessary amount in Galashiels. Mr Miller had the deed extended on plain paper, and returned it saying they could get the stamp impressed afterwards. On 28th May 1870 Richard Lees wrote to the two trustees resident in Galashiels, and got them to sign the conveyance. His mother had signed it on the 26th, both as trustee and as a consenter. The present pursuer Mrs Schulze, a daughter, also signed as a consenter. On 28th May Richard Lees wrote the following letter to John Dun, who then resided at Eskbank:—'Will you oblige me by signing the enclosed conveyance by my father's trustees in my favour of the property in Abbotsford Road, and by sending it in the enclosed envelope to Messrs Fyfe, Miller, & Fyfe. I am in course of preparing states, &c., to be laid before a meeting of the trustees preparatory to a winding-up of the trust, but this is a deed that I require to have executed sooner.' Mr Dun signed the deed on the 31st. It does not appear what he did with it after signing, and, from a letter

Nov. 4, 1911. Lees' Trustees v. Dun. Richard Lees wrote on 31st May 1870 to Mr Miller, it is possible the former went to Eskbank and got it from Mr Dun. Mr Sanderson did not sign it. The disposition was recorded on 2nd June 1870, the warrant for registration being signed by Richard Lees. Thereafter the house was conveyed by Richard Lees to his marriage-contract trustees, who were infeft.

"The disposition bore that the price (which was therein erroneously stated to be £1060 instead of £1040) had been 'instantly paid.' Certain cross entries were made in Richard Lees' books at a much later date, but, in point of fact, the price was never paid or accounted for by Richard Lees to his father's testamentary trustees.

"Richard Lees died insolvent in November 1902. Mrs Hugh Lees, his mother, died on 27th April 1902. Mr John Dun died on 22nd October 1887.* Mr George Lees had died in 1879, Mr William Sanderson in 1880, and Mr Robert Lees in 1883. Mr and Mrs Schulze (the present pursuers) were assumed as trustees by an informal deed on 16th August, and by a formal deed on 25th November, 1887.

"In these circumstances, the pursuers sue John Dun's representatives for payment of £1040, the price of the house, with compound interest since 31st May 1870."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 8) "The late John Dun was guilty of gross negligence in delivering the said disposition in favour of Richard Lees, and enabling the said Richard Lees to record the same in the Register of Sasines, without obtaining payment of the price and without taking any precautions to secure that the said Richard Lees should pay the price and fulfil the conditions of his father's will thereanent. The disposition was sent to each of Hugh Lees' trustees in succession for signature. The last of the said Hugh Lees' trustees to sign the said disposition was the said John Dun, and it was he who, after it had been executed by himself, on the request and for behoof of the said Richard Lees, delivered it over to the agents of the said Richard Lees' marriage-contract trustees, to whom the said Richard Lees was to convey the property, without any price being paid by or on behalf of the said Richard Lees to the said Hugh Lees' trustees.

. . . It was the duty of the said John Dun to take precautions that the said Richard Lees should pay to the trustees the price or value of the property, in terms of the disposition, before delivery thereof was made to him or for his behoof. The said John Dun, however, entirely failed in this duty, and omitted all reasonable precautions to secure payment of the price or value. The said John Dun, neither at the time of delivering over the said disposition as aforesaid nor subsequent thereto, made any inquiries as to whether the price had been duly paid, nor took any other means to secure that payment of the price, which formed the consideration for granting the said disposition in favour of Richard Lees, had been or would be duly made by him to them. By his gross negligence in delivering the deed as aforesaid without obtaining payment and in omitting all reasonable inquiries and precautions as aforesaid, the said John Dun put it in the power of Richard Lees to make a fraudulent use of the said disposition, and, without having paid the stipulated price, or any part thereof, to record the said disposition in the Register of Sasines, to deal with the property thereby conveyed as his own, and to make an effective conveyance of the same to third parties as he did, all as above mentioned. The said John Dun ought to have retained the disposition in his own hands, or in the custody of the Hugh Lees' trust, or have put it in neutral custody, until the disponent Richard Lees had paid the price; but he negligently and carelessly omitted these and all other reasonable precautions which might have been taken to protect the interest of the trust-estate on which he was a trustee." Nov. 4, 1911.

Lees' Trustees
v. Dun.

The defenders lodged a statement of facts, in which they averred; —(Stat. 6) "For some time prior to the year 1887 the pursuers were suspicious of the actings of the said Richard Lees with regard to the trust, and in that year Mr and Mrs Schulze procured their own assumption as trustees for the special purpose of enabling them to make investigations into the position of the trust. With this object the pursuers employed a firm of law-agents in Edinburgh to press the said Richard Lees to render an account of his intromissions with the trust-estate, with the result that what purported to be an account of his intromissions to date was at length obtained in 1888. The said account credited the trust-estate with the price of the said Abbotsford Road property, under date 12th May 1882, and brought out a balance of £2143, 1s. 10d. at the credit of the trust-estate. The pursuers were aware that this sum was not represented by investments, and the pursuers Mr and Mrs Schulze were warned by the said agents as to their responsibility with regard thereto. Nevertheless, for private reasons of their own unconnected with the interests of the trust, they took no steps to have the trust-estate put upon a proper footing. They did not insist upon production of any trust securities, or on the amount admittedly due to the trust being paid over or invested, or security being given therefor. The pursuers further failed to intimate the state of affairs to the representatives of Mr Dun. If the trustees had at the time, as was their duty, taken proceedings against the said Richard Lees, or intimated his irregularities to Mr Dun's representatives so that the latter might have done so, it is believed and averred that the trust-estate could and would then have been fully vindicated, the financial position of the said Richard Lees being such that up till within a very short time before his death in 1902 he had ample credit and was in receipt of a large professional income. After obtaining the said account, the pursuers Mr and Mrs Schulze, and the testator's widow, nevertheless, in breach of their duty as trustees, allowed nearly fifteen years to elapse without taking any steps to recover the trust-estate. Ultimately, in the year 1902, they raised an action of count, reckoning, and payment against the said Richard Lees, but did not proceed with the same, and again allowed the matter to lapse. The pursuers Mr and Mrs Schulze were thus grossly negligent in the discharge of their duty as trustees, and their negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the loss alleged to have been sustained by the trust-estate." (Stat. 7) "The present claim which was first made against the defender John Sanderson Dun, by letter dated 5th December 1905, and which was then allowed to drop, has only now been advanced for the first time against the present defenders, some thirty-nine years after the date of the said disposition, and more than twenty years after the pursuers were in possession of the facts on which they now base their claim. All the parties to the said disposition, except the pursuer Mrs Schulze, are now long dead. No oral evidence as to the transactions which took place with regard to the acquisition of the said property by the said Richard Lees, and the application of the price thereof, is now available, and the documentary evidence is to a large extent no longer extant. Further, in consequence of the death of the said Richard Lees, insolvent, in 1902, not only was his evidence irretrievably lost, but the defenders' right of relief against him, which could have been made good had the present claim been substantiated in 1888, is now worthless, and the funds then held by him for Mrs Hugh Lees, which would have then been available pro rata for the relief of her co-trustees, are no longer extant."

In reply to the charges of negligence and delay on the part of the assumed trustees, the pursuers averred that Mrs Hugh Lees till her death in 1902, and the pursuers until 1904, never knew that the property had been alienated from the Hugh Lees' trust; that John Dun never informed the trustees that he had parted with the conveyance without obtaining payment; and that this fact only came to the knowledge of the pursuers in 1905, during the course of an action against Richard Lees' marriage-contract trustees.

The pursuers pleaded;—The pursuers having suffered the loss and damage claimed through the negligence and wrongful actings of the deceased John Dun, and the defenders being beneficiaries of the said deceased and lucrati as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers Mrs Schulze, as an individual, and Mrs Brown having no title to sue, the action, so far as laid at their instance, should be dismissed. (4) The pursuers are barred by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence from insisting in the present action. (5) Separatim, esto that the principal sum sued for was lost through the negligence of the trustees, the pursuers, or one or more of them, being parties to such negligence, are barred from insisting in the present proceedings. (7) The said John Dun not having himself intromitted with the said sum of £1040, the defenders are not liable to account therefor in respect of the immunity clause contained in the trust-disposition and settlement of the said deceased Hugh Lees. (10) Further, and in any event, the defenders are not liable in interest on the sum sued for prior to 27th April 1902, in respect that the interest prior to that date was applied to the purposes of the trust.

On 8th February 1910 the Lord Ordinary sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and allowed a proof before answer.

Proof was taken on 12th, 13th, and 14th July 1910. The import of the evidence, so far as relating to the averments of negligence on the part of Mr Dun, is contained in the narrative above stated, and in the opinions of the Court. With regard to the facts bearing on the defenders' plea of mora, it was held to be established that at or shortly after the date of their assumption in 1887, Mr and Mrs Schulze knew, or at least had the means of knowing, the facts necessary to enable them to sue the previous trustees for the price of the house; that they had no excuse for delaying to press this claim, and that if liability had been established against Mr Dun's representatives in 1887, or at any time down to 1902, the latter could have had recourse against Richard Lees, and could, in all probability, have succeeded in recovering the money from him. The details of the evidence are summarised in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of Lord Salvesen.

Lees' Trustees
v. Dun.

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative of facts quoted supra—It appears to me that, if the trustees and the representatives of those who had died had been sued within a reasonable time after the assumption of the present pursuers to make good the price to the trust-estate, there would have been liability. In the first place, the disposition was delivered without getting payment of the price, or setting against the price part of the residue to which Richard Lees was entitled. In the next place, from the date of the meeting on 26th April 1870 the trustees did nothing, so far as appears, to see whether the price had been paid by Richard Lees or not, until 14th December 1887. This is the date of the next minute of meeting of the trustees. There were present at that meeting Mrs Hugh Lees and Mr and Mrs Schulze.

"There was thus a failure on the part of Mr Dun to supervise the affairs of the trust. This would have involved a liability on his part. The assumed trustees could have sued him whenever the facts came to their knowledge. If they delayed to do so after they knew, and if their delay was to the prejudice of the defenders, the question is whether they are not now barred from insisting in the action.

"The legal principles applicable to such a case as the present appear to me to be stated in the case of the Assets Company, 6 F. 676. Lord Kyllachy, at p. 685, pointed out that a pursuer who has a cause of action, 'must bring his action within a reasonable time—at all event, must do so if delay is fitted to prejudice his opponent's position. The defence thus arising may be variously described. It may come under the head of mora or under the head of bar.' The Lord President (Kinross) said, at p. 705, it appeared to him that 'the plea of mora cannot be successfully maintained merely on account of the lapse of time, but that the person stating it must also be able to show that his position has been materially altered, or that he has been materially prejudiced, by the delay alleged . . . Where, coupled with lapse of time, there have been actings or conduct fitted to mislead, or to alter the position of the other party to the worse, the plea of mora may be sustained. But, in order to lead to such a plea receiving effect, there must, in my judgment, have been excessive or unreasonable delay in asserting a known right, coupled with a material alteration of circumstances to the detriment of the other party.' Lord Trayner, at p. 740, says that delay per se, short of prescription, does not bar a pursuer's claim; that to avail a defender the delay must be in prosecuting a claim known to the pursuer to exist; and that the delay must have been prejudicial to the defender in depriving him of evidence. It was natural in the Assets case to refer only to prejudice by loss of evidence, as the claim could only have been made against one party. Where, as here, the claim might have been made against a party who had a right of relief, it is obvious that prejudice would arise if, through the delay, the benefit of the right of recourse has been lost.

"On the assumption that Mr Dun and his representatives could have been made liable if an action had been brought in time, the question is whether the pursuers, who are trustees, can now maintain the action in face of the pleas of mora or personal bar. The defence may also be stated by saying that the facts involve an election on the part of the trustees to accept Richard Lees alone as the debtor to the trust. This, however, seems to me to impose an undue onus on the defenders. The defence is really founded on mora or bar. It is necessary to observe that the pursuers who remain in the case are trustees, not beneficiaries. Though Mrs Schulze is also a beneficiary, she sues as a trustee. The result of sustaining the defence

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th October 1911.

Argued for the pursuers;—That Mr Dun had acted negligently and in breach of trust was obvious and was scarcely disputed. To deliver the conveyance of the house to Richard Lees was an actual intromission with the trust-estate, and accordingly Mr Dun could not plead the immunity clause in the will.¹ The only question in the case was whether Mr and Mrs Schulze, as trustees, had been guilty of negligence on their part, and, if so, whether that afforded any defence to their claim against Mr Dun's representatives. The Schulzes, considering the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed, had not acted negligently, and in any event, they were protected by the immunity clause. They could not have sued Richard Lees, for ex hypothesi he had paid the price, which Dun had received, and for which Dun was the debtor to the trust. But even on the

would not necessarily mean loss to the trust-estate. If Mr and Mrs Schulze knew in 1887, when they were assumed as trustees, all the facts necessary to found a claim against Mr Dun or his representatives, if, through their delay, they are now barred from insisting in that claim, the result may be that it is they—the pursuers and not the defenders—who are the proper parties to restore the money to the trust-estate.

“ I think the facts establish that Mr and Mrs Schulze knew, at or shortly after the date of their assumption, the facts necessary to enable them to sue the previous trustees, including Mr Dun, for the price of the Abbotsford Road house. The disposition had been recorded in 1870 in the Register of Sasines. As pointed out by the Lord President in his opinion in the action against Richard Lees' marriage-contract trustees, knowledge of the contents of the disposition must therefore be imputed to them. It is not, however, necessary to found upon that, because it is evident from the terms of the correspondence which passed in 1886 and 1887 between Richard Lees and his mother and Mr Schulze that Mrs Lees and Mr and Mrs Schulze were then made aware that Richard Lees had got a disposition of the Abbotsford Road house, and that he had made it over to his marriage-contract trustees. In his letter of 4th October 1886 to his mother, Richard Lees calls it his house. On 14th October 1886 he writes that he had to send to Bristol for the extract of his father's will and the conveyance by the trustees to him of the Abbotsford Road property, which he says he acquired in May 1870 for £1060. At this time Mrs Lees was living in family with her daughter Mrs Schulze and her husband. Looking to the terms of the correspondence, it is impossible to believe that both the pursuers were not quite well aware at that time of the disposition of the house. On 26th October 1886 Mrs Lees pressed her son for a statement of her affairs. It appears from the letter of 1st November that both the will and the disposition had been sent by Richard Lees to his mother. The undated letter, No. 566 of process, from Mr Schulze to Richard Lees states that 'the deed' is returned (this must, I think, refer to the disposition), and he is asked what about providing a house for his mother. This is significant of the extent of Mr Schulze's knowledge, because under Hugh Lees' will the obligation on Richard Lees to provide a house for his mother only emerged if and when he took advantage of the clause in the will entitling him to acquire the Abbotsford Road house for himself. In his letter of 26th November Richard Lees, answering a question that had been put, informs his mother that the reason why the extract of his father's will is with the Bristol assumption that it was their duty to have raised the question before the death of Richard Lees, that was an irrelevant consideration in the present action. As assumed trustees they had no responsibility for the acts of their predecessors.¹ Conversely their negligence could not affect the liability of the previous trustee for a breach of trust as in a question with the beneficiaries.² The present action must be regarded as if it were an action by a judicial factor on Mr Hugh Lees' trust-estate. In this light it was clearly immaterial, in considering the defenders' responsibility, whether or not the Schulzes were also to blame in neglecting to take action against Richard Lees. It was equally irrelevant to consider whether the Schulzes had unduly delayed to press the claim against Mr Dun. This—the foundation of the plea of mora, upon which the Lord Ordinary had decided the case—might be important in a claim of relief by the defenders against the pursuers, but it was out of place in the present action. solicitors is that it forms part of the titles to the property in Abbotsford Road which belongs to his marriage-contract trustees. I believe that Mr Schulze as well as his wife at the time knew the facts contained in these letters.

"On 14th September 1887 Mr Schulze wrote pressing Richard Lees for trust accounts, which he says must be made up not later than within eight days. On 26th October Mr Schulze consulted Mr Thornton, solicitor, Dundee, how he is to compel Richard Lees to render accounts. In that letter he refers to the fact that Richard Lees availed himself, the very day he became twenty-five years of age, of the advantage he had under his father's will of acquiring the dwelling-house. Mr Schulze in the witness-box could give no satisfactory explanation of how he had got this information. How untrustworthy the account of the pursuers is of this matter is shown by their statements on record, cond. 5 :—'Mrs Hugh Lees and Miss Mary Lees had no knowledge that the transaction had ever been completed. They did not know the purport of the said disposition, and continued in the belief, until the death of Richard Lees, that the house belonged to the Hugh Lees' trust.' Answer to stat. 7—'Mrs Hugh Lees, until her death in April 1902, and the pursuers, until immediately prior to the raising of the said action against the marriage-contract trustees, believed that the said property had never been alienated from the Hugh Lees' trust.' These statements are entirely negatived by the evidence.

"Mr Schulze thereafter consulted Mr Prosser, W.S. In his letter of 10th November 1887 he says that until lately he did not know that Richard Lees had acquired the dwelling-house under the will. Notwithstanding this, in the first letter he wrote to John Dun making a claim, on 5th December 1905, he says that down to the end of 1902 he considered the house belonged to Hugh Lees' trust. Not only did he know in 1887 that Richard Lees had acquired the house, but he also knew that the house had subsequently been made over, as Mr Schulze puts it in his letter to Mr Prosser of 10th December 1887, to Richard Lees' wife by his marriage-contract. His opinion, further, was, as expressed in the same letter, that Richard Lees had not paid for it, and this opinion was shared by Mrs Lees.

"He now admits that the trust accounts which were rendered in 1888 prove that Richard Lees never paid the price. He further admits that he knew when he got these accounts that the trust funds were uninvested. Down to 1889 he was making repeated efforts to get Richard Lees to account. There was then a cessation of his attempts down to 1902.

"There can be no doubt that the reason why, during all these years, event, the facts did not support the plea of mora. The defenders' obligation to account was not extinguished by the mere lapse of time,¹ and there was nothing to suggest that it had ever been discharged otherwise. The defenders had not shown that their position had been prejudiced by loss of evidence or otherwise. It was very unlikely that Richard Lees could have found the money even if he had been pressed for it. The pursuers had no duty to intimate to Dun his own breach of duty, and he knew the facts better than they did. Although by inquiry the pursuers might have ascertained in 1887 their right to sue Dun, in fact they did not learn of it till 1905. Thus any failure on their part to prosecute this claim did not avail the defenders, since it was not failure to prosecute a known claim.² The pursuers were entitled to sue Dun's representatives without calling the representatives of the other trustees.³ The effect of Mrs Schulze's conduct as trustee in barring her as an individual beneficiary from

Mr Schulze acquiesced in the state of matters was because his co-trustee Mrs Lees would not allow her son to be sued. Immediately upon her death an action was launched. This was not proceeded with, as Richard Lees became bankrupt and died. Mr and Mrs Schulze then brought an unsuccessful action against Richard Lees' marriage-contract trustees. No claim was intimated against Dun's trustees until 1905, and the present action was not raised until 1909. It is therefore established in this case that there was, to quote again the opinion of the Lord President in the Assets case, an 'excessive or unreasonable delay in asserting a known right.'

"The next question is whether this delay prejudiced the position of the present defenders. I am of opinion that it did. The assumed trustees neither sued Richard Lees, nor did they intimate to Dun's representatives that there was a claim against them. If liability had been established against Dun's representatives in 1887, or at any time down to 1902, they would have had recourse against Richard Lees. The pursuers say that they could not have recovered from Richard Lees. The onus is upon them to show this. He was outwardly solvent for fifteen years after 1887. During that period he was carrying on what is described as a good business as a solicitor in Galashiels with an average annual professional income of £1484, which, in the year preceding his death, rose to £2800. His life was insured for considerable amounts, and down to 1896 the policies had not been assigned in security of loans. Mr Rutherford, who knew him well, gave evidence that he had not the least doubt, if the claim had been pressed against him, the trust-estate would have been vindicated. In confirmation of this view, it is proved that a claim for £500 was made and met in 1900, and a sum of £1000 was found by Richard Lees in July 1902 to meet a claim by a body of trustees. The evidence of the other witnesses for the defence corroborates the view expressed by Mr Rutherford. By the end of 1902 Richard Lees had become insolvent and died. There was by that time a material alteration of circumstances to the detriment of the defenders. In these circumstances, the elements necessary to sustain a plea of mora or personal bar are, to my mind, present in this case.

"The pursuers attempt, however, to avoid the plea of mora and personal bar by averring that there are grounds for holding there was special negligence on the part of Mr Dun. They say he was the last trustee to claiming any part of the sum sued for, could not be considered in Nov. 4, 1911. this action. If it were held that the pursuers were barred from suing these defenders, the beneficiaries would be left without any remedy, ^{Lees' Trustees} _{v. Dun.} for, under the well-established rule that a beneficiary could not sue a debtor to the trust, the pursuers were the only persons who could prosecute the claim. Decree should be granted for the price of the house, with compound interest from the date on which the conveyance was signed.

Argued for the defenders;—Prima facie there was no negligence in a trustee handing a completed conveyance to the partner of the agent of the trust without actually seeing the cash paid. In any event, the Schulzes were not the persons entitled to call the defenders to account. They themselves had been guilty of negligence which had contributed to the loss, and of unjustifiable delay in suing Mr Dun's representatives—for the defence could be stated in either sign the disposition, and that it was he who delivered it without seeing that the price was paid. These acts, according to Mr Schulze, were only discovered by him in the course of the action against Richard Lees' marriage-contract trustees. As regards the delivery by Mr Dun, I do not think it is proved that he did deliver the disposition to Messrs Fyfe, Miller, & Fyfe. The letter written by Richard Lees on 31st May 1870 leaves this in doubt. Even if Mr Dun did, the purpose was that the deed might be properly stamped. It was Richard Lees who put on the warrant for registration, and it does not seem of importance whether the deed passed through the hands of Messrs Fyfe, Miller, & Fyfe or not. It is said that Mr Dun was the last trustee to sign. In the view I take this is not material to the issue; if it is, then it could have been ascertained by Mr and Mrs Schulze in 1887. The disposition had been recorded. The fact is that the incident of Mr Dun having been the last to sign does not affect his liability. What does affect it is the fact that the disposition was delivered without getting payment of the price, and also the failure to supervise the trust thereafter. It was suggested that there was no need to intimate to Dun, because he knew what he had done in 1870. He did not, however, know that advantage had been taken of this by Richard Lees to defraud the trust. Mr Dun died in 1887, and his trust was wound up by 1898. His son, who was examined as a witness, did not even know that his father had been one of Hugh Lees' trustees. One argument which was urged on behalf of the pursuers has a certain amount of force, viz., that there were no trust funds in 1887, and that Mr Schulze was not bound to vindicate the trust-estate at his own expense. This made it all the more necessary that Dun's representatives should get notice of the claim. They would then have been in a position to judge whether proceedings should have been taken against Richard Lees.

"There are circumstances in the case which make it by no means certain that Mr Dun would have withheld the disposition from Richard Lees even if he had been told that there was not to be an immediate settlement of the price. Both the minute of 26th April 1870 and the letter of 28th May 1870, already referred to, indicated that states were being prepared with a view to winding-up the trust. Richard Lees was entitled to one-third of the residue of his father's estate, or about £1700. I do not think the pursuers have proved that by 1870 he had got payment of more than £500. I cannot regard the earlier payments as having been made to account of his share of residue. The trustees could not have debited him with these payments, unless they had first come to the conclusion that the annual produce of the trust-estate paid to the widow under the second purpose of the settlement was inadequate for the maintenance, education, and upbringing of the children. There is no evidence they ever did so.

way. Their negligence consisted in failing to call Richard Lees to account between 1887 and 1902, when, as the evidence showed, he could have found the money if he had been pressed for it. The delay which barred them from now suing the defenders was their failure to call them to account, whereby not only did the defenders lose their chance of recourse against Richard Lees, but also there was a strong probability of evidence having been lost¹—such as evidence of an agreement between the beneficiaries and Richard Lees—which would have shown that the claim against him had been abandoned or discharged. In the circumstances such abandonment or discharge might be inferred, to the effect of enabling the plea of mora to be sustained.² The pursuers must be presumed to have known from 1887 onwards that Mr Dun and his fellow trustees were to blame in not having secured the price of the house—and in fact they did know it. Even though the pursuers' fault might not be a good defence to the defenders in a question between the defenders and the beneficiaries, it was a sufficient defence in the present action. The assumed trustees were bound to give an account of the intromissions of their predecessors, and from their delay it was to be inferred that they had abandoned or discharged the claim against the defenders—an abandonment or discharge which was binding on the beneficiaries whom they represented.³ While one only of a defaulting body of trustees might be singled out for attack, that did not affect the right of relief of the trustees inter se.⁴ The pursuers got no protec-

These payments were not so treated in the accounts. Mr Dun could therefore have pleaded in justification of what he did in 1870, that sufficient residue belonging to Richard remained in the trustees' hands to set off against the price of the house. Another point is that it appears, from the opinion of Mr (afterwards Lord) Shand given in 1870, that Richard Lees had a claim against the trustees for £1908, profits of the law business which had been credited to the trust, but which should have been credited to him. It was contended on behalf of the defenders that it was not proved that Mr Dun knew of the existence of this claim. After such a lapse of time, however, it cannot be assumed in favour of the pursuers that he did not know of it. I do not think it necessary to go into the merits of the claim, and mention it merely as an element which might have affected Mr Dun in delivering the deed.

"It appears to me that there is no separate ground of action against the defenders founded on any special negligence on Mr Dun's part. His negligence was the same as that of the other trustees, and consisted in allowing Richard Lees to get the disposition and then not taking steps to see that the price was paid or accounted for. This ground of liability, for the reasons already stated, is met by the defenders' plea of mora or personal bar.

"I am of opinion that the defenders' fourth plea in law should be sustained, and that they should be assoilzied with expenses."

 wholly barred from claiming against the defenders. This did not mean that the beneficiaries were left without a remedy. This was ^{Lees' Trustees} one of the cases in which the beneficiaries had a direct right of _{v. Dun.} action against the debtor to the trust.² Even if they had not such a right, they had a direct right of action against the present trustees as the persons whose negligence in failing to sue Richard Lees was the proximate cause of the loss. In any event, Mrs Schulze's conduct as a trustee barred her from making any claim as a beneficiary, and effect could be given to this plea in the present action, even though she was not pursuing as an individual.³ There was no justification for the claim for compound interest. In any event, interest should not be charged except from the date of Mrs Lees' death, for up to that date all the income from the trust-estate had been accounted for to her.

At advising on 4th November 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The Lord Ordinary's careful and elaborate opinion sets out so clearly the general outlines of this case and the salient facts with which it is concerned that it is unnecessary to repeat or even summarise them. I agree with his Lordship's conclusion (and indeed it was scarcely disputed by the defenders' counsel) that the evidence establishes that there was such failure on the part of the late Mr Dun to supervise the affairs of the trust as to involve liability against him if a timeous demand for reparation had been made by persons entitled to make it. I should also be disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary (if it were necessary to do so) in holding that no separate ground of action against Mr Dun or his representatives is disclosed, founded upon any special negligence on his part, as distinguishing his liability from that of his co-trustees. But the Lord Ordinary has sustained the defenders' plea that "the pursuers are barred by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence from insisting in the present action," and has assoilzied them upon this ground. I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary upon this vital point.

The pursuers are the assumed trustees acting in the trust. Even upon the hypothesis that they have been guilty of negligence in not taking due steps to have the loss to the trust-estate made good, or that it was owing to their action or want of action that that loss ceased to be merely potential and became an actual fact, I do not see how this should result in absolving the defenders. The consequence would, in my judgment, rather be that the pursuers, as well as Mr Dun and his co-trustees, would be involved in joint and several liability to make good the loss to the trust-estate, although practical effect could not be given to this conclusion in the present action.
 It seems to me that the pursuers, as the acting trustees, are the proper persons, and indeed primarily the only persons, entitled to call the defenders to account. If the pursuers had refused to do so, or to lend their instance (upon due security as to expenses), it might have been open to beneficiaries to sue such an action; but that is not the case here; nor can I see that the Lees' Trustees pursuers to be well founded, is at all analogous to that which I have figured.

v. Dun. It follows, in my opinion, that many of the considerations which were Lord Dundas. anxiously canvassed at our bar are irrelevant. I should (as at present advised) be prepared, if it were necessary, to agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding, upon the evidence before us, that the pursuers (contrary to their record) "knew at, or shortly after, the date of their assumption, the facts necessary to enable them to sue the previous trustees, including Mr Dun, for the price of the Abbotsford Road house"; and also that they could have recovered the money from Richard Lees, if due pressure had been applied, in 1887, or at any time during a good many years subsequent to that date.
But these are not, to my mind, matters relevant for consideration or decision in the present action. In the same way we are, I think, absolved from the necessity of forming or expressing any opinions upon a number of interesting and perhaps difficult topics on which arguments were submitted by counsel, e.g., as to the precise nature of the elements necessary to the success of a plea of mora and taciturnity; whether or not the knowledge by a pursuer of his claim must be knowledge in fact as well as in law; how far such a plea can be available to a trustee or executor in a case of this sort; and whether (as was contended) the immunity clause in the truster's settlement would be sufficient to protect the present pursuers, assuming them to have failed in due supervision of the affairs of the trust. It appears to me that none of these considerations have any place in this action. The pursuers are, as I think, entitled to call the defenders to account, even if they themselves may be also accountable; and there is really no defence here upon the merits of the case, which the Lord Ordinary would have decided adversely to the defenders apart from the plea of bar. In my judgment, therefore, though the case may be a very hard one for the defenders, decree must go out against them . . . for the capital sum sued for.

As regards interest, the pursuers' claim for compound interest seems scarcely stateable, and was not much insisted on by counsel. I think that, looking to the facts disclosed in the proof, it will be sufficient if we decern for payment of simple interest as from 27th April 1902, the date of Mrs Hugh Lees' death. The pursuers' counsel asked that the rate should be five per centum per annum, and nothing was said to the contrary during the discussion at our bar. But if this was an omission due to some misapprehension (as I think it must have been), counsel will have an opportunity of mentioning the matter before judgment is pronounced.

It is important to add in conclusion—what indeed was frankly conceded by the pursuers' counsel—that our decision in this case will in no way affect any rights of relief which the defenders may be able to instruct outside this action against the former trustees (other than Mr Dun) or their representatives, or any of them, or against the assumed trustees, or against the representatives of the late law-agent of the trust, or otherwise.

LORD SALVESEN.—The first question in this case is whether the late John Dun incurred personal liability as a trustee on the estate of the late Hugh Lees, and on this question I am so entirely in accord with the Lordordinary, and with his statement of the facts, that I deem it unnecessary to go into any detail. It is difficult to conceive a more serious violation of duty Nov. 4, 1911.

than for a body of trustees to sign a disposition of a heritable property Lees' Trustees belonging to the trust and to deliver it to the purchaser without payment v. Dun.
of the price, and without ascertaining during the course of seventeen years Lord Salvesen.
whether the price had ever been accounted for to the trust or remained in the hands of the purchaser. It is no doubt true, as the Lord Ordinary points out, that the fact that Richard Lees was a beneficiary on his father's trust, and was also the agent of the trustees, might justify the delivery to him of the disposition without demanding instant payment of the price; but there can be no excuse for a body of trustees handing over the whole trust funds to the agent or permitting them to be uplifted by him without seeing that any part of them was properly invested. It appears that for seventeen years the trustees, of whom the late John Dun was one, never attended a trust meeting, and never took any steps to have the trust funds transferred to their names. In short, they appear to have delegated their whole duties to Richard Lees, in whose hands they had already placed the complete control of the entire capital of the trust. In these circumstances it is plain that they are not protected by the immunity clause, which is in this case expressed in the barest form: "Declaring that neither trustees, tutors, nor curators shall be liable in any way excepting only for his own actual intromissions with the funds of my estate." I adopt on this matter the opinion of Lord Davey in the case of Ferguson v. Paterson,¹ "Where trustees" (he says) "give a joint receipt for trust money, though it is, in fact, received by the hand of an agent, it is the intromission of the trustees themselves." And again: "If trustees think fit to delegate their duties to their law-agent in a matter in which they cannot properly authorise him to act for them . . . they are not, in my opinion, protected by a clause of immunity from liability for the intromissions of factors or agents." These observations were made in a case where the fault of the trustees was absolutely venial, as compared with that to which John Dun was a party as a trustee of the late Hugh Lees. Had, therefore, the action been raised shortly after John Dun's resignation of his office of trustee, I cannot doubt that he would have been found liable to restore to the trust the price of the house, the conveyance of which he was the last to sign, leaving him to operate such relief as he could against Richard Lees, who still remained the debtor to the trust for the entire price.

The next question is, whether what happened during the administration of the present trustees has freed the defenders from the responsibility which would otherwise have attached to them. The Lord Ordinary has sustained the fourth plea in law, and has accordingly held that the pursuers are barred by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence from insisting in the present action.
In dealing with this plea it is necessary to summarise the facts as I hold them proved, although I do not materially differ from the Lord Ordinary in his statement of them. The pursuers were assumed as trustees in the end of 1887, and at once took steps to ascertain the position of the trust.
They ascertained, at all events by 1889, that the whole of the trust funds, including the price of the house conveyed in 1870, remained uninvested,

Nov. 4, 1911. and were in the hands of Richard Lees, and they were informed by him
Lees' Trustees that the house had been shortly thereafter transferred to his marriage-contract
v. Dun. trustees. They were advised by Mr Prosser that it was their duty to call LordS Ivesen. Richard Lees to account, and to invest in proper trust investments the sums that he was owing to the trust. They did not, however, take any action against him until 1902, and the action then taken proved abortive, as Richard Lees shortly thereafter died, leaving his affairs in a state of hopeless insolvency. I further agree with the Lord Ordinary that their inaction is to be explained by the fact that Mrs Hugh Lees remained a trustee until 1902, and would not allow her son to be sued. Had this difficulty been overcome, and drastic steps been taken against Richard Lees, I think it probable that he would have been able to raise sufficient money to meet his indebtedness to his father's trust.

On the other hand, it is fair to say that the position of Mr and Mrs Schulze, when they were assumed into the trust, was an extremely difficult and invidious one. No funds of any kind were transferred to them by their predecessors, nor were there any invested in the names of the trustees. They would therefore have had to litigate at their own personal risk. Moreover, it is plain that they could not have sued Richard Lees without creating a breach between them and Mrs Schulze's nearest relatives. Further, Richard Lees was at that time in good credit, and was conducting a large and prosperous business as a country solicitor. No doubt Mr Schulze had reason to believe that Richard Lees, for all his seeming prosperity, had difficulty in meeting his obligations, and he says that he was all along afraid that if he had raised an action against his brother-in-law, it would probably have resulted in the latter's bankruptcy. Perhaps, notwithstanding, it was the duty of the pursuers to have sacrificed their family ties, and by taking judicial proceedings against Richard Lees, to have put the administration of the trust beyond cavil. It may also be that their failure to take such proceedings constituted negligence, for which they may be answerable to the beneficiaries ; but we are not here concerned with any question between the beneficiaries and the pursuers, but only with the question whether their negligence as trustees is sufficient to relieve the defenders of the consequences of their author's breach of trust as in a question with the beneficiaries whom the pursuers represent. This is an aspect of the case that the Lord Ordinary does not appear to have considered, although I humbly think that it is decisive of the case.

Had the pursuers been the sole beneficiaries as well as the trustees, there would have been a stronger case for the application of the doctrine of mora and taciturnity. Even on this assumption, however, there are two matters to which the Lord Ordinary has not, in my opinion, given due weight. The first is, as Lord Cowan expressed it, that in order to sustain a plea of mora and taciturnity "there must not only be the mere lapse of time, but the whole circumstances must be such as are consistent with a presumption of the claim having been fully satisfied or settled and abandoned as no longer due."¹ Here there is no suggestion that the price of the property was ever paid to the trustees by Richard Lees. On the contrary, it is admitted that Nov. 4, 1911. it was allowed to remain in his hands ; and there is nothing to suggest that ^{Lees' Trustees} the pursuers either discharged Richard Lees or the defenders of their ^{v. Dun.} indebtedness to the trust. But then it is further said that as the result of ^{Lord Salvesen.} the pursuers' inaction during this period of thirteen years the defenders have been prejudiced by losing their right of relief against Richard Lees ; and on the assumptions of fact on which the Lord Ordinary proceeds, this may be said to be established ; but it by no means follows that this kind of prejudice can be founded on by the person who was directly responsible for the act of maladministration which ultimately resulted in the loss to the trust-estate. The case for the defenders would have been just as strong had Lees died ten years earlier, for there would have been some three years in which the pursuers might have made good their claim against him. In my opinion, unless it can be alleged that it was the duty of the pursuers, as in a question with John Dun and his representatives, to have intimated their claim against him as soon as they were in a position to ascertain the facts, no plea of personal bar can be maintained. For seventeen years Mr Dun had neglected the very duty which it is said that the pursuers on their assumption as trustees ought instantly to have discharged. He was, or must be presumed to have been, aware that the heritable property of the trust had been conveyed to one of the beneficiaries without any price being paid, and yet he never took any steps to restore the trust against the loss to which he had exposed it. It is said that after he resigned office he was not in a position to take steps to recover the price from Richard Lees. This is true in the sense that he could not have sued Richard Lees for the price ; but he was not therefore entirely without a remedy. He could have called upon his successors to sue for the price ; and if he had restored the money to the estate they could not have refused him an assignation which would have enabled him to proceed directly against Richard Lees. Even if he had been in the position of a cautioner for Richard Lees, the failure of the pursuers to proceed against the principal would admittedly not have relieved him from responsibility ; for the pursuers never gave Richard Lees time nor acted in such a way as to relieve a cautioner of liability. I cannot conceive that the position of a co-obligant, which was in effect that of Mr Dun, can be more favourable than that of a cautioner. If there are two or more obligants bound for a debt, the delay of the creditor to sue one of them may result in the other having to meet the whole debt ; but I never heard it suggested that such delay had the effect of extinguishing the debt. The pursuers undoubtedly had a direct right of action against Richard Lees, as being in possession of trust-estate, to account for what he had in his hands, and they had also a concurrent right against the trustee who had so intromitted with the estate as to put it entirely beyond his own control ; but the latter had no need to be informed of the facts, for he knew them better than his successors in office ; and the defenders cannot found upon their own ignorance when they are asked to make good the liability which their ancestor had incurred.

The next point on which I do not agree with the Lord Ordinary is in his view that the right of action which the pursuers possessed against the present defenders was a known right. It may be conceded that in 1889

Nov. 4, 1911. they had the means of ascertaining just as readily as in 1909, when the present action was brought, the facts upon which their claim is based, and that all the material facts were already within their knowledge. On the other hand, I think it is plain that the idea of suing Mr Dun's representatives never occurred to Mr Schulze until after he had raised the unsuccessful action against the marriage-contract trustees, when the true nature of his remedy was suggested by the Court. Where a discharge or abandonment is to be presumed from mere silence, there must, I think, in the ordinary case be "actual" and not merely "imputed" knowledge. A man cannot be presumed to discharge or abandon a claim which he did not know existed, even where it may be said that he could easily have ascertained what his rights were on inquiry. The presumption which arises from mora and taciturnity is a presumption of fact and not a presumption of law. On these several grounds I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has erred in sustaining the fourth plea in law.

Lees' Trustees
v. Dun.

Lord Salvesen.

Even on the assumption that the plea of mora would have been well founded against the pursuers had they been the sole beneficiaries in the trust, it does not follow that the present claim is excluded. The defenders boldly maintained that as the administration of the trust was vested in the pursuers, their implied discharge or abandonment of the claim against the defenders is binding on the beneficiaries. No authorities were cited in support of this proposition except two—Somerville v. Wemess,¹ and Pearson.² These cases appear to me to have no application. They merely decided that the existing trustees are liable to render an account, not merely of their own intromissions, but of the intromissions of their predecessors as in a question with a beneficiary. They did not establish that the liability of one set of trustees to the trust arising from maladministration may be sopited or extinguished by the similar maladministration of their successors in office. Even if the pursuers here had given John Dun a formal discharge of the claim which is now made, such a discharge, being without consideration, would not have been binding upon the trust-estate. This was expressly decided in the case of Smith.³ The present action is not at the instance of the pursuers as individuals, for it has been dismissed so far as it was brought at the instance of individuals on the ground of no title. It is brought by them as administrators of the trust-estate, to recover trust funds which, but for the negligence of the previous trustees, would now have been in the pursuers' possession. It might equally well have been brought at the instance of a judicial factor who had superseded the pursuers, and I can see no reason for holding that an action at the instance of such a factor would have been excluded because of the intervening negligence of the trustees whom he superseded. There is no case where this point has been fully considered, but in *Thomson v. Christie*⁴ the point might equally well have been raised, and indeed was argued in the Outer House. The charge against Thomson, the trustee there, was that, having in 1829 sold property belonging to the trust to a Mr Alison, he conveyed the property to the purchaser without enforcing a condition in the articles of roup that caution should be found for the price within twenty-one days, Nov. 4, 1911. and thereafter allowing the price to remain in the hands of the purchaser until it was lost by his bankruptcy in 1837. It appears that Thomson died in 1831, and that a judicial factor (Mr Grieve) was appointed on the estate in 1834. Mr Grieve apparently made no attempt to recover the amount due by Alison prior to the latter's bankruptcy in 1837. The Lord Ordinary in his opinion says: "The main defence, however, which the defender pleads is that in point of fact no loss arose from anything done by her father previous to his death in 1831. Mr Alison was then solvent, and continued solvent until towards the end of the year 1837. She even carries her argument so far as to maintain that the loss has arisen from misconduct on the part of Mr Grieve, who was appointed judicial factor in 1834." The Lord Ordinary did not find it necessary to dispose of this plea, as he absconded the trustee, but his decision was reversed by the First Division, whose judgment was affirmed on appeal by the House of Lords.¹ The contention which the Lord Ordinary characterised as the main defence was either not repeated before the Inner House, or it was disregarded as entirely unsound. The facts of that case bear a somewhat striking similarity to the present, except that the interval of time during which the judicial factor was in the saddle before the debtor's bankruptcy was only three years instead of thirteen, but there would have been ample time during that period to have taken steps for recovery of the debt. It may be that Mr and Mrs Schulze have incurred a joint liability because of their failure to take steps against Richard Lees. On this matter I pronounce no opinion, but I cannot see that it affords any defence against a claim by the beneficiaries whose rights are being maintained, and can only be maintained, by the trustees now in office.

It was further argued that in any case Mrs Schulze's rights as a beneficiary are excluded by her conduct as a trustee. That is a matter which we cannot decide in the present action. Apart from the fact that she is not before us in her character as an individual, there are no materials to enable us to estimate with any accuracy the extent of her interest in the trust-estate. The case of *Raes v. Meek*² was cited in support of the view that the Court may deal with the individual rights of trustees in an action which is directed against them in their representative capacity. I do not think that that is the true effect of the judgment. In that case Mr and Mrs Rae had been parties qua trustees to an act of maladministration in respect of which a decree for damages was given against Mr Meek. The only interest that the pursuer of the action had was to get the money that had been lost to the trust-estate restored, so that it would be available on the death of Mr and Mrs Rae, who were entitled to the income. The only way in which this could be effectively done was by ordaining Mr Meek to consign the fund; and it was only proper that as in a question with the pursuer the interest derived from the investment of Mr Meek's money should be appointed to be paid over to him during the joint lives of Mr and Mrs Rae.

The only other question is as to whether the pursuers are entitled to interest upon the sum sued for after deducting from that sum the amount

Nov. 4, 1911. recovered from Richard Lees' estate. The claim for compound interest is, in my opinion, not stateable, and we were not referred to any case where compound interest had been given. As regards the claim for simple interest, it must be kept in view that Mrs Lees was entitled to "such free yearly annuity as my estate may appear to them [that is, the trustees] to be able to afford." Under this clause the trustees were entitled to have given her the free income of the whole estate; and although they passed no formal resolution on the subject, what they did was to distribute only a part of the estate, and to leave the remainder in the hands of Richard Lees, who regularly paid his mother a sum of £100 per annum, besides allowing her during the greater part of the time to occupy the house the price of which is here sued for. There is no suggestion that the other beneficiaries ever claimed any part of the income while their mother was alive; and I think it was the understanding of all parties that the estate in Richard Lees' hands was no more than sufficient to yield his mother a suitable annuity. As from Mrs Lees' death, however, the defenders cannot resist the payment of some interest.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had an opportunity of considering this case along with your Lordships, and your Lordships have so fully and clearly expressed the grounds of judgment that it is unnecessary for me to add anything.

Parties were then heard on the question of the rate of interest to be charged.

Argued for the defenders;—Penal interest at the rate of 5 per cent was only exacted when there was proof that trustees had committed fraud or had appropriated trust money to their own use. Otherwise, and in circumstances such as the present, the rule was that the trustee was only bound to pay what the money would have earned had it been invested at the legal rate of interest, which between the years 1902 to 1911 averaged $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.¹

Argued for the pursuers;—The defenders were bound to pay penal interest at the rate of 5 per cent. Since 1902 the money in question had been in their possession and at their disposal.²

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the . . . interlocutor reclaimed against: Decern against the defenders . . . jointly and severally, but that only to the extent to which each of the said individual defenders and the other defenders, as trustees, are lucrati from the estate of the late John Dun of Gilston, for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1040, with interest thereon at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per centum per annum from 27th April 1902—the date of the death of Mrs Helen Maxwell or Lees, widow of the deceased Hugh Lees, writer, Galashiels . . . Find the pursuers entitled to expenses, and remit the same," &c.

Reparation—Negligence—Public Hospital—Unskilful treatment of patient—Responsibility of governing body—Contract.

Foot v.
Directors of Greenock
Hospital.

Apart from special contract the managers of a public hospital are not responsible to the patients whom they receive (whether paying or non-paying) for unskilful or negligent medical treatment, provided they have exercised due care in the selection of a competent staff.

In an action against the managers of a hospital by a patient the pursuer averred that, after an accident by which her leg was broken, she was advised by her doctor to apply for admission to the hospital, that after an interview with the resident surgeon, to whom she explained the circumstances, she was received as a paying patient, and that she was negligently and unskilfully treated at the hospital and suffered injury in consequence, in respect of which she claimed damages from the defenders. She did not dispute that due care had been exercised in the selection of the staff, but maintained that the defenders, by special contract made on their behalf by the resident surgeon, had guaranteed competent treatment of her case.

The Court, applying the rule above stated, dismissed the action, holding that the pursuer had not sufficiently averred any special contract with the defenders.

Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital, [1909] 2 K. B. 820, followed.

ON 23rd June 1910 Mrs Joicey Marion Brown or Foote brought an action against Sir Hugh Shaw Stewart, Bart., and others, the office-bearers and directors of, and as representing, the Greenock Hospital and Infirmary. The summons concluded for payment of £1000.

2D DIVISION.
Lord
Skerrington.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 2) "On or about 19th February 1910 the pursuer, who was residing at an hotel in Gourock, had a very severe fall there, by which her leg was broken above the knee, the lower part of her thigh bone being fractured." (Cond. 3) "After the accident the pursuer finding she was severely hurt sent for a doctor in Gourock. The said doctor found the pursuer suffering from a serious injury to her leg in the region of the knee, and advised her to go at once to the Greenock Infirmary in order to have the advantage of the medical appliance there, and in order to have the injury examined and treated, and, if necessary, to have the Röntgen rays applied. She accordingly applied to the defenders' Infirmary, and on or about 20th February was received as a paying patient therein at the rate of £2, 2s. per week for board and medical treatment by arrangement with the defenders' resident surgeon on the defenders' behalf, to whom she explained the circumstances as above set forth."* (Cond. 4) "On her admission to the Infirmary the pursuer's injuries were examined by the house surgeon, Dr Greaves, and thereafter by Dr Mackay, another surgeon upon the staff of the defenders' Infirmary. The defenders' surgeons did not use the Röntgen rays, though the pursuer expected and requested them to do so, but assured her that Foote v. The said diagnosis, treatment, and directions of the defenders' said Directors of doctors were wholly wrong. The said doctors failed to make an Greenock. adequate examination of the pursuer's leg and culpably and negligently Hospital. failed to ascertain that her thigh bone was fractured as they ought to have done if they had acted with reasonable skill." (Cond. 6) "As a result of the unskilful treatment received in the defenders' Infirmary; the pursuer is still under medical treatment, and will be under medical treatment for a considerable time. She has suffered severe pain, and been put to great expense for medical attendance and necessities, and will incur further expense. . . ." (Cond. 7) "The said injuries were due to the negligence and unskilful treatment of the defenders' doctors and surgeons on the staff of the said Infirmary, for whom the defenders are responsible. It was the duty of said doctors to have attended the pursuer with skill and have made an adequate examination of her leg. This duty the said doctors and surgeons wholly failed to discharge. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to reparation therefor in terms of the conclusions of the summons with expenses. (2) The defenders having undertaken to treat the pursuer for her said injuries, and having failed to do so with proper care and skilfulness, and the pursuer having suffered loss in consequence, they are bound to make reparation therefor to the pursuer.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant, the action should be dismissed.

On 4th November 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) sustained the third plea in law for the defenders and dismissed the action, with expenses.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer alleges that she entered the Greenock Infirmary as a paying patient in consequence of having met with an accident to her leg, and she further alleges that the doctors in the Infirmary failed to diagnose her injuries correctly, and treated her for a sprained knee, whereas, in point of fact, she was suffering from a broken thigh. She accordingly claims damages from the directors of the Infirmary upon the footing that the defenders are responsible for the doctors whom they employed. It is not alleged that the defenders failed to employ competent doctors, nor is it alleged that the pursuer received any treatment in the Infirmary except what was in conformity with the directions of the Infirmary doctors. In these circumstances the pursuer cannot succeed unless she has relevantly averred that the doctors were the servants of the defenders, or unless she has relevantly averred a contract on the part of the defenders, not merely to supply competent medical men, but also a contract that these medical men should treat the pursuer with skill and care. As regards the first ground of liability there is, in my opinion, no relevant averment that these doctors stood to the Infirmary managers in the relation of servants. The pursuer's counsel, however, rested his case principally upon the ground of contract, and he founded on the statement in the third article of the condescendence, to the effect that the pursuer was received into the Infirmary as a paying patient 'at the rate of £2, 2s. per week for board and medical treatment.' I read that as meaning that in return for £2, 2s. per week the pursuer was to receive board and medical treatment from the physicians and surgeons in the Infirmary, and the defenders' duty as regards medical treatment was, I think, fulfilled if they provided her with competent surgeons and physicians

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Nov. 4, 1911. Division on 28th and 31st October 1911.

Argued for the reclaimer;—As a general proposition it was true that the only duty undertaken by the governors of a public hospital towards a patient who was treated in the hospital was to use due care and skill in selecting their medical staff. But in the present case the defenders had entered into a special contract with the pursuer to give her treatment for her particular case. It was to get this treatment that she applied for admission to the hospital, and this was what she paid for. The defenders did not merely undertake to give the pursuer accommodation in the hospital, in which case their duty was fulfilled by supplying a competent doctor. They undertook to provide special treatment for a special injury, and this imposed on them a higher degree of responsibility. The presence of this special contract differentiated the case from the authorities on which the defenders relied, and took it out of the general rule. The contract was sufficiently averred, and there should be inquiry into the facts.¹

Foot v.
Directors of Greenock
Hospital.

Argued for the defenders;—The general rule according to which the defenders were responsible for the selection of a competent doctor, but not for the conduct of the treatment, was well established² and was not called in question. The pursuer founded on a very special contract, which would require very specific averment. There were no such averments on record, and it was not even said that the resident doctor, with whom the alleged contract was made, had any authority to bind the defenders. On record the pursuer's case was laid on delict and not on contract. No case for inquiry had been stated.

At advising on 4th November 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuer of this action sues the office-bearers and directors of the Greenock Hospital and Infirmary, as representing that institution, for damages in respect that, while she was a paying inmate in the infirmary, the house surgeons treated her case in an unskilful and negligent manner, to her great physical and pecuniary loss and injury. The question is whether or not the pursuer has set forth on record a case against the defenders relevant to be admitted to probation. The Lord Ordinary decided that question in the negative, and the pursuer has reclaimed, and asks that the case be remitted to his Lordship, with instructions to allow a proof before answer of her averments. It will, therefore, be necessary to examine these averments with care and in some detail. But the ground may with to attend to her case. The pursuer's counsel, however, argued that the contract went further, and that the defenders, by receiving the £2, 2s., undertook that the treatment which the pursuer should receive from their doctors would be reasonably skilful and careful. There is no averment of any such express contract and I am unable to find within the four corners of the record any facts and circumstances which would give rise to the inference that that was in fact the footing upon which this lady was received into the Infirmary. In these circumstances it would be useless to have an inquiry either before a jury or before a Judge. I accordingly dismiss the action with expenses."

Nov. 4, 1911. Foot v. Directors of Greenock Hospital.
 Lord Dundas. advantage be cleared by considering at the outset the general rules, apart from special averments, concerning the liability, in such a case, of the governing bodies of institutions like the Greenock Infirmary in a question with their patients. It is clear enough, and was admitted by the pursuer's counsel, that the medical men on the staff of the establishment are not the servants of the governing body. The pursuer's case must rest, as it was rested in the argument at our bar, upon contract express or implied. Where no special terms are expressed, the limits of legal responsibility attaching to the governing body are, I take it, confined to a due and careful selection by them of a competent staff, and do not extend to the supervision by them of the professional actings of members of the staff, or to any sort of guarantee that these will be performed with skill and care in any given case. The institution offers and undertakes to furnish to the public the services of competent medical and surgical practitioners, and nothing more. Considerations of reason and good sense seem to negative any further degree of responsibility on the part of the governing body. It is obvious that they have, and can have, no means and no ability of control,—no power or capacity of supervision,—over the professional treatment of their patients. The medical staff must ex necessitate rei act on their own responsibility; they are not appointed as in room and stead of the governors, to perform duties which the latter might or could themselves undertake. It follows that, though the governors appoint and may dismiss the medical staff, they cannot be held responsible for the degree of skill or care exercised by the latter in the treatment of any patient. They undertake to furnish their patients—whether paying or non-paying—with the services of a competent staff; they do not undertake indemnity against errors of treatment arising from want of skill or from negligence on the part of practitioners whom they have reasonably and properly appointed as persons competent for their posts. There is not, so far as I know, any Scottish decision on this matter, but the law has been clearly and authoritatively laid down in England in the sense I have endeavoured to indicate by a series of decisions, and particularly by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital.¹ The learned Judges there approved and confirmed the pithily expressed opinion of Walton, J., in Evans v. Liverpool Corporation,² to the effect that persons in the position of the present defenders “do not undertake the duties of medical men or to give medical advice, but they do undertake that the patients in their hospitals shall have competent medical advice and assistance.” I entertain no doubt that the doctrine laid down in England is sound, and is the law of Scotland. Mr Morison, indeed, in his able and temperate argument for the pursuer, disavowed any intention of disputing the general rules of law applicable to such cases, but devoted himself to the effort of distinguishing the case before us from their scope and effect.

One must therefore turn to the pursuer's record to see what is the alleged contract with the defenders upon which her case depends. It appears that about 19th February 1910 the pursuer had a severe fall, “by which her leg was broken above the knee, the lower part of her thigh bone being

There is not, so far as I know, any Scottish decision on this matter, but the law has been clearly and authoritatively laid down in England in the sense I have endeavoured to indicate by a series of decisions, and particularly by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital.¹ The learned Judges there approved and confirmed the pithily expressed opinion of Walton, J., in Evans v. Liverpool Corporation,² to the effect that persons in the position of the present defenders “do not undertake the duties of medical men or to give medical advice, but they do undertake that the patients in their hospitals shall have competent medical advice and assistance.” I entertain no doubt that the doctrine laid down in England is sound, and is the law of Scotland. Mr Morison, indeed, in his able and temperate argument for the pursuer, disavowed any intention of disputing the general rules of law applicable to such cases, but devoted himself to the effort of distinguishing the case before us from their scope and effect.

One must therefore turn to the pursuer's record to see what is the alleged contract with the defenders upon which her case depends. It appears that about 19th February 1910 the pursuer had a severe fall, “by which her leg was broken above the knee, the lower part of her thigh bone being fractured." She sent for a doctor in Gourrock, where she was residing, who Nov. 4, 1911. "advised her to go at once to the Greenock Infirmary in order to have the advantage of the medical appliances there, and in order to have the injury examined and treated, and, if necessary, to have the Röntgen rays applied." I pause to observe that in argument no point was attempted to be made of the fact that the Röntgen rays were not applied in the hospital. The pursuer proceeds to aver that "she accordingly applied to the defenders' Infirmary, and on or about 20th February was received as a paying patient therein at the rate of £2, 2s. per week for board and medical treatment." This is the sole statement on record of the contract founded upon; and it is certainly very bald and meagre. The rest of the condescendence is taken up with the pursuer's story of the alleged maltreatment of her case by the house surgeons, their negligent and unskilful diagnosis, actings, and advice, and of the injury and damage thereby resulting to her. It is to be observed that no suggestion is made that the defenders were not justified in appointing the surgeons as men competent for their respective positions. I confess that I read the pursuer's crucial averment as meaning, according to the ordinary use and interpretation of language, that she was to pay £2, 2s. per week during her stay in the infirmary, and was to receive board after the scale and fashion usually supplied to their paying patients, and the medical (and surgical) treatment available to all patients in the infirmary—that is (as I read the matter), the services of a competent staff of medical men. I cannot take it off the pursuer's hands, in the absence of much more specific averments than she makes, that her payment of £2, 2s. per week was to ensure to her a special degree of medical care and attention, or a guarantee of skill on the part of the house surgeons. I agree with the clearly and concisely expressed opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and shall not attempt to elaborate or improve upon its language. At our bar the pursuer's counsel asked and obtained leave to add by way of amendment at the end of Cond. 3 a statement to the effect that the contract was arranged on the defenders' behalf by Dr Greaves, the house surgeon, to whom the pursuer explained the circumstances above narrated in her condescendence. I do not think the amendment makes any substantial difference as regards the relevancy of the pursuer's case. It is not said (and, in the absence of averment, I decline to assume) that the house surgeon had power to bind the defenders by entering into an unusual contract with a patient; and I do not think that the statement that he was made aware by the pursuer of what had passed between her and her professional adviser in Gourrock serves at all to supply the radical deficiency of the crucial part of her condescendence. I hold with the Lord Ordinary that it would require very full and precise averments, which are here totally lacking, to justify us in allowing proof of a special and abnormal contract from which the ordinary rules of legal liability are to be excluded. To desiderate a due degree of precision in the statement upon record of so peculiar a case does not, to my mind, impose any harsh or unfair burden upon the pursuer. To relax proper requirements in that direction might, I think, expose governing bodies of public institutions to much harassing and unnecessary litigation. For these reasons I am of opinion that we ought to adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Lord Dundas.

Nov. 4, 1911. LORD SALVESSEN.—I am of the same opinion.

Foot v.
Directors of Greenock
Hospital.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of the case have been so fully and clearly stated by my brother Lord Dundas, that I pass over what I had written of narrative.

There was at the debate only one argument stated which appeared to have any plausibility. The pursuer's counsel urged that the hospital doctor made a bargain with the pursuer under which the pursuer was to be received as a paying patient. The argument was based upon the view that the doctor, who was the official who saw her, arranged a bargain with her for the hospital. I am very clearly of opinion that this is a fallacious contention. It was quite natural that, the pursuer and the doctor being brought into contact, he should give information as to the fixed tariff of the managers for the reception of paying patients. In doing so, he was not making any bargain at all, but simply communicating the terms, as regards board and lodging, on which she could be received under the fixed rules of the establishment. The case was, I think, in that matter practically in the same position as if the facts had been that at the gate of the hospital the pursuer had been informed by the gatekeeper of the terms of board and lodging for paying patients.

Upon the general question I concur entirely with what your Lordship has said. I do not think that the law of the case could be better stated than in the words of the American Chief Justice in Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital,¹ words with which Farwell, L. J., expressed his concurrence in the case of *Hillyer*²: "Here the physicians or surgeons are selected by the corporation or the trustees. But does it follow from this that they are the servants of the corporation? We think not. If A out of charity employs a physician to attend B, his sick neighbour, the physician does not become A's servant, and A, if he has been duly careful in selecting him, will not be answerable to B for his malpractice. The reason is that A does not undertake to treat B through the agency of the physician, but only to procure for B the services of the physician. The relation of master and servant is not established between A and the physician. And so there is no such relation between the corporation and the physicians and surgeons who give their services at the hospital. It is true the corporation has power to dismiss them, but it has this power, not because they are its servants, but because of its control of the hospital where their services are rendered. They would not recognise the right of the corporation, while retaining them, to direct them in their treatment of patients."

This seems to me to be absolutely sound. What would be the case if the managers interfered with the surgeon in his work, if they refused to allow him to proceed with an operation which he thought necessary? Is it not plain that the patient would have ground for complaint against the managers if they interfered, and the interference led to bad consequences? Again, if they insisted that the surgeon should obey them as to the conduct of an operation, would he not be entitled to refuse, and to decline to act as their employee any longer, and to complain of their conduct?

The matter is illustrated by the fact that in assisting at an operation, Nov. 4, 1911. nurses, though the servants of the managers in their ordinary work, must at the operation obey the doctor's directions absolutely. This view is very clearly brought out in the opinion of Farwell, L. J., in the case of Foot v. Directors of Greenock Hospital.

On these grounds, and on those stated by your Lordship, I concur in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—Uncertainty—"Religious and charitable institutions in Glasgow and neighbourhood." M'Phee's Trustees v. M'Phee.

A testator directed his trustees to "pay and divide" a sum of £250 "among such religious and charitable institutions in Glasgow and neighbourhood as they may select, and in such proportions as they may think proper."

Held that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest to institutions in the locality of which it could be predicated that they were both religious and charitable, and that it was not void from uncertainty.

THE late Hugh M'Phee, Glasgow, left a trust-disposition and settlement which contained, inter alia, the following clause:—"I direct and instruct my trustees to pay and divide the sum of £250 sterling, free of legacy-duty, among such religious and charitable institutions in Glasgow and neighbourhood as they may select, and in such proportions as they may think proper." EXTRA DIVISION.

A question having arisen as to the validity of the bequest, a special case was presented for the opinion of the Court, to which the trustees of the testator were the first parties and the residuary legatees under the settlement the second parties.

The case contained the following statement of the contentions of the parties:—" (7) The first parties maintain that they are entitled to select any institution or institutions in Glasgow and neighbourhood, each of which has for its object works of a combined religious and charitable character, and to pay over to such institution or institutions the said legacy of £250 in such proportions as they may think fit. (8) The second parties contend that the directions as to paying and dividing the said sum of £250 are too vague and indefinite to receive effect, and that the legacy is void in respect that the beneficiaries sought to be benefited cannot with reasonable certainty be ascertained. They accordingly maintain that the said sum becomes part of the residue of the testator's estate, and falls to be divided among them as residuary legatees."

The questions of law were:—" (1) Are the testator's directions as to paying and dividing the foresaid sum of £250 sterling sufficiently definite to receive effect, and are the first parties entitled to pay and M'Phee's Trustees v. M'Phee.

The case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of LORD KINNEAR, LORD DUNDAS, and LORD MACKENZIE) on 7th November 1911.

Argued for the first parties;—It was settled beyond dispute that a bequest to "charitable" institutions or for "charitable" purposes was definite and good¹; it was also equally well settled that a bequest to "religious" institutions or for "religious" purposes was indefinite and bad; and it had further been decided that where the expression was "religious or charitable" the bequest was bad,² as in such a case the whole bequest might be applied to the "religious," i.e., the indefinite, purposes. The expression "religious and charitable" was, however, in quite a different position. This had been clearly recognised in many of the cases.³ The word "and" fell to be read, as it was natural to read it, conjunctively and not disjunctively, and accordingly the definiteness which attached to the word "charitable" was sufficient to give a definite significance to the whole expression "charitable and religious." The case of M'Conochie's Trustees v. M'Conochie,⁴ which appeared to be a decision somewhat adverse to this contention, was distinguishable from the present, as the consideration which in that case weighed most with the Court was the vagueness of the expression "purposes" as compared with the expression "institutions." Further, the restriction here to "Glasgow and neighbourhood" tended to make the bequest still more definite.⁵ All that was really required to make a bequest good was "that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator."⁶ That requisite was present here.

Argued for the second parties;—The bequest was too vague and indefinite to receive effect. Admittedly, on the authorities, a bequest to "charitable or religious" institutions was bad; but here,—especially looking to the expression "divide,"—the word "and" was really equivalent to "or,"⁷ the intention of the testator being that part of the bequest was to be expended on religious and part on charitable institutions, a bequest which was clearly bad.⁸ Even if "and" was to be read conjunctively, the bequest was still bad, the word "religious" being so vague and incapable of definition as to vitiate the whole expression used by the testator.⁹ If it was impos-

M'Phee's
Trustees v.
M'Phee.

LORD DUNDAS.—The question raised in this special case is a short one, and, speaking for myself, I do not find it to be attended with serious difficulty. We are asked to construe a clause in a settlement whereby the testator directs his trustees "to pay and divide the sum of £250 sterling, free of legacy duty, among such religious and charitable institutions in Glasgow and neighbourhood as they may select, and in such proportions as they may think proper." The question we have to decide is whether that bequest is void from uncertainty, or whether it is sufficiently definite to receive legal effect.

If one approached the question simply as a matter of ordinary construction, and in total ignorance of the decided cases, I should say that the bequest was sufficiently specific, and was one which the trustees would have no practical difficulty in carrying into effect; and I should regard it as meaning that they were to divide this not very large sum of money among such institutions of a religious and charitable character in Glasgow and the neighbourhood as they might select. But we have been referred, and quite properly, to a number of cases more or less similar to the present, and we must, of course, pronounce our judgment having regard to what has been already decided by the Court. It seems clear enough that a bequest to such "charitable" institutions as the trustees might select would be good. There is no dispute about that, the word "charitable" has an ascertained meaning in law, and such a bequest would be beyond question. On the other hand, if it had been to such "religious or charitable" institutions as the trustees might select, without any limitation as regards locality or otherwise, the bequest, I take it, must have been held bad on the authority of the case of Macintyre v. Grimond's Trustees.¹ In that case the House of Lords decided that, owing to the very vague character of the word "religious" as used in the settlement without any qualification as to locality or other aid to its understanding, it could not be given effect to; and as it was disjunctively used in connection with "charitable," the whole bequest was bad. Here, we have not "religious or charitable" but "religious and charitable" institutions; and we have the further feature that the field is not the whole world but is confined to Glasgow and the neighbourhood. As I have said, prima facie I should hold that the words mean institutions of a religious and charitable character, and that there is no division into two classes, as distinct from one another, of religious institutions and charitable institutions. We were referred to dicta in decided cases which seem to show that the phrase "religious and charitable" stands, as one would have thought, in a better position than "religious or charitable." Lord Davey, in the case of Blair v. Duncan,² thought that a bequest to "charitable and public purposes" might have been quite good, whereas one to "charitable or public purposes" was, in his Lordship's opinion, and in that of the House, invalid. In the same way, Lord Trayner expressed an opinion in the case of *Grimond*³ (and the weight of his dictum is not affected by the Nov. 7, 1911. fact that the judgment of the Court of Session was reversed on appeal) M'Phee's that "if the trust-deed had said 'charitable and religious societies,' Trustees v. there would have been no question that the bequest was valid." We M'Phee. must also keep in view that, in the present case, the "religious and Lord Dundas. charitable institutions" are expressly confined to a very definite neighbourhood, and I think that is a circumstance of considerable weight in the matter. We were referred to a decision of my own in the Outer House in Smellie's Trustees v. Glasgow Royal Infirmary,¹ where I sustained a bequest to "other benevolent and religious societies in Glasgow and the west of Scotland." I see no reason to differ from what I then said as to the effect and weight of such limiting words. The case most pressed upon us by counsel for the second parties was that of M'Conochie's Trustees v.

*M'Conochie*² in the Second Division, where the words used were "educational, charitable, and religious purposes within the city of Aberdeen."
 Every case must be decided on its own language, and I am far from saying that I would have differed from the decision in M'Conochie's Trustees.² But what I think turned the scale, certainly in the opinion of Lord Low, was that the word used was "purposes" and not "institutions." That is the ground of Lord Low's opinion, and I think the circumstance must necessarily have affected the minds of the other learned Judges who decided that case. There are many other cases bearing more or less on the matter. The First Division alone have quite recently decided three, viz., Hay's Trustees
v. Baillie,³ Mackinnon's Trustees v. Mackinnon,⁴ and Paterson's Trustees v.
Paterson,⁵ but I do not think any good purpose would be served in discussing them in detail; the cases are merely illustrations of the way in which the Court will approach a question like the present. In Weir v. Crum *Brown*⁶ the present Lord Chancellor put the rule in this way:—"All that can be required is that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator"; and in the subsequent case of Allan's Executor v. Allan,⁷ Lord Kinnear, having quoted these words of Lord Loreburn, says:—"That is, therefore, the rule which is held to be established by *Crichton v. Grierson*⁸ and the subsequent cases, and the question to be put in each particular case is whether the description of the class to be benefited is sufficiently exact to enable an executor of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator." Applying this criterion, I think only one answer can be given to the question before us; because I cannot suppose that trustees of common sense would have any difficulty in carrying out the directions which this testator has expressed.
 The Court, I take it, is always more inclined to sustain than to destroy a testament. I think there is ample ground, without in any way trenching upon decided cases, for upholding this bequest. I accordingly propose to your Lordships that the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur. I should only add, with reference to the argument which was first stated by Mr Lippe, that I am unable to give the effect which he desired to the word "divide." According to that argument the word "divide" was said to compel us to read the word "and," coming between "religious" and "charitable," as disjunctive and not conjunctive. I am unable to assent to that view. It appears to me that the intention of the testator was that the objects of his benefit were to be institutions, in Glasgow and neighbourhood, of which it could be predicated that they were both religious and charitable, and that the selection of the particular institutions and the proportion that each institution was to get was left to his trustees. So construing the expression "religious and charitable institutions" I entirely agree with the opinion of Lord Dundas.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Succession—Destination—Clause of devolution—Mortis causa disposition of heritage—Condition—Validity—Public policy.

Earl of Caithness v.
Sinclair.

A clause in a mortis causa disposition of heritage provided that each of the heirs, who should succeed to the lands, should be obliged in all time to use the disposer's name and arms, and that "in case any of the said heirs shall succeed to a peerage, then, when the person so succeeding, or having right to succeed, to my said lands shall also succeed to a peerage, they shall be bound and obliged to denude themselves of all right" in the lands, and the same should devolve on the next heir.

Held (1) that this clause was not void as against public policy; (2) that it was effectual, although not protected by the fetters of an entail, and (3) that it applied to, and excluded, an heir who, prior to the opening of the succession to the lands, had succeeded to a peerage.

Fleeming v. Howden, (1868) 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, and Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone, (1804) M. 15,559 followed.

Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, (1853) 4 H. L. (Clark) 1, distinguished.

THIS was a special case brought with reference to the succession to the estate of Auchmacoy under a disposition executed by Mr James Buchan in 1873.

The disposition was in favour of Mr Buchan's only child, Miss Louisa Buchan, and the heirs whomsoever of her body, whom failing his nephew, James Augustus Sinclair, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to other heirs and substitutes therein mentioned.

The disposition contained no clauses of prohibition against alienation, contracting debt, or altering the order of succession, fenced with irritant and resolute clauses, nor did it contain an express clause authorising registration of the deed in the Register of Tailzies. It contained, however, a name and arms clause, and a clause of devolution, in the following terms:—"And under this condition always that the husband of my said daughter and each of the heirs and the husband of each of the female heirs who shall succeed to the lands before disposed under the destination herein contained shall be obliged in all time after they or their wives succeed to the said lands to use and retain the surname of Buchan and the arms and designation of Buchan of Auchmacoy and no other surname, arms, or designation, and that in case any of the said heirs shall succeed to a peerage, then when the person so succeeding or having right to succeed to my said lands shall also succeed to a peerage, they shall be bound and obliged to denude themselves of all right, title, and interest which may be competent to them in or to my said lands, and the same shall thenceforth ipso facto accrue and devolve upon the next heir for the time being who shall be entitled to succeed under the destination herein contained as if the person so succeeding to a peerage were naturally dead."

The disponent, James Buchan, died on 28th November 1874. His daughter, Miss Louisa Buchan, completed her title to Auchmacoy by recording the disposition in the Register of Sasines. She died unmarried on 18th April 1910. A small portion of the property comprised in her father's disposition was sold by her, but, apart from this, she did not execute any deed evacuating the destination in the disposition.

The person next called in the destination after Miss Louisa Buchan and the heirs of her body was James Augustus Sinclair. He succeeded to the peerage, as sixteenth Earl of Caithness, in 1889. He predeceased Miss Buchan in 1891, leaving issue, of whom the seventeenth Earl of Caithness, the first party to the case, was the eldest son, and Norman Macleod Sinclair, the second party to the case, the second son.

The first party contended that Mr Buchan's disposition did not contain any clauses on the true construction of which his right to succeed to the estate of Auchmacoy on the death of Miss Louisa Buchan was defeated; that the clause of devolution did not apply to the circumstances which had occurred, and that, in any event, the absence of irritant and resolute clauses, or their equivalent, precluded any question being successfully raised as to the right of the first party to enter into possession of, and complete his title to, the estate. The second party contended that the clause of devolution formed an integral and operative part of the destination of the estate, and that on a sound construction thereof the first party, by his succession to the peerage, was excluded from the succession to the estate, which had accordingly devolved upon the second party. He further contended that it was a condition of the succession to the estate that the party succeeding thereto should use and retain the name and arms of Buchan, and that the first party, not being in a position to implement that condition, was consequently not entitled to take up the succession to the estate, and the second party, who was prepared to implement the condition, was thus in right thereof.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Is the first party, on a sound construction of the terms of the said disposition, excluded, in the circumstances which have occurred, from the succession to the estate of Auchmacoy? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, is the second party now in right of the said estate?”

The case was heard before the First Division on 14th, 27th and 28th January 1911.

Argued for the first party;—(1) As Mr Buchan's disposition contained merely a simple and unprotected destination, the clause of devolution was not enforceable. In all the cases¹ in which such a clause had been held effectual, the deed in which it had appeared had been, or had purported to be, an entail. There was no instance of a clause of this nature receiving effect in connection with a simple destination.² If the destination was not protected, there was nothing to prevent the heir in possession of the lands from alienating them before the event occurred which involved forfeiture; and the clause was accordingly nugatory. (2) Assuming, however, that the clause was in itself effectual, it did not apply in the circumstances of this case. The phrase "shall also succeed" and the provision that the heir should be bound to "denude" limited the operation of the clause to the case of an heir succeeding to a peerage after he had succeeded to the estate of Auchmacoy. Here, on the other hand, the first party was already a peer when the succession to the lands opened to him. A clause of forfeiture was to be strictly construed, and to extend the scope of such a clause by construction was permissible only where this was necessary in order to bring the clause into conformity with a declaration of intention in the deed in which it appeared; and there was no such declaration in Mr Buchan's disposition. In *Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone*³ the decision was based on the special terms of the clause before the Court, and no general rule was there established. (3) The condition imposed in the clause was contrary to public policy and must, therefore, be held *pro non scripto*⁴; and, separatim, was too capricious and irrational to receive effect. The devolution was to take place if the heir succeeded to any peerage whatsoever. But peers were "hereditary counsellors of the Crown"⁵; and attendance in Parliament was a service rendered to the Sovereign. If the Sovereign desired a subject to undertake the duties devolving on a peer, the subject could not refuse obedience.⁶ But the effect of the present clause was to penalise succession to the peerage; and it was contrary to public policy that a testator or donor should be allowed to attach to his gift any condition which might induce the legatee or donee to regard with disfavour an opportunity of serving the Sovereign. The case fell accordingly within the principle recognised and enforced in *Egerton v. Earl Brownlow*⁷ and In re Beard.⁸

 Earl of Caithness v.
 Sinclair.

This question had not hitherto been considered in Scotland. In *Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone*¹ both parties explicitly disclaimed any intention of raising the question whether a clause providing that succession to the peerage (and not to a specified title) should involve a forfeiture of the estate was effectual; and Lord President Campbell in his manuscript note indicated a doubt "if it be not contra bonos mores to exclude a peer merely qua such from succeeding to an estate." In the present case the following features of the clause rendered it invalid. In the first place, the forfeiture clause referred to succession to the peerage generally and not to succession to a particular title. Secondly, the forfeiture was to take place if the heir succeeded to the title and dignity of a peerage, although there might be no estate which went with the peerage.² And, thirdly, there was no general declaration in the deed of any intention on the part of its author that his estates should not be merged in another estate; and a declaration of this kind had been held to be of importance in some of the earlier cases.³ In one or other of these respects the present case was distinguishable from all the cases in which effect had been given to clauses of forfeiture. Finally, the condition here was of the most capricious and irrational nature. If the heir in possession were created a peer, he would not forfeit the estate, for in that case he would not "succeed" to the peerage. But his eldest son would "succeed" to the peerage and would thereupon forfeit the estate.

Argued for the second party;—(1) The fact that the destination here was not protected was no ground for holding that the devolution clause was ineffectual. In *Fleeming v. Howden*⁴ effect was allowed to a clause of this nature, although the destination was in reality simple, as the entail was not recorded. In Munro v. Butler Johnstone,⁵ where the decision turned on a specialty in the clause of devolution, Lord Neaves observed that there might be an effectual clause of this nature in a simple destination. There was no difficulty in the application of the clause. Before the event which led to forfeiture occurred, the heir possessed the estate subject to the condition of the grant; and when the event happened, he held as trustee for the conditional substitute.⁶ (2) The clause applied, notwithstanding that the first party's succession to the peerage preceded his succession to Auchmacoy. This point was discussed and finally settled in Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone.⁷ (3) There was nothing capricious or contrary to public policy in the clause. It subjected the heir to a two-fold condition. He was to use the name of Buchan and no other surname. There was nothing contrary to public policy in this branch of the condition.⁸ The heir might become Lord Buchan of Auchmacoy without infringing this condition; but he could not assume any other name than Buchan. As he had become Earl of Caithness, he had forfeited the estate. Nor was the second Nov. 7, 1911. branch of the condition—regarding succession to a peerage—contrary to public policy. The Court ought not to extend the doctrine of public policy beyond the limits of the existing decisions.¹ Clauses of devolution had been used from the most ancient times. They had been frequently considered in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords, but no objection had ever been taken to them on the score of public policy. There was no feature of this clause which distinguished it from the clauses which had been discussed in these cases. In Earl of Eglinton v. Hamilton,² for example, the condition was that the heir should forfeit the estate if he succeeded to any peerage whatsoever, and there was no mention of lands attached thereto—if he succeeded to the dignity, the devolution came into operation. The case of *Egerton v. Earl Brownlow*³ was decided on the ground that the clause there in question might induce the heir to attempt to attain to the peerage by corrupt means. This objection could not be urged against the clause in Mr Buchan's deed.

At advising on 7th November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After stating the facts]—The argument of the first party resolved itself into three points. In the state of the authorities it would be idle to contend that a clause of this sort was feudally inefficacious. But the first party contended (1) that the clause in question was inefficacious because it was not protected by the fetters of a valid entail; (2) that it did not apply, because the Earl did not succeed to the Earldom after the succession opened; and (3) that the clause was against public policy and should therefore be held pro non scripto.

I am of opinion that the first question is really settled by authority, viz., by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Fleeming v. Howden.⁴ The facts of that case were these:—

John Fleeming was served heir of tailzie and provision and was duly infeft in certain estates known as the Wigtown Estates in 1841. The entail was a good and valid entail, but it contained a clause which provided that in case any of the heirs (with certain exceptions which were not brought into question) should succeed to a peerage, then the person so succeeding and also succeeding, or having right to succeed, to the Wigtown Estates should be bound to denude in favour of the next heir, and the estates should ipso facto accrue and devolve on the next heir of tailzie. In 1860 John Fleeming became by succession Lord Elphinstone. At that date a Mr Dunlop was in possession of the lands under a trust-deed granted by John Fleeming. In October 1860 Lady Hawarden, sister of John Fleeming, raised an action to have the lands transferred to her as next heir of entail. In 1861 John Fleeming, Lord Elphinstone, died, and his estates were sequestrated after his death. The action of Lady Hawarden was then

Nov. 7, 1911. defended by Dunlop and by James Howden, the trustee in the sequestration. The case went to the Whole Court, who decided that the clause of devolution took effect immediately on John Fleeming's succession to the peerage, and that in equity Lady Hawarden's right was superior to that of Earl of Caithness v. Sinclair. (This case is reported under the name of Viscountess Hawarden v. Elphinstone's Trustee.¹) There were also some other lands called Duntiblae which had been held by John Fleeming under another entail. This entail had the same clause of devolution as that quoted, but the entail had never been recorded in the Register of Tailzies and was therefore a bad entail, that is to say, none of the prohibitions or irritancies were enforceable against a singular successor or against creditors of any heir who executed diligence against the lands. The trustee on the sequestrated estate accordingly raised an action against the trustee under the private deed and against the heir of entail of the said Lady Hawarden, she having meantime died. The Court of Session by a majority, distinguishing this case from the former on the ground that it was an unrecorded entail, gave decree in his favour. But the judgment was reversed by the House of Lords. Now the value of this judgment was that a clause of this kind was in no sense an irritancy or forfeiture which could only be effectual if the entail were unimpeachable; but was a condition of the right which operated ipso facto the moment that the event occurred. The validity or invalidity of the prohibitive and irritant clauses was therefore a consideration irrelevant to the question of the efficacy of the clause, which inter hæredes was always binding.

The next question is, I think, equally settled by authority, viz., by the old case of Fleming v. Elphinstone.²

The remaining question is whether the condition is against public policy and should therefore be disregarded. But it never seems to have occurred to the Bar or Bench in the long series of cases with clauses of this sort to take such a plea: and I agree with the opinion which has been more than once expressed, that the argument of public policy should be most cautiously applied by Judges; indeed, I would say, should hardly be applied unless there is exact precedent to bind them. But further in the cases which were cited, of which *Egerton v. Earl Brownlow*³ and *In re Beard*⁴ may be taken as examples, the illegality always lay in this, that the condition, if held to be valid, would prompt the legatee to a certain course of action—whether that action was positive, as in Egerton's case,³ or negative, as in *Beard's*⁴—which action was against public policy. But here the condition affects no course of action. The succession to a peerage is a thing which the succeeding person cannot help. On the other hand the legality of a wish on the part of a testator that his estate should remain the appendage of a distinct family, bound to bear a certain name and arms, and not to be merged in the family of a peer, has been recognised by the numberless instances mentioned in the books.

I am therefore of opinion that the questions must be answered in the affirmative. Had the father of the first party succeeded to the estate before he succeeded to the peerage he might have altered the destination. But so Nov. 7, 1911.

 might Miss Louisa Buchan. She did not do so, and therefore the destination must take effect as it stands in accordance with the rules which I have ^{Earl of} sought to explain above. ^{Caithness v.}
^{Sinclair.}

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship upon all the points which you have stated. The first question seems to me to be whether the clause of devolution is applicable to the position of the first party as having succeeded to a peerage before the succession to the estate of Auchmacoy had opened to him. That appears to me to be a mere question of construction to be determined according to the intention of the mortis causa settlement. So considering it, I should, without authority, have come to the conclusion that the clause was directly applicable to the case of the first party. But then, I agree with your Lordship that it is unnecessary to go further than to say that the question is really settled by the case of Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone.¹

Upon the second question; which is the more important question in the case, as to the legal efficacy of the clause of devolution, I also agree with your Lordship that that is settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Fleeming v. Howden.² We were referred to the observations of the Judges in Munro v. Butler Johnstone,³ where it was doubted whether a clause of devolution could be sustained where the conveyance contained only a simple destination and not a strict entail. I apprehend there can be no doubt that the deed in question contains only a simple destination. There are no prohibitions fettered by the irritant and resolute clauses of a strict entail, nor are there any prohibitions directed against the heirs of entail which would be good inter hæredes, though they might be ineffectual against onerous creditors. It is a simple destination which might undoubtedly be evacuated by the first taker or any subsequent holder making up a title as heir of provision. But, then, I think it is settled by the case of Fleeming v. Howden,² that in order to sustain a clause of devolution of this kind it is not necessary that it should be connected with a strict entail. What was held in that case was that the clause must be sustained although there were no fetters effectually imposed upon the heirs of entail, because, the deed not having been registered, the heir in possession, before the contingency which brought into force the clause of devolution, might have dealt with the estate so as to disappoint the next substitute after him. It was pointed out by Lord Colonsay that the clause of devolution has no necessary connection with the entail clauses at all, that it is a condition of the right conferred by the deed, and, accordingly, that it may be sustained notwithstanding that there is no valid entail. I think it follows that it may be sustained even although the deed in which it occurs was never intended to be an entail at all, because the whole point of the decision is that, so long as the heir in possession possesses by virtue of the gift which contains the clause of devolution, and has, in fact, done nothing effectually to discharge that condition, he holds the estate under the obligation which the granter lays upon him. I take it that the real principle is that a gratuitous donee

Nov. 7, 1911. must accept the gift subject to the conditions which are imposed upon it by the granter. He binds himself, by his acceptance of the gift, to give effect to the conditions attached to it. And, accordingly, I think it is clear upon the decision that a simple destination is quite as effectual to support a clause of devolution as a strict entail would be.

Earl of Caithness v.
Sinclair.
Lord Kinnear.

In the present case, the question does not arise exactly in the same way as if the present Lord Caithness had possessed the estate for a certain period and then been called upon to convey it to the next heir substitute; but it depends upon exactly the same rule. He has not, so far as the case before us shows, made up a title to the estate. The real question is whether it is he or whether it is the next heir who is now entitled to take up the succession as heir of provision; and the view I take of the case is this, that he is not so entitled because the destination, under which he would otherwise have been heir of provision, expressly excludes him by reason of his having succeeded to a peerage.

Upon the third question I agree also with your Lordship; and I should be very unwilling to proceed upon any personal notion of public policy with reference to a question which has been so often before the Court without any difficulty of that kind having ever been suggested. I think the rule to be extracted from the case of Egerton v. Earl Brownlow,¹ is that the force of any objection on the ground of policy depends upon the tendency of the testamentary dispositions in question to affect conduct. But as your Lordship has pointed out, the succession to an existing peerage does not depend upon the conduct of anyone. It is not a thing which the heir to the peerage directs his conduct to obtain. It happens to him whether he will or not. And, accordingly, I think the principle of *Egerton v. Earl Brownlow*¹ is quite inapplicable.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. But I prefer to reach it in a somewhat different way.

Miss Buchan died in 1910. On her death the succession to Auchmacoy opened to the heir of provision under her father's settlement of the estate, which contained a tailzied destination, though it was not a strict entail. The heir to Miss Buchan has to be sought in that destination. The present Earl of Caithness cannot serve heir of provision to Miss Buchan, because by the fact of his being already a peer at the date of her death he is, on the authority of Fleming's case,² not the heir of investiture. In the circumstances the case is one of exclusion, not devolution. And as a case of exclusion it is, I think, simple.

Had the present Earl succeeded to the estate, on Miss Buchan's death, prior to his succession to the peerage, a case of devolution would have arisen, which I am glad I am not called on to consider. The authority of Fleming's case³ is, I must assume, conclusive. Yet I have, unfortunately for myself, entirely failed to grasp how,—consistently with the principle of Scots law that, without a trust or the fetters of an entail, you cannot give an absolute right, and yet control or forfeit that right,—a fee-simple proprietor who is so absolutely master of his estate that he can burden and dispose of it at will, without any breach of trust, can suddenly find himself deprived of property so absolutely vested in him, and reduced by implication to a mere trustee for someone else.

Nov. 7, 1911.
Earl of Caithness v.
Sinclair.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of opinion that both questions should be answered in the affirmative. Although in the event which has happened, of the Earl succeeding to the peerage before the succession to Auchmacoy opened to him, the language of the conveyance does not directly apply, the proper construction to be put upon it has been concluded by authority adversely to the contention of the first party. This was decided in the case of Fleming v. Lord Elphinstone.¹ It makes no difference whether an heir of entail in possession succeeds to a peerage or a peer succeeds to the estate. The clause of devolution is meant to apply upon the co-existence of the two events, without regard to which happens first.

Nor is it necessary, in order that the clause of devolution shall operate, that it should be in a recorded deed of entail—Fleeming v. Howden.² It takes effect as a condition of the gift, which must qualify its terms.

It was contended that it was contrary to public policy for a person to adject as a condition to a bequest of his estate that it shall not be held by one who succeeds to a peerage, and shall not be taken by one who is already a peer. It has however been held that a similar condition is effectual if directed against particular peerages. I am unable to say there is a valid distinction between the one case and the other. The case of *Egerton v. Earl Brownlow*³ was different. Here what is provided against is not acquisition, but succession, and there is no interference with the prerogative of the Crown. In the case of *In re Beard*⁴ a direct inducement was held out to a legatee not to enter the naval or military service of the country. This was held void as striking against the security of the State. There is no such inducement here.

There is thus sufficient to conclude the case against the first party.

THE COURT answered both questions of law in the affirmative.

Smart's
Trustee v.
Smart's
Trustees.

A question having arisen as to the liability for the proprietor's burdens affecting the house in question, the trustee maintained that they fell to be paid by the sister, in respect that the right conferred upon her was a liferent proper and not a mere right of occupancy, and founded upon the use by the testator of the word "liferent," coupled with the direction to divide the residue at the date of his death, the effect of which would be to leave no fund in the hands of the trustee out of which the proprietor's burdens could be paid.

Held that the sister's right in the house was one of occupancy only, and that the trustee was bound to repay out of the general residue the sums expended by her on proprietor's burdens.

Observations (per the Lord President) on Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees, 1911 S. C. 321.

1ST DIVISION. ON 11th January 1911 a special case was presented for the opinion of the Court on the effect of certain testamentary provisions of the late Robert Smart. The parties to the case were:—First party, Mr Smart's testamentary trustee, and Second parties, the testamentary trustees of Miss Jessie Smart, the testator's sister.

Mr Smart died on 10th March 1905, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he bequeathed his whole means and estate to the first party, as trustee for the following purposes:—“(First) That my said trustee shall pay all just and lawful debts that may be owing by me at the time of my death, my sickbed and funeral expenses, and the expenses attending the execution of this trust: (Second) That my trustee shall give to my sister, Miss Janet or Jessie Smart, residing with me, in the event of her surviving me, during all the days of her life, the liferent use and enjoyment of the dwelling-house Number nine Denham Green Avenue, Trinity Road, Leith, recently purchased by me for my own occupation, together with the whole household furniture and plenishing belonging to me at the time of my death, including books, pictures, linen, china, plate, plated articles and others, without any obligation upon her to replace articles broken or perishing with the using, and after the death of my said sister the said dwelling-house, furniture, plenishing, and others shall form part of the residue of my said means and estate and be disposed of as aftermentioned.” The third and fourth purposes directed the payment of certain legacies at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which should occur six months after the testator's death. “(Fifth) That my trustee shall realise and convert into money the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate, and divide the same into seven equal parts or shares, and shall pay and make over one of said parts or shares to each of the following persons, viz., (first) my sister, the said Miss Janet or Jessie Smart” [then followed the names of six other persons]. “And (Sixth) That on the death of my said sister, Miss Janet or Jessie Smart, in the event of her surviving me, my trustees shall realise and convert into money the said dwelling-house, Number nine Denham Green Avenue, and furniture, plenishing, and others liferented by her, and divide the same into six equal parts or shares, and pay and make over one of said shares to each of the” [six residuary legatees other than Miss Jessie Smart mentioned in the fifth purpose]. The will conferred full powers of sale, realisation, administration, and management of the estate upon the trustee.

On the death of Mr Smart the first party entered into possession of the trust-estate, which consisted of the house No. 9 Denham Green Avenue, valued at £900, other heritable property amounting in value to about £700, and moveable estate to the value of about £9300. He duly paid the legacies bequeathed by the third and fourth purposes of the will, allowed Miss Smart to have the liferent use and enjoyment of the house and furnishings in terms of the second purpose, and realised and divided the residue of the estate as directed by the fifth purpose. Nov. 9, 1911.

Smart's
Trustee v.
Smart's
Trustees.

Miss Smart died on 26th June 1909, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, under which she appointed the second parties to be her trustees and executors.

The following statements were made in the case:—

"11. After the death of the said Janet or Jessie Smart, the first party sold the said dwelling-house for the sum of £810 for settlement at Whitsunday 1910, and he also sold the said furniture, the amount realised therefor being £58, 2s. The first party has duly received payment of the prices of the said house and furniture, but he has not yet divided and paid and made over the same in terms of the sixth purpose of Mr Smart's trust-disposition and settlement.

"12. During the period that the said Janet or Jessie Smart survived her brother, the said Robert Smart, she occupied the said dwelling-house, No. 9 Denham Green Avenue, and paid the feu-duty, taxes (landlord's and tenant's) payable in respect of said house, and also the fire insurance premiums and cost of repairs.

"13. The said Janet or Jessie Smart paid the said feu-duty, taxes, insurance premiums, and cost of repairs in the belief that she was liable to do so, but the second parties maintain that the said feu-duty, the said taxes in so far as they were proprietor's taxes, the said insurance premiums, and the costs of said repairs in so far as they were costs falling to be paid by a proprietor, were paid by her in error. They maintain that the said Janet or Jessie Smart had merely a personal right of occupancy of the said dwelling-house, and that she was therefore not liable to make the annual payments above mentioned, and that these were payable, and ought to have been paid from time to time, either out of the general residue and remainder of the said Robert Smart's trust-estate, or by charging the same against the fee of the said house. They maintain that as the price of the said house is still in the hands of the first party, and is divisible among and payable to the same persons as the general residue and remainder of the said Robert Smart's trust-estate, except the said Janet or Jessie Smart herself, the amount of the said annual payments, with periodical interest thereon, ought to be repaid to them out of the said price to the extent of the whole amount of said payments, or, alternatively, to the extent of six-sevenths thereof. The first party maintains that the said Janet or Jessie Smart was liferentrix of the said dwelling-house, and was as such liable in payment of the said annual burdens."

The questions of law for the determination of the Court were:—

"1. Was the said Janet or Jessie Smart entitled to the liferent use and enjoyment of the said dwelling-house free of feu-duty, proprietor's taxes, fire insurance premiums, and cost of proprietor's repairs, and, if so, (a) ought the said annual burdens to have been made a charge upon the general residue and remainder of the testator's trust-estate, and are the second parties therefore entitled now to get repayment of the amount thereof, with periodical interest thereon, to the extent of six-sevenths thereof, out of the funds still remaining in the hands of the first party, or (b) ought the said annual burdens to have been

Nov. 9, 1911. charged upon the fee of the said house, and are the second parties therefore entitled now to get repayment of the whole amount thereof, with periodical interest thereon, out of the funds still remaining in the hands of the first party? or, 2. Were the said annual burdens payable by the said Janet or Jessie Smart herself?"

Smart's
Trustee v.
Smart's
Trustees.

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 9th November 1911.

Argued for the second parties;—The expression "liferent use and enjoyment" and other similar expressions had been the subject of construction in a series of cases, and it was now well settled that the effect of these words was to confer a right of occupancy only, not one of liferent proper.¹ The special circumstances founded on by the first party were not sufficient to except the case from the operation of the general rule.

Argued for the first party;—The mere use of the expression "liferent use and enjoyment," was not sufficient to instruct a limited right of occupancy, where, as here, a different intention was to be read from the general terms of the deed in which the expression occurred. The truster directed that his whole estate, other than the house, should be realised and divided at the date of his death, and that the proceeds of the sale of the house should be divided at the death of the liferentrix. There was accordingly no provision for any continuing trust fund out of which the feu-duties and other proprietor's burdens could be paid. Such expenses might properly be met out of residue if there had been any provision creating a continuing residue fund, but they were not proper charges of administration falling under the first purpose. An intention must therefore be inferred that they were to be paid by the liferentrix. The case was distinguished in this respect from those cited for the second parties. In all of these (with the exception of Johnstone's case²) the trustees were continuing to hold the residue of the estate. In Clark's case,³ in addition to the circumstance that there was a continuing trust fund, the expression under construction was "use," and it was to be inferred that in Rodger's case⁴ the Lord President would have given a different construction to the expression "liferent use" had it not been that the terms of the will in that case expressly absolved the liferenter from payment of proprietor's burdens. In Johnstone's case,² though the residue of the estate, as here, fell to be divided at the death of the testator, there still remained a surplus revenue from the fund set apart to secure the widow's annuity from which proprietor's burdens could be met, and it was on this ground that the judgment of the majority of the Court in that case proceeded.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a matter which is entirely settled by authority. The second purpose of the settlement of the late Robert Smart was that his trustee should give to his sister, Miss Jessie Smart, residing with him, in the event of her surviving him, during all the days of Nov. 9, 1911. her life, "the liferent use and enjoyment" of the dwelling-house No. 9 Danham Green Avenue, Trinity Road, Leith, recently purchased by him for his own occupation. Then after payment of expenses there was to be a distribution of the residue into seven shares, and then there is another provision that after the death of Miss Smart the dwelling-house and its furniture are to be realised, and the proceeds divided among the other six residuary legatees. Now, it is settled by a series of cases that a provision in this form gives a right of occupancy to a beneficiary but not a proper liferent. It was first of all so held in the case of Clark,¹ where the expression was "to give her (the testator's wife) the use of my house No. 36 Drummond Place, with the whole furniture and effects contained therein," so long as she remained a widow. Then in the case of *Rodger*² it was "the liferent use and enjoyment of the house"; though the case of *Rodger*² is not of so much value as Clark,¹ because there was a special clause superadded "free of all feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." But in *Bayne*³ there was a direction that the house was to be given "during all the days of her natural life." In *Cathcart*⁴ the expression was "the liferent use of any one house" the testator might die possessed of; and the final case was Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees,⁵ where there was given "the liferent use and enjoyment."

Ld. President;

Counsel for the first party wished to draw a distinction between the cases where the expression "liferent" was used and the cases where "liferent" was not used. He said that Lord President Inglis decided *Clark*¹ in the way he did because there was an absence of the word "liferent"; and he draws the conclusion that Lord President Inglis would have decided *Rodger*² the other way if it had not been for the special words "free of all feu-duty, ground-annual, and taxes." I do not myself think so. But this is quite certain that, if that is the true view of these two cases, both *Bayne*³ and *Cathcart*⁴ were wrongly decided. "Liferent" is not a word which had to be used like the word "dispone" in a disposition. At any rate, *Bayne*³ and *Cathcart*⁴ certainly bind us much more than the consideration of what Lord President Inglis might have decided in Rodger.²

Then we come to Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees.⁵ In that case Lord Guthrie decided the other way. He had drawn a distinction from the fact that in all the earlier cases there was always a continuing fund in the hands of the trustees, and therefore there was something out of which the trustees might meet necessary outgoings upon the property in respect of the widow's occupancy of the house; whereas in *Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees*⁵ there was a direction, as here, to divide the residue of the estate after the testator's death. Mr Mercer said that the only thing that made the Second Division reverse Lord Guthrie's judgment was that in that case there was a very ample sum to meet the annuity, and that there was enough out of the surplus revenue of that sum to meet the outgoings.

I cannot say that I put anything upon that fact. In the first place, so far as Lord Ardwall is concerned, he says that the moment you construe the clause in that way the trustees would have had a perfect right to keep back

No doubt it is true that Lord Dundas says that he does not think that this could have been met out of residue, and the Lord Justice-Clerk concurred with Lord Dundas and intimated that Lord Salvesen also concurred. It is a little unsafe to take the opinion of a concurring Judge as adopting in so many words each and every proposition which another Judge has stated where that proposition is not necessary for reaching the judgment. So far as I am concerned, I am bound to say I cannot agree with Lord Dundas. I agree with Lord Ardwall. It seems to me that the construction of the direction to the trustees to allow the lady the use of the house cannot be altered by the fact that they are told to divide the residue. Whether trustees, as a matter of fact, should retain part of the residue in order to meet these burdens is a question for themselves, and a question of circumstances. I cannot see how the mere existence of a direction to divide the residue can possibly affect the true construction of a direction that you are to give a certain person one thing or another. As a result, I think Miss Smart's testamentary trustees are entitled to repayment of six-sevenths of the feu-duty and proprietor's taxes which she paid.

Bainbridge v. Campbell.

Property—Building restriction—"Villas or dwelling-houses"—Legality of erecting tenements.

In a disposition of a plot of building ground the disponent prohibited the erection of houses or buildings "other than villas or dwelling-houses with offices and such enclosing walls as my said disponent may think proper to build."

Held (diss. Lord Johnston) that the erection of a tenement of dwelling-houses was not prohibited.

1ST DIVISION. IN September 1910, George Bainbridge, florist, Rothesay, the proprietor of a plot of building ground on the east side of Mill Street, Rutherglen, proposed to erect thereon three tenements of dwelling-houses, and presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court there for warrant to do so.

Dean of Guild
Court, Rutherglen.

The petitioner's ground was part of an area at one time held by a single proprietor, who, between 1872 and 1877, conveyed certain portions of it to various feuars and disponents, including the petitioner. The disposition in favour of the petitioner, granted in 1877, provided as follows:—"And providing, as it is hereby provided and declared, that no houses or buildings of any kind shall be erected on the said ground other than villas or dwelling-houses with offices and such enclosing walls as my said disponent may think proper to build, but this shall not imply a prohibition against using the ground for nursery purposes for the rearing of trees, plants, shrubs, fruits, and flowers, nor shall it imply a prohibition against the erection of green-houses or conservatories, which, if erected, shall be constructed of iron or wood of an ornamental character, except to the extent of 4 feet above the surface of the ground, which may be of neat brick or stone work." Nov. 9, 1911.

Bainbridge v.
Campbell

Objections were lodged to the petition by John Campbell, Park Villa, Rutherglen, and four others, being the proprietors of the other portions of the area given off between 1872 and 1877, and the representatives of the common author who still retained a portion of the area. It is unnecessary for the purposes of this report to refer to the particular terms of the titles of the objectors.

The objector John Campbell pleaded;—The petitioner being prevented by the terms of his title from erecting the buildings proposed by him, and the objector being entitled, and having an interest to object thereto, the warrant craved should be refused, with expenses.

Similar pleas were stated by the other objectors.

On 6th November 1910 the Dean of Guild granted a lining by an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds that the buildings proposed by the petitioner are not in violation of restrictions contained in his title: Therefore repels the objections stated for the respondents, and grants warrant as craved." *

* "NOTE.—The petitioner is proprietor of a piece of ground extending to 6300 square yards lying on the east side of Mill Street, Rutherglen, and he asks authority to erect thereon three tenements of dwelling-houses of single apartments and rooms and kitchen. That ground was part of an area of 10 roods which at one time belonged to a Mr Warnock, the ancestor of the respondents the Misses Warnock, and the author of the other respondents. The remainder of the 10 roods is now held by the respondents. The ground held by the respondent Rodger was given off by Warnock in 1872. The ground held by the respondent Campbell was given off later in the same year. The ground now belonging to the respondent M'Mahon was given off along with the ground now belonging to the petitioner in November 1877. The Misses Warnock made up a title in 1895 to the ground now held by them. [The Dean then referred to the terms of the various titles, and continued:]"

"A long and interesting argument was addressed to the Dean of Guild as to whether the respondents had a jus quæsitum to enforce restrictions in the petitioner's title. Several interesting topics were touched upon in the consideration of that question, for example, the effect of the consolidation effected in the title of the ground belonging to the respondent M'Mahon—the effect of the discharge of the ground annual in the title of the respondent Campbell—and the freedom from the common restriction of the ground belonging to the respondents the Misses Warnock, and so on. But, in the view which the Dean has come to take in this case, it is unnecessary for him to decide the question of jus quæsitum or to deal further with the topics alluded to. The Dean thinks this case can be determined upon the main issue between the parties, viz., the effect of the restrictive covenant in the petitioner's title.

"It was maintained for the respondent Campbell that the expression 'villas or dwelling-houses,' must be read along with the context; that the word 'villas' followed by the word 'dwelling-houses' really was equivalent to 'villas and dwelling-houses like villas,' or 'villas and dwelling-houses of that class,' and that the words must be read with reference to the objects of the deed in which they were found. The Dean of Guild cannot accept that mode of interpretation which would make him read the expression 'villas

Nov. 9, 1911. The objectors appealed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 8th November 1911.

Bainbridge v.
Campbell.

Argued for the appellants;—Flatted tenements were not dwelling-houses within the meaning of the exception contained in the petitioner's title. Though there might be circumstances in which such tenements could be regarded as dwelling-houses,¹ they could in no case be regarded as villas.² For the purposes of the petitioner's title the words "dwelling-houses" were to be construed as referring to buildings ejusdem generis with "villas," and this construction necessarily excluded tenements. Moreover, dwelling-houses "with offices and enclosing walls" clearly referred to dwelling-houses of the nature of villas and not to tenements. All deeds granted by the common author of the petitioner and the objectors might competently be referred to for the purpose of construing building restrictions im-

or dwelling-houses' as contended for. He agrees that the context of the deed must be looked at, and to some extent that words of restriction must be read with reference to the objects of the deed; but, allowing for that, he can find nothing in the context and nothing from the objects of the deed which would force him to limit the phrase or expression 'dwelling-houses' to 'villas or dwelling-houses like villas.' It was maintained for the other respondents that it was evident that some restriction was meant, and that if the expression 'dwelling-houses' was not limited as contended for, then the restriction was without meaning. The conclusive answer to that argument is that there could quite well be a restriction without a limitation to villas. There could be a limitation to buildings with the quality of residence, which by contrast would exclude buildings of a business character. And that, it seems to the Dean, is the essence of the restriction in the deed in question. It was next maintained that the phrases 'villas' and 'dwelling-houses' were exegetical of each other and not alternative. The first observation which occurs upon that is that the exegesis is not too happy. Dwelling-houses certainly connote residence, but it was not necessary for a word like 'villa' to have an exegetical definition of that nature. But the argument strongly pressed upon the Dean was that if the language used in the restrictive covenant was not self-explanatory, the Dean must put himself in the place of the parties to that covenant so as to arrive, if possible, at the true construction. In other words, the contention amounted to this, that in construing the restriction intention must be looked to. The Dean thinks that the answer to such a contention is found in the words of Lord Rutherford Clark in the case of Cowan v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, (1887) 14 R., at p. 686: 'Any such prohibition must be clearly expressed, but I cannot find any clear expression of it—indeed I doubt if there is any expression of prohibition in the deed at all. It is said that we may gather what may have been the intention of the framers of the deed, and from that intention may gather what the deed proposed to do. That is a mode of construing a feucharter to which we are unaccustomed, and there is here nothing in favour of that mode of construction; on the contrary, the rule is in favour of liberty to the vassal. All such clauses of prohibition must be strictly construed.'

"Even if there were room for two constructions, the construction which laid the less restriction or no restriction at all would fall to be preferred. Russell v. Cowpar, (1882) 9 R. 660, Lord Deas, at p. 666. But the Dean does not think that within the four corners of the deed in question there is posed by him, and when the petitioner's title was construed in the light of the terms used in these deeds it did not justify the Dean of Guild's conclusions. Nov. 9, 1911.

Bainbridge v.
Campbell.

Argued for the respondent;—All dwelling-houses, including those in tenements, might be erected with offices and enclosing walls, so the presence of these words did not help the appellants' case. The petitioner's title contained no restriction to self-contained houses, as it would have done if such a restriction had been intended.¹ The term "villas" was intended to mean something different from "dwelling-houses"; and flatted tenements, as defined by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of M'Arthur v. Magistrates of Edinburgh,² were dwelling-houses within the meaning of the petitioner's title.³ It could not be argued that each plot was only to contain one villa or dwelling-house, for there was no limitation as to the number of dwelling-houses which the petitioner might erect. If the terms of the restriction imposed were open to more than one construction, that construction was to be preferred which was in favour of freedom. In any event there was no community of interest between the petitioner and the appellants.

At advising on 9th November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from a decree of lining of the Dean of Guild of the burgh of Rutherglen. In granting the decree of lining the Dean of Guild decided adversely to the objections of certain coterminous proprietors.

The erection of houses for which warrant is sought is an erection of what is generally known as tenement houses, that is to say, a structure in which there are separate sets of rooms forming separate dwelling-places for families.

In the title of the petitioner there is this provision: "Providing, as it is hereby provided and declared, that no houses or buildings of any kind shall be erected on the said ground other than villas or dwelling-houses room for two constructions. Reading the deed in a fair way, the Dean is bound to say that so far as its terms go all that has been provided is that no buildings other than those of a residential kind, or buildings for a nursery are to be allowed to be erected, and the Dean therefore finds that the buildings proposed are not in contravention of the title under which the petitioner holds his ground, and he has accordingly granted the lining.

"Upon the question decided by the Dean, the following authorities (given here chronologically) were referred to by the parties:—Lumsden v. Lorimer, (1843) 5 D. 501; *Frame v. Bainbridge v. to build." Then it goes on to express in words that I need not read, that Campbell. "this shall not imply a prohibition against using the ground for nursery purposes," and allows a certain class of greenhouse or conservatory to be put Ld. President. up on the ground.

Now, the petitioner denies that there is any title in the objectors to insist upon the restrictions of his title, whatever they may be. The Dean of Guild has not found it necessary to decide that question, because he has held that the particular erection is not struck at by the prohibition, and as I agree with the Dean of Guild, I too do not think it necessary to form any opinion upon that question. I assume for the purposes of the argument that there is such mutuality of stipulation here as, in accordance with the well-settled rule, would give the objectors a title to object.

The whole matter turns upon the question whether the expressions in the prohibition of houses or buildings other than "villas or dwelling-houses with offices and such enclosing walls as my said disponent may think proper to build," do or do not strike at a tenement of dwelling-houses. I think they do not, and I have very little to add to the very clear and, I think, good judgment which the Dean of Guild has given; but as there is a difference of opinion among your Lordships, I shall say a few words more upon the subject.

In the first place, I think it is absolutely settled that the presumption is always for freedom; and it is a corollary of that that the person who has the title is entitled to read the language of the title in the way in which words are ordinarily read in any other contract. I say that because I think it is not permissible in this case to go to the other titles which have been granted by the same disponent in order, so to speak, to form a glossary of the disponent's words. There is no certainty that the petitioner in this case ever saw these other titles. He was not bound to go to the register of sasines to look for them. He was entitled to take the words which were proffered to him in his own title, and, if they suited him, to agree.

That being so, I ask myself whether the words "or dwelling-houses" can be considered as merely exegetical of "villas." I see no reason for supposing that they are, and the disjunctive "or" is certainly quite as appropriate to the view that they are not. I agree that, if there was never a case in which you could suppose that a tenement of houses should have offices attached, there would be something to be said for the idea that, inasmuch as these things which are allowed to be built are to have offices attached, or there is a possibility of their having offices attached, the conclusion would be that "dwelling-houses" was merely exegetical of "villas," if a villa was the only thing that could have offices attached. But it seems to me that a tenement is just as much in need of offices as a villa is. There was a necessity for putting the word in because, if nothing had been said, it might have been maintained that you could not build adjuncts, such as coal-houses, wash-houses, and so on, on the back ground.

It seems to me, therefore, that the prohibition is a prohibition against all things that do not fall within the class allied with villa or dwelling-house, that is to say, shop or manufactory, and so on. But a tenement of dwelling-houses is just a dwelling-house. It is a dwelling-house with more or less accommodation in it. I cannot think that, in ordinary parlance, a set of flats could not be called a dwelling-house—they are dwelling-houses, and it is noticeable here that the plural is used and not the singular. Nov. 9, 1911.

Bainbridge v.
Campbell.

Accordingly, I come to the conclusion, and really without much difficulty, that upon this title the petitioner was entitled to take it as meaning that he might erect any kind of dwelling-house; and although, if one were allowed to speculate as to what the granter of the other titles had meant, it is quite likely that he meant to keep this ground for villa ground proper, still I think he did not say so in this title, and that is enough for the petitioner. On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Dean of Guild's judgment is right and should be affirmed. Ld. President.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The question here is one of interpretation of a particular restriction in a particular conveyance, and in interpreting that restriction I think that I am confined to a consideration of the conveyance in question, and am not entitled to look for assistance to other titles granted by the same author to the other portions of the ground of which that in question forms part. These can, I think, only be referred to, to determine whether the holders have any jus quæsitum to enforce restrictive provisions contained in the conveyance to be interpreted.

Turning, then, to the deed in question, I find restriction of some kind intended, and I find further, a distinction drawn between "houses or buildings" and "villas or dwelling-houses." I accept the conclusion of the Judges in Kimber's case,¹ that the term "house" standing alone without a context should be read as referring to the external structure, and not to the internal arrangements for occupation—to the whole regarded as an erection, and not to the parts as arranged for occupation. But when I contrast the term "houses or buildings" with the term "villas or dwelling-houses," and find that the former are prohibited, unless they conform to the description of the latter, I think I have such a context as the Judges in *Kimber's*¹ case desiderated, and obtain some assistance in the construction. Had the area disposed to the petitioner been a small portion of the whole area, as are the subjects belonging to the objectors, and had I found the prohibition to be against erecting any house or building other than a villa or dwelling-house, I should not have thought it doubtful that the petitioner was restricted to a villa, or dwelling-house such as commonly goes under that name. In fact, I should have regarded the words "or dwelling-house" as a redundant and stupid exegesis, and not as a proper alternative, wholly destructive of the sense of the restriction, and capable of being expanded into cottage, self-contained house, tenement, hotel, nay even common lodging-house, workhouse, infirmary, or any other erection adapted to human habitation, as the alternative for "villa." For I cannot understand the sense of introducing the primary word "villa" at all, if dwelling-house, in such expansive sense, is a true alternative, and covers anything which can be achieved by the building trade for human habitation, provided it can be regarded as one erection. The further context "with offices and such enclosing walls as my said disponee may think

Nov. 9, 1911. proper," is, at any rate, more appropriate to the idea of villa or dwelling-house for separate occupation, than to a block of tenement houses. I Bainbridge v. should therefore have construed villa or dwelling-house in the singular to Campbell. mean a villa or separated dwelling-house for separate occupation. That
Ld. Johnston. the exegesis would have been redundant and stupid, would not, I think, have justified its being rejected as an exegesis, and turned into a true alternative, destructive of the sense of the restriction.

What the petitioner acquired, however, was not one stance, but the whole balance of the original plot after several parcels had been disposed of, the original plot being building ground, already laid off with surrounding streets and a dividing avenue, and provided with a drainage system. But if my construction would have been a fair reading of the clause, had it been confined to one stance and the restriction confined to one erection, I think that it is equally applicable, in these circumstances, to a congeries of stances, and to a relative and comprehensive restriction.

LORD CULLEN.—I concur in the views expressed by your Lordship in the chair.

It is clear that in the absence of a restrictive context the term "dwelling-houses" includes tenements of flatted dwelling-houses. The objectors accordingly seek to find a restrictive context in the use of the word "villas." It is illogical, they say, first to authorise villas and then to go on to authorise dwelling-houses generally, including villas. And therefore they argue "dwelling-houses" must be taken to mean such dwelling-houses as are akin to villas. Now I do not think that this goes further than to raise a surmise as to whether the words used in the deed express what may have been in the minds of the parties. The fact remains that the deed, logically or illogically, authorises not only villas but "dwelling houses," without any expressed qualification such as might have been conveyed by, say, the adjective "self-contained." If the disponent intended any such qualification, he could readily have expressed it, and ought to have done so. The well-settled presumption is all in favour of freedom of ownership on the part of the disponee. One must go not on mere surmise, although plausible, but on the words actually used, preferring, in dubio, a construction which makes for freedom rather than for restriction.

The permitted structures include offices and enclosing walls. If these are pointed to as indicating the character of the dwelling-houses authorised by the deed, it is sufficient to say that flatted tenements may, and commonly do, have offices connected with them, and that they may equally well have walls enclosing the ground on which they have been erected.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild to proceed.

Salvesen.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Seaman attempting to reach ship in a boat without oars.

A ship's engineer who had been ashore in the course of his employment attempted to reach his vessel, which was moored 100 yards from the shore, alone and without oars in a 27-foot lifeboat which should have been manned by a crew of six rowers, trusting that the boat would be carried in the direction of the vessel by the force of wind and tide, his only means of directing its course being by paddling with the rudder. He was blown out to sea and was drowned.

Held that the accident did not arise out of the employment.

request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted or proved:—

"On 11th July 1910 the said Theodore Halvorsen was in the employment of the appellants as second engineer on board their steamship 'Ramleh,' which was then at anchor at Leith Harbour, South Georgia, an island situated in the South Atlantic Ocean. The steamship 'Ramleh' is a 'ship,' and the said Theodore Halvorsen was a 'seaman,' within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 and 1906. The said vessel arrived in said harbour early in May 1910, and shortly thereafter, while the said steamship 'Ramleh' was lying in said harbour, the said Theodore Halvorsen received an injury to his thumb by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, by its being crushed in the machinery of the ship. The injury necessitated the services of a medical man, and the appellants, in implement of their duty under section 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, allowed all the seamen on board their vessels to have the services free, when their ships were at Leith Harbour, South Georgia, of a medical man, Dr Cruickshanks, resident on shore there. On the afternoon of the day when the said Theodore Halvorsen met with said accident he went ashore, and was attended to by Dr Cruickshanks, whose services, as a medical man, were sometimes given on board ship and sometimes given at his house on shore.

"Shortly after the said Theodore Halvorsen's thumb had been attended to by the said Dr Cruickshanks, he was absent from the said harbour on another of the appellants' steamers, engaged in the capacity of chief engineer on an emergency voyage in search of a missing whaler, on which voyage he was absent for about three weeks.

"On his return his thumb was still requiring medical treatment, and on 11th July 1910 he went on shore for the purpose of seeing the doctor in connection therewith and having his thumb dressed. The said Theodore Halvorsen and Robert Hood, the third engineer, had been on shore on 10th July 1910 on their own private business or pleasure, namely, shooting, and had then seen Dr Cruickshanks, who asked Halvorsen when he was again coming to see him, and it was then arranged that Halvorsen should see him soon. Leith Harbour, South Georgia, has no built quay, but is only a natural harbour, which might be described as a narrow bay or creek in which ships anchor. Ships are discharged and loaded by means of small boats, which go and come between them and a jetty on shore. The 'Ramleh' was anchored about one hundred yards from the jetty. The said Theodore Halvorsen, along with Hood the third engineer, went on shore from the 'Ramleh' on the occasion in question in a small boat belonging to the ship, tied it to the jetty, and went to the doctor's house. The time when they went on shore was early evening, after their ordinary hours of work on board the ship were over for the day. On their arrival there the said Theodore Halvorsen called for the doctor, but was informed that he was not within the house. They—Theodore Halvorsen and his companion, the third engineer—then waited for some time, hoping that Halvorsen would be able to see the doctor. While they were thus waiting, the wind became very strong and very squally, and the two returned to the jetty with the object of returning to the ship. On reaching the jetty they found that the ship's boat, which they had tied to it, had been taken away to the other side of the harbour, and that the only boat which was then lying at the jetty was a lifeboat belonging to the South Georgia Whaling Company, Limited, the proprietors of the whaling station and jetty. The said lifeboat was some 27 feet in length, having in it its rudder but no oars. This boat was one which, in ordinary circumstances, should have been manned by six men, each with an oar.

"Halvorsen proposed to his companion that they should go without oars, and that the rudder should be used to steer the boat by paddling. The wind and tide would have carried the boat down the harbour more or less in the direction of the 'Ramleh,' although the wind was rather on the beam of the boat. The third engineer refused to take the risk, and Halvorsen then proceeded to attempt it himself, and pushed the lifeboat out from the jetty and began to paddle with the rudder, which he used on the side of the boat, trying to keep her on to the wind. Halvorsen failed to reach the ship, and was blown out to sea and was drowned, and neither the boat nor he was seen or heard of again."

In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute held that the workman had met his death by accident arising out of and in course of his employment, and awarded compensation.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"1. Whether the said Theodore Halvorsen's death arose out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? 2. Whether the said Theodore Halvorsen's death was the result of 'accident' within the meaning of said Act?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 11th November 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—It was admitted that the occurrence was an accident in the sense of the statute, but the accident did not arise out of and in course of the employment. Granted that Halvorsen was on shore in the course of his employment, the accident did not arise out of that employment, as he exposed himself to a risk which was not contemplated in his employment.

Argued for the respondents ;—On the assumption that the accident Nov. 11, 1911. arose in the course of the employment, the question to be decided was whether the deceased was entitled to attempt to return to his ship in the manner stated. This question should be answered in the affirmative. The risk of going to his ship in a boat was one specially connected with his employment,¹ and so the question came to be whether the circumstances of the occasion justified the particular means of transit which he attempted. It was shown that the wind was rising and that both the second and third engineers were on shore. In these circumstances the ship's position might have to be altered, and it was this man's duty to return to the ship with all possible speed in order to be ready for such a contingency. Although it was not stated in the case that this was the motive which actuated the man's conduct, still it was an inference which might legitimately be drawn from the stated facts.² In this view of the case, the risk which he undertook was one to which he subjected himself in the interests of his employers, and therefore arose out of his employment. The emergency in which he was situated justified the unusual means of transit which he adopted, and it was a means which, on the facts found proved, had a reasonable prospect of success. His only fault was, in the circumstances, an error in judgment.

Halvorsen v.
Salvesen.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It would be quite useless to repeat what has been said in so many cases by the House of Lords, and especially in the very recent case of *Fletcher v. The Owners of the "Duchess,"*¹ which is later in date than the cases of *Moore v. The Manchester Liners,*³ and *Kitchenham.*⁴ I cannot say that I have any real difficulty in disposing of this case. I shall assume that the employment was not interrupted, and therefore that the man who was drowned was at the time acting in the course of his employment; but I am bound to say that I cannot see how the Sheriff came to the conclusion that the accident arose out of the employment. To get back to his ship he had to get back in one of the ordinary ways, and if, as in the case of *Leach,*⁵ which was decided on the same day as Kitchenham's case,⁴ the accident had happened by his tumbling off a gangway, then he would have been returning to his ship in an ordinary way and as part of his employment, and that would have been an accident arising out of the workman's employment. But the question which underlies such a situation always is, Was the danger which caused the accident a danger to which in the workman's contract with his employers he was naturally subjected?—and if the danger is of that class then the accident will be considered to have arisen out of the employment. But here the workman was not returning to his ship in any ordinary way; he was returning in a most extraordinary way; he was taking, in other words, a means of transit which was no ordinary means of transit at all. I grant that a boat is a quite proper means of getting back to a ship where the ship is not moored to a quay. But a boat in that sense is such a boat as is referred to by the Lord Chancellor in the case of *Fletcher v. The Owners of the "Duchess,"*¹ namely, an

It is certainly not making use of an ordinary boat to go into one which is meant to be propelled by oars but which has no oars, which is meant to be manned by six or seven men but has only one man in it, and whose course can only be influenced by paddling with the rudder, the propulsion being effected by the wind and tide. This seems to me a case where the boat used was really no boat at all, and that the poor man by going back to his ship in that way subjected himself to a risk which was no part of his employment, and a risk which his employers never could have thought that he should be subjected to in the ordinary course of his employment. I therefore have no hesitation in saying that the first question must be answered in the negative.

Halvorsen v.
Salvesen.

Ld. President.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think it clear that this man exposed himself to a risk which was not one of the risks of his employment at all. It was not one of the risks which his contract of employment as seaman required him to take. That he was entitled to return to his ship by means of a boat nobody disputes, but what is said is that, as the boat which was meant for the purpose was not at hand, he took a lifeboat which had no oars, and which in ordinary circumstances required to be manned by six men each with an oar, and, getting on board of her, he trusted that he would be carried more or less in the direction of the ship by the force of the wind and tide, his only means of directing the boat being that he took out the rudder and used it as a paddle for steering. I cannot see that this is a risk to which he was required by his employment to expose himself.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree that this accident did not arise out of the employment of the deceased.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the negative, found it unnecessary to answer the second question, and sustained the appeal.

No. 17.

ROBERT GRAHAM PENN, Applicant.—J. S. Mackay.
MRS ALICE SIMPSON OR PENN, Objector.—J. G. Jameson.

Nov. 14, 1911.

Penn v. Penn.

Poor's-Roll—Poverty—Circumstances warranting admission.

Held that a workman, who was earning 30s. a week and who was living apart from and was not supporting his family, was not entitled to be admitted to the poor's-roll for the purpose of defending an action of divorce.

2D DIVISION.

MRS ALICE SIMPSON OR PENN brought an action of divorce on the ground of desertion against her husband, Robert Graham Penn, who appeared at the diet of proof and obtained a sist of the case to enable him to apply for admission to the poor's-roll for the purpose of defending the action.

His application for admission was remitted to the reporters on probabilis causa litigandi to report whether the applicant had a probabilis causa and was otherwise entitled to the benefit of the poor's-roll.

The following statement of facts is taken from the note appended by Nov. 14, 1911.
the reporters to their report :—

“The applicant is the defender in an action of divorce on the ground of desertion, having appeared to defend at the diet of proof for the pursuer. He desires to lodge defences and to lead evidence in support thereof, and the action has been sisted to enable him to obtain the benefit of the poor’s-roll. There is one child of the marriage, who resides with the pursuer.

Penn v. Penn.

“In his statement made before the minister and elders of the parish of Larbert the applicant stated that he ‘is a bricklayer to trade, in which his earnings amount to £1, 10s. per week when in employment.’ From a statement supplied by his employers, Messrs. J. & J. W. M’Lachlan, Larbert, we find that for the year from 29th October 1910 to 28th October 1911 his total wages were £70, 17s. 4d. This is an average of 27s. 3d. per week. During this year he was without work for three weeks. His average earnings for the remaining 49 weeks were therefore 28s. 11½d.”

On 9th November 1911 the reporters reported that in their opinion the applicant had a probabilis causa litigandi, and that he was otherwise entitled to the benefit of the poor’s-roll.*

On 14th November 1911 counsel for the applicant appeared before the Second Division (consisting of Lord Salvesen, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Cullen) and moved for his admission to the poor’s-roll.

Counsel for the applicant’s wife objected, and argued ;—In the case of *Robertson*¹ it was laid down as a general rule by Lord President Inglis that “under ordinary circumstances a man earning 23s. a week is not entitled to be admitted,” and this had become the established practice of the Court.² There were no circumstances in the present case to justify a departure from the rule, and the application should therefore be refused.

Argued for the applicant ;—The rule laid down in *Robertson*¹ was not absolute,³ and the standard applied by Lord President Inglis was no longer appropriate in view of the increased cost of living and the rise of wages since 1880. But in any event there were special circumstances which made this case exceptional. It was an action of divorce, where, on grounds of public policy, it was desirable that a proper defence should be stated. The applicant was a defender, not a pursuer,⁴ and it was also a consideration that so far he had conducted his own case.⁵

* “NOTE.—[After the statement of facts above quoted]—The question is whether the special circumstances of the case justify departure from the rule laid down by Lord President Inglis in Robertson, (1880) 7 R. 1092, that a man with 23s. a week is not in ordinary circumstances entitled to the benefit of the poor’s-roll. An example of such a departure is the case of Paterson v. Linlithgow Police Commissioners, (1888) 15 R. 826, where a pursuer having a wage of 27s. was admitted to the poor’s-roll. For other examples of circumstances justifying departure from the general rule reference is made to Brown v. Brown, (1906) 8 F. 687.

“In view of these precedents and of the special circumstances of this case we are humbly of opinion that it belongs to that class of cases in which an exception may be made to the general rule.”

⁵ Miller v. Gordon, (1838) 16 S. 812.

Nov. 14, 1911. LORD SALVESSEN.—I am quite clear that we must refuse to admit this applicant to the benefit of the poor's-roll. The general rule was laid down by Lord President Inglis as far back as 1880 in Robertson,¹ that a man with 23s. a week is not in ordinary circumstances entitled to be admitted to the poor's-roll. The applicant stated in his declaration before the minister and elders of the parish of Larbert that he was earning 30s. a week. The fact that he was accidentally out of employment for three weeks during the past year cannot be taken into account, as was pointed out by the Lord President in *Robertson's*¹ case. It is not conclusive against an applicant that he is earning 30s. a week, if he is able to show any special circumstances which would entitle him to the benefit of the poor's-roll. There are no special circumstances here. The main fact relied upon by Mr Mackay was that the applicant is the defender in the action, which he desires to carry on with the assistance of counsel and agents for the poor, but I see no more reason for admitting a defender than a pursuer. It is true that a pursuer comes voluntarily into Court, whereas a defender is brought into Court, but in the ordinary case the expenses of a defender are not so heavy as those of a pursuer. Then it is said this is a consistorial action, and it is in the public interest that such causes should, if possible, be properly defended. That would make this case apply to all consistorial actions, which already form the largest class of cases carried on by pauper litigants. In point of fact, however, in consistorial actions the Judge is more or less charged with the interests of an absent defender, or of a defender who appears in person, and, when counsel do not appear for the defence, he must see that the grounds of divorce are very clearly established before granting decree. Here the applicant has no burdens. He has been living as a single man for four years, and he has no children dependent on him. I think that it would be a very unfortunate rule to establish that a man earning 30s. a week in regular employment is in such poor circumstances as to entitle him to the benefits of the poor's-roll.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. In all the cases dealing with the question of admission to the poor's-roll a distinction has been drawn between the general rule and special circumstances which may justify a departure from the general rule. The general rule, as stated in the case of Robertson,¹ is that a man earning 23s. a week is not entitled to be admitted. In view of the changed conditions of life since the date of that case, it may be for consideration whether the figure of 23s. now requires modification. But even supposing it to be changed to 30s.—the applicant's wages in this case—the general rule would then be that a man earning 30s. a week is not entitled to the benefit of the poor's-roll except in special circumstances. These special circumstances may arise in various ways. A man may have burdens, such as the duty of supporting a large family, or the procedure in the case may be specially costly, as for instance if witnesses have to be brought from a distance. In either of these circumstances the Court may make an exception in order to do justice to the case. But no such circumstances arise in the present case. The applicant has no burdens, and his witnesses, if any, have only to be brought from Falkirk. I think it would be to depart from a sound general rule if on the facts stated in the present case we were to grant this application. Even if the rule is modified to the utmost in the applicant's favour, I think it still applies to his case, and no special circumstances have been shown to justify our treating his case as exceptional.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a share of his residue for his daughter upon the same terms as those contained in her marriage-contract. By the marriage-contract it was provided that the wife should have the liferent of a settled fund, and "In the third place, upon the death of the" wife, in the event of there being children and of the husband surviving, that the husband should have a liferent, and that the fee should be paid to the children; "And lastly, in the event of there being no child or children" and of the husband surviving, that he should have a liferent, "and upon the death of the" husband that the fund should revert and belong to the wife's father, whom failing to certain other beneficiaries. There were no children of the marriage, and no provision with regard to the fee was made for the event, which happened, of the wife being the survivor of the spouses.

Held that in order to give effect to the intention of the testator it was necessary to imply as introducing the last purpose of the marriage-contract the prefatory words of the third purpose "upon the death of the" wife; so that the direction for the distribution of the fee should read as if it were "upon the death of the wife and upon the death of the husband,"—that is to say, upon the death of the survivor of the spouses.

event of the liferenter's claim being rejected—to determine the rights of parties in the fund on the termination of the liferent, in respect that the parties who might be interested could not be ascertained until that event happened, and so were not all necessarily represented in the case.

1st DIVISION. THIS special case was brought on 24th January 1911 for the determination of questions arising with regard to the fee of a sum settled upon Mrs Mary Dalziel Scott or Bruce, by her father Ralph Erskine Scott, C.A., Edinburgh, in her marriage-contract, and of a one-third share of the residue of his testamentary estate in which she was interested.

By contract of marriage dated 11th December 1871 between John Bruce, younger of Sumburgh, Shetland, and Mary Dalziel Scott, Miss Scott's father, Ralph Erskine Scott, bound himself and his heirs and assignees to make payment to the marriage-contract trustees of the sum of £10,000, the trust purposes being, inter alia, as follows:—"In the second place, the said trustees shall pay the annual interest and produce of the said capital sum to the said Mary Dalziel Scott during all the days of her life, on her own receipt, as an alimentary provision to her which shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of the said spouses or either of them: In the third place, upon the death of the said Mary Dalziel Scott, in the event of the said John Bruce junior surviving her, and of there being issue of the said marriage, the said trustees shall pay the free annual interest and produce of the said capital sum to the said John Bruce junior for behoof of himself and the child or children of the said marriage during all the days of the lifetime of the said John Bruce junior, or until the said children attain majority, or in the case of daughters are married, whichever of these events shall first happen, when the capital shall be payable to the children in manner after mentioned . . . and it is hereby provided and declared that the said capital sum shall be divisible among the children of the said marriage if more than one or their issue in such proportions and under such restrictions and upon such terms and conditions as the said John Bruce junior and Mary Dalziel Scott, or the survivor of them, may appoint by any writing under their, his, or her hand: And failing such deed of division [then followed directions as to the method of distribution among the children in that event]: And lastly, in the event of there being no child or children of the said intended marriage, the said trustees shall pay to the said John Bruce junior, in the event of his surviving the said Mary Dalziel Scott, the free proceeds and interest of the said capital sum, but declaring that such payments shall be suspended during the subsistence of any second marriage entered into by the said John Bruce junior; and upon the death of the said John Bruce junior, the whole sums hereby settled by the said Ralph Erskine Scott as aforesaid, and any income that may be accumulated during the subsistence of said second marriage as aforesaid, shall revert and belong to the said Ralph Erskine Scott, whom failing, to the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott and Christian Scott, daughter of the said Ralph Erskine Scott, jointly, and the heirs of their bodies, whom all failing, to such person or persons as the said Mary Dalziel Scott by any writing under her hand may direct."

Ralph Erskine Scott died on 7th May 1887, leaving a holograph last will and settlement, by which he directed his trustees, inter alia, to pay to Mr and Bruce's marriage-contract trustees the sum of £10,000 in implement of the obligation above mentioned, and further directed:—"In the third place, the net residue of my estate having been ascertained, the amount thereof shall be divisible equally among my three children then surviving, or if any have predeceased, the parent's share will fall to his or her family, but . . . from Mary's share will be deducted the Ten thousand pounds to be paid to the trustees under her marriage-contract. I direct that the surplus of Mary's share beyond the Ten thousand pounds shall be invested by my trustees in the stock of any of the foresaid banks, or on good heritable security in their names for her behoof, and the interest thereof paid to her half-yearly on her own receipt, and exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband, present or future, the capital thereof to be settled in the same way and for the same purposes as are specified in the contract of marriage."

Nov. 16, 1911.
Scott's Trustees v. Bruce.

There was no issue of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Bruce, and Mr Bruce died on 4th July 1907, survived by his widow.

Ralph Erskine Scott was survived by his daughter, Mrs Bruce, by a daughter, Miss Christian Scott, who died unmarried in 1896, and by a son, Ebenezer Erskine Scott, who died in 1897 survived by five daughters and a son. The first parties to the special case were Ralph Erskine Scott's trustees; the second party was Mrs Bruce; the third parties were Mr and Mrs Bruce's marriage-contract trustees; the fourth parties were Ebenezer Erskine Scott's testamentary trustees; the fifth party was Miss Christian Scott's testamentary trustee; the sixth parties were Ebenezer Erskine Scott's children, and the seventh parties were his grandchildren.

The case stated:—

"6. Questions have now arisen as regards the fee of said sum of £10,000, and of the said one-third share of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate. The parties of the first part maintain that, in the events which have occurred of there being no children of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Bruce, and of Mr Bruce having predeceased his wife, the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Bruce contains no trust purpose applicable to the fee of said sum of £10,000, and that said sum, subject to the burden of Mrs Bruce's liferent, forms part of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate.

"7. The party of the second part maintains that the marriage-contract trusts with regard to the fee of the said sum of £10,000 have failed, and that the said sum, subject to her own alimentary liferent, belongs to her as part of her one-third share of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate, the direction to deduct the same from her said one-third share of residue having become inoperative. She further contends that the fee of her said one-third share of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate, exclusive of the said sum of £10,000, belongs to her absolutely.

"8. The parties of the third and seventh parts maintain that in the events which have happened the said sum of £10,000 has been validly disposed of under the said marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Bruce, and that upon the death of Mrs Bruce, the liferentrix, it will vest in the then surviving heirs of the body of the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott. Further, the parties of the seventh part maintain that the fee of Mrs Bruce's one-third share of the residue of Mr

Nov. 16, 1911 Scott's Trustees v. Bruce. Ralph Erskine Scott's trust-estate has been validly disposed of by his trust-disposition and settlement, and that upon the death of Mrs Bruce, the liferentrix, it will vest in the then surviving heirs of the body of the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott.

"9. The parties of the fourth and fifth parts maintain that in the events which have occurred of there being no children of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Bruce, and Mr Bruce having predeceased his wife, the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Bruce contains no trust purpose applicable to the fee of said sum of £10,000, and that said sum, subject to the burden of Mrs Bruce's liferent, has fallen into intestacy, or alternatively that it forms part of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate. They further maintain that the fee of Mrs Bruce's third share of the residue of Mr Ralph Erskine Scott's estate has not been disposed of by his trust-disposition and settlement, and has fallen into intestacy.

"10. The parties of the sixth part maintain that in the events that have happened the fee of the said sum of £10,000 has been validly disposed of under the terms of the said contract of marriage, and that it vested upon the death of Mr Bruce in the then surviving heirs of the body of Ebenezer Erskine Scott. They further maintain that the fee of the said one-third share of the residue of the said Ralph Erskine Scott's estate, liferented by Mrs Bruce, vested upon the death of Mr Bruce in the then surviving heirs of the body of Ebenezer Erskine Scott."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—

"1. In the events which have happened, does the said antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr and Mrs Bruce effectually dispose of the fee of the sum of £10,000 which the late Ralph Erskine Scott became bound to pay to the trustees under the said antenuptial contract of marriage? 2. In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, did the fee of the said sum of £10,000, subject to the second party's liferent, vest, on the death of the said John Bruce, in the heirs of the body of the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott, now represented by the sixth parties; or is vesting thereof postponed till the death of the second party? 3. In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, does the fee of the said sum of £10,000, subject to the second party's liferent (1) belong to the second party as part of the one-third share of the residue of the testator's estate bequeathed by him to her; or (2) fall into the residue of the testator's estate and become divisible among his residuary legatees, including the second party; or (3) form intestate succession of the testator? "4. (1) Does the fee of the one-third share of the residue of the testator's estate bequeathed by him to the second party (exclusive of the said sum of £10,000) belong to the second party absolutely; or (2) did the said fee vest, on the death of the said John Bruce, in the heirs of the body of the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott, now represented by the sixth parties; or (3) is vesting of the said fee postponed till the death of the second party; or (4) does the said fee form intestate succession of the testator?"

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 8th November 1911, when the undernoted authorities were referred to on the question of the competency of the case.¹

At advising on 16th November 1911,—

Nov. 16, 1911.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have considered the competency of this special case, with reference to the authorities, and I think that in part only is it competent. Scott's Trustees v. Bruce.

Mrs Bruce is entitled by action of declarator and payment to have determined her own rights in the funds settled on her by her father in her marriage-contract and in his will, for, if her contention is sound, it will result in present payment of such funds in whole or in part. To meet such action there are adequate contradictors even in the two sets of trustees, still more if to these are superadded all those in life who can put forward competing claims. These parties are all represented in the special case. So far, then, as Mrs Bruce's claims are concerned, the special case is competent. But I do not think that, if Mrs Bruce fails in her contention, the special case can proceed to determine interests that would arise in that contingency. For these are not interests resulting in present payment, nor can all possible claimants be at present ascertained. Some may not be in existence.

So far only, therefore, as query 1, query 3, and the first branch of query 4 go, is the special case competent. As regards the other queries it is incompetent.

The difficulty that has occurred in interpreting Mrs Bruce's marriage-contract and her father's will arises from the fact that the marriage-contract apparently omits to provide for a contingency which has happened, viz., the contingency of Mrs Bruce surviving her husband, John Bruce of Sumburgh, and of there being no issue of the marriage; and from the further fact that her father, Mr R. E. Scott, being a man of business, but not a conveyancer, wrote his own will.

I think, however, that though the draftsmanship of the marriage-contract is not all that could be desired, the omission is only apparent, and that Mr R. E. Scott's intention in his will can be ascertained with sufficient certainty.

Mr R. E. Scott settled £10,000 on his daughter Mrs Bruce by her marriage-contract for the following purposes: In the second place, the income was to be paid to her as an alimentary provision during her life. In the third place, "upon the death of the said Mary Dalziel Scott, in the event of the said John Bruce junior surviving her, and of there being issue of the said marriage," a limited life interest was given to Mr Bruce "for behoof of himself and the child or children of the said marriage." It was limited by the provision for payment out of the capital to the children. The children's shares in the capital were payable to them on majority or marriage, and did not vest until majority or marriage. In the last place, "in the event of there being no child or children of the said intended marriage," John Bruce junior, in the event of his surviving his wife, was to enjoy the liferent, and upon his death the settled fund was to revert and belong to Mr R. E. Scott, who provided it, whom failing to his other chil-

Scott's Trustees v. Bruce. At first sight it would appear that this last purpose only provided for the

Ld. Johnston. contingency of there being no issue of the marriage and of John Bruce junior being the survivor of the spouses, and that the resulting trust for the settlor, whom failing his other children, only came into operation on that particular contingency. Literally I admit that that is the result, but I cannot think that that was the intention. And the real intention is, in my opinion, sufficiently plain, notwithstanding the obscurity of the language.

In the first place, the provisions of the second purpose, giving Mrs Bruce a liferent, require that the last purpose should be impliedly prefaced by the same words as the third purpose. It would then run thus: "Upon the death of the said Mary Dalziel Scott, in the event of there being no child or children of the said intended marriage, the said trustees shall pay to the said John Bruce junior, in the event of his surviving the said Mary Dalziel Scott," the income of the settled fund. In this there is no difficulty of construction. And when the last purpose proceeds to say, "and upon the death of the said John Bruce junior the whole sums hereby settled by the said Ralph Erskine Scott as aforesaid" shall revert and belong, &c., I think that the clear meaning and intention, though badly expressed, is—again supplying by necessary implication the initial words of the purpose—this, "upon the death of the said Mary Dalziel Scott," and upon the death of the said John Bruce junior, that is, in effect on the death of the survivor, there being no issue of the marriage, the whole sums hereby settled shall revert and belong, &c.

If this be, as I think it is, the sound construction, Mrs Bruce's contention put forward in the special case fails, and the first query falls to be answered in the affirmative, and it becomes unnecessary to answer the third.

Turning now to Mr R. E. Scott's will, I think its interpretation is comparatively easy. Mr Scott would have more intelligibly expressed his intention had he put his third purpose first. For that is the way in which the thing presented itself to his mind. But the result of his first three purposes taken together, is that he divides his net residue among his three children, Ebenezer Erskine Scott, Christian Scott, and Mrs Bruce, equally, but directs £10,000 out of Mrs Bruce's share to be paid to her marriage-contract trustees in implement of his obligation under her marriage-contract. He does not, however, give Mrs Bruce absolutely the surplus of her share beyond the £10,000, but retains it in the hands of his trustees for her life interest, not in this case made alimentary, "the capital thereof to be settled in the same way and for the same purposes as are specified in the contract of marriage." What that settlement must be I have already dealt with. It is on children, if any, of the marriage, and failing them to revert and belong, &c. There follows a declaration limiting Mr Bruce's liferent in any event to the £10,000 settled by the marriage-contract, and providing that if there were no issue of the marriage, Mrs Bruce's whole share was to revert to the testator's other children. This declaration is expressed with the same confusion of language and want of grasp of the contingency with which it is dealing as is the relative clause in the marriage-contract. But it makes it nevertheless abundantly clear that Mrs Bruce, whatever the reason or want of reason, was to take no share of capital in any event. Nov. 16, 1911.

The first branch of the fourth query will therefore fall to be answered in the negative. Scott's Trustees v. Bruce.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. I think the rules as to competency were carefully considered in the case of Baillie's Trustees v. Whiting,¹ and I do not think we can go back upon what we there decided.

So far, therefore, as the £10,000 is concerned, it is clear that, inasmuch as the liferent of the £10,000 is an alimentary liferent, there cannot be any present payment of the fee of that £10,000 to the parties to whom it belongs; and as, even supposing the fee was in Mrs Bruce, she could not ask the trustees to denude, it is evident, so far as that sum is concerned, that she is not in a position to ask any present payment. And it is equally evident that, as she is not in that position, we have not got before us all the persons who may become possible competitors for that fee when the liferent has expired.

But so far as the sum left her by her father's will is concerned, that is not in the same position. The third provision of the will is that which deals with the residue, and it directs that the residue shall be divisible between the three children. Then it makes a provision as regards the deduction of the sum already paid to the son during his father's life, and then it goes on in the words, "and from Mary's share will be deducted the ten thousand pounds to be paid to the trustees under her marriage-contract."

Now I think that, although not very clearly expressed, the meaning there is perfectly clear, that is to say, that the £10,000 already paid is to be taken in computo in settling Mary's share, just as the £3850 the son had got during his father's lifetime is also to be taken in computo in fixing his share. But then the testator goes on and directs "that the surplus of Mary's share beyond the £10,000 shall be invested by my trustees . . . and the interest thereof paid to her half-yearly on her own receipt . . . the capital thereof to be settled in the same way and for the same purposes as are specified in the contract of marriage."

Now, here the liferent which she is given is not made an alimentary liferent; and therefore, if under the concluding words she got a fee, she would be entitled to say,—“I am now in possession of the liferent and fee of the same sum, and therefore I ask you to hand over the sum to me.” That has been settled again and again to be within her power.

Accordingly, I think the special case does become a competent special case so far as she is concerned, because she is in a position, if her contention is right, to ask for an immediate payment of that sum of money which represents what a third of the residue is under deduction of £10,000.

But then, in order to find out whether she has a fee of that sum, one has to go back to the marriage-contract, because the capital is “to be settled in the same way and for the same purposes as are specified in the contract of marriage.” When I come to the contract of marriage I go along with the Scott's Trustees v. Bruce. Accordingly I find that, in my opinion, she has not the fee of this other sum. Well, then, who has it? The person who will have it will be the person who is entitled under the clause of the marriage-contract. Thus the proper contradictors are not here, because we cannot tell, at this present moment, who at the expiry of the liferent, which is the first period at which it can be paid, may be the heirs of the body of Ebenezer Erskine Scott and Christian Scott. Of course, they may not after all be the people who are entitled to get it, because it may be that the heirs are to be taken at a different time.

Ld. President.

Accordingly, I think that the special case cannot be further proceeded with, and that we ought simply to negative Mrs Bruce's claim to an immediate payment of any money at all.

LORD CULLEN concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the first branch of the fourth question in the negative; found it unnecessary to answer the third question, and refused to answer the second question and the other branches of the fourth question.

Sale—Horse—Sale under warranty—Rejection.

A horse was sold with a warranty that it was a good worker and sound in wind, and the purchasers bargained that they should have a week's trial.

Held that the contract was one of sale under warranty and not one of sale on approbation, and accordingly that the purchasers were entitled to reject the horse within the week if it was disconform to the warranty, but not otherwise.

Process—Appeal—Summary cause—Printing—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 8.

In an appeal in a summary cause to the Court of Session under sec. 8 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, only those portions of the process should be printed to which the Court is entitled to refer.

Observations (per Lord Salvesen) as to the portions of the process to which the Court is entitled to refer in such an appeal, and opinion that, as the Sheriff's findings in fact are conclusive, the proof cannot be referred to.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

(SEE previous report, 1911 S. C. 1133.)

In October 1910 James D. Cranston, horsedealer and contractor, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against L. Mallow & Lien, provision merchants there, for payment of £28, being the price of a horse sold and delivered by the pursuer to the defenders.

On 22nd December 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie), after a proof in which the evidence was recorded, gave decree in favour of Nov. 14, 1911. the pursuer as craved.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 22nd Feb-^{Cranston v. Mallow & Lien.} ruary 1911, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of 22nd December last: Finds in fact (1) that on 25th May 1910 the pursuer sold to the defenders a bay horse, at the price of £28, with a warranty that it was a good worker and sound in wind; (2) that the defenders bargained that they should have a week's trial with the horse; (3) that they returned the horse within the week, on the ground that it was suffering from stringhalt and was going lame: Finds in law that the contract was one of sale on approbation, and that the defenders having returned the horse within the period allowed for approval, there was no completed contract of sale: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses, including the expenses of the appeal: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits," &c.

On 28th February 1911 the Sheriff, on the pursuer's motion, granted leave to appeal to the Court of Session, in terms of section 8 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and printed and boxed the whole documents in the process, including the initial writ, note of pleas in law, proof, and all the interlocutors, together with the notes appended to the final interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff respectively.

On the case being called in the Summar Roll on 25th May 1911 the defenders objected to the competency of the appeal, and on 8th July the Court repelled the objection.†

The appeal was heard on the merits before the Second Division (consisting of Lord Salvesen, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Cullen) on 14th November 1911, when the appellant argued;—On the facts found by the Sheriff it was clear that the contract was not one of sale on approbation, as he had held, but of sale with a warranty. The week's trial was given to the purchaser only for the purpose of ascertaining whether the horse was conform to the warranty, and the horse could only be returned on the ground that it was not so conform.¹ If the

"Summary cause procedure and appeal.—In a summary cause the Sheriff shall order such procedure as he thinks requisite, and (without a record of the evidence, unless on the motion of either party the Sheriff shall order that the evidence be recorded) shall dispose of the cause without delay by interlocutor containing findings in fact and in law. Where the evidence has been recorded the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute upon fact and law may in ordinary form be brought under review of the Sheriff, but where the evidence has not been recorded, the findings in law only shall be subject to review. In a summary cause, if the Sheriff, on appeal, is of opinion that important questions of law are involved, he shall state the same in his interlocutor, and he may then or within seven days from the date of his interlocutor grant leave to appeal to a division of the Court of Session on such questions of law, but otherwise the judgment of the Sheriff shall be final."

purchaser were entitled to reject the horse within that period for any reason, or for no reason, the warranty would have no meaning. The findings of fact in the Sheriff's interlocutor were unambiguous, and it was not permissible to refer either to the evidence or to the Sheriff's note to explain or qualify them. The point now at issue was a question of law and not of fact.¹

Argued for the respondents;—Whether the contract was one of sale on approbation or not was a question of fact, depending on the evidence as to what passed between the parties. The Sheriff had found that it was a sale on approbation, and his finding could not be overturned. Further, his decision on this point was consistent with his other findings in fact. If there was any ambiguity in his findings, it was cleared up by reference to his note, from which it appeared that in his opinion the purchasers were to have a week's trial before deciding whether or not to take the horse. The warranty was in addition to the trial, and extended beyond the first week. Only by putting this construction on the contract could full effect be given to all the findings in fact.

LORD SALVESEN.—This is an appeal in a summary cause to which section 8 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, applies, and as the procedure laid down in that section is novel, it behoves us to walk warily in dealing with the interpretation of it and the method in which it is to be applied in practice. The substance of section 8 is that in a summary cause the Sheriff-substitute may dispose of the cause without a record and without having the evidence taken down in shorthand or otherwise recorded, and that in such a case there shall be no appeal at all upon questions of fact, there being no materials preserved upon which such an appeal can be taken. It is open, however, for either party to move that the evidence shall be recorded, and if it has been recorded the Sheriff-substitute's judgment both on fact and law may in ordinary form be brought under the review of the Sheriff. The section proceeds: "In a summary cause, if the Sheriff on appeal is of opinion that important questions of law are involved he shall state the same in his interlocutor, and he may then or within seven days from the date of his interlocutor grant leave to appeal to a Division of the Court of Session on such questions of law, but otherwise the judgment of the Sheriff shall be final."

It is this last part of the section that confers upon us jurisdiction to entertain an appeal at all in a summary cause to which section 8 applies. We have already held that it is not a valid objection to the competency of the appeal that the Sheriff has not expressly stated in the interlocutor the particular question of law which he thought of sufficient importance to be submitted to the review of the Court of Session. It is enough if it plainly appears from his interlocutor that there is a question of law and that he has, within the seven days stipulated, granted leave to appeal, because it may be assumed that he would not grant leave to appeal unless he was of opinion that an important question of law was involved, and that it was right that the parties should have the benefit of having that question of law decided by a higher Court. It follows, however, from the section that we must take the findings in fact of the Sheriff as conclusive, and that we can only deal Nov. 14, 1911.

 with his interlocutor—either by way of affirming it or reversing it—if we ^{Cranston v.} are satisfied that upon these findings in fact he reached a correct or an ^{Mallow &} erroneous conclusion in law; and parties admitted that, that being so, we ^{Lien.} were not entitled to go to the proof printed in this case with the view of Lord Salvesen.
 considering whether the Sheriff was justified in reaching the conclusions in fact which he expressed in his interlocutor.

Now, so dealing with the case, we have three findings in fact here—(1) that on 25th May 1910 the pursuer sold to the defenders a bay horse at the price of £28, with a warranty that it was a good worker and sound in wind; (2) that the defenders bargained that they should have a week's trial with the horse; (3) that they returned the horse within the week, on the ground that it was suffering from stringhalt, and was going lame. It is plain that the third finding in fact does not affirm that there was any breach of warranty. It is not even found that the horse was in point of fact suffering from stringhalt, and was going lame; it is only found that that was the ground upon which it was returned. Even if it were suffering from stringhalt and was going lame, that would admittedly not be a breach of the warranty as expressed in the first finding. The case, therefore, turns really upon the two first findings, and I think we may take it exactly as if these findings had been expressed in a written contract by the parties, with the addendum appearing on the contract that the stipulation embodied in the second finding had been inserted at the instance of the defenders.

That being so, was the contract one of sale on approbation, as the Sheriff has found in law, or was it a sale with a warranty and a right on the part of the defenders to reject the horse within a week if within that time they found it was disconform to warranty? That is really a question of the construction of a contract, and is therefore properly a question of law. I think that the Sheriff was entirely justified in the view which he took that it was a question of law of such a nature as might entitle the party who was unsuccessful to obtain the benefit of the review of this Court.

I cannot say that I have any doubt that the findings in fact of the Sheriff did not warrant the conclusion in law at which he arrived. In my opinion this was not, upon his findings, a contract of sale on approbation. Had that been the true meaning of the bargain, I cannot understand why there should have been a warranty given at all, for within the week the buyer might reject the horse without assigning any ground whatever, except that he did not like it. The Sheriff's view involves that there was to be a free trial for a week of the horse with an absolute right of rejection upon any ground, and that the sale under the warranty was then to take effect if the horse was not rejected, which would give the purchasers a further right of rejection if they thereafter discovered a breach of the warranty and intimated timeously their desire to rescind the contract.

I reach this conclusion upon the facts as they have been found, and I should have reached the same conclusion if I were entitled to refer to the Sheriff's opinion. Such a reference may be competent for the purpose of construing any ambiguous finding in fact, although I greatly doubt whether it can be made for any other purposes. The findings here are not, I think, ambiguous, and are substantially the same as the conclusions expressed in

Nov. 14, 1911. the Sheriff's opinion. The error in law which I think he has committed is this, that he seems to have considered that the stipulation in the contract of sale, inserted at the instance of the purchasers—that they should have a week's trial of the horse sold—was a stipulation which raised a legal presumption that there was no completed contract of sale until the week had expired. I think that is not the legal result, and that it cannot stand with the finding that the horse was sold with a specific warranty. It is not inconsistent with such a sale that a time should be specified within which the right of rejection for breach of warranty must be exercised, for in a case where the warranty is one that the horse is sound in wind and a good worker, the correctness of which can be ascertained after a day or two's trial, the stipulation is really one in favour of the buyer.

Cranston v.
Mallow &
Lien.

Lord Salvesen.

On these grounds I am for recalling the Sheriff's finding in law; and I propose to your Lordships that we should, in place thereof, find in law that the contract was one of sale with a warranty with regard to which the purchasers were entitled to have a week to ascertain whether the horse conformed to the warranty or not, and that there being no finding in fact that the warranty had been broken, the pursuer is entitled to have decree for the admitted price. That would be substantially reverting to the decision at which the Sheriff-substitute arrived.

The only other matter on which I think it is necessary to say something is in regard to the printing of the evidence, which both parties admit we are not entitled to look at. I can quite understand how that proof came to be printed. Under the statutes and Acts of Sederunt which regulate appeals from the Sheriff Court, it is necessary for the appellant to box his prints within a fixed time; and no doubt the appellant here thought it was safer to deal with this appeal as if it were an ordinary one. But the reason why the proof requires to be printed in an ordinary appeal from the Sheriff Court is that the parties are entitled to ask the Court of Session to review both the findings in fact and the findings in law; and it is necessary, therefore, that the materials for reviewing the findings in fact should be before the Court. But that is not the case in an appeal under section 8, and I think it is impossible to defend, upon any principle, the printing of a proof which the Court is not entitled by the statute to refer to. In such summary appeals I hope parties will in future only print the matters which we can really consider. Probably they must have the record, such as it is, printed, and also the interlocutor of the Sheriff. I doubt whether they are entitled to print the previous interlocutors, or even the final interlocutor, of the Sheriff-substitute; because this section of the statute looks like an attempt to introduce something of the nature of a stated case, giving an appeal in law where the Legislature thought it undesirable that expenses should be accumulated by having matters of fact subjected to the judgment of three tribunals. If the appellant had any difficulty on the subject of what he should print he ought to have applied to the Court for directions, and I have no doubt that the Court would then have stated the opinion which, as I understand, with the approval of your Lordships, we now do.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. I think it would have been unfortunate in the interest of justice if the interlocutor had been so expressed as to prevent us from dealing with the question of law. If the Sheriff had simply found Nov. 14, 1911. that on a certain date the pursuer sold the horse at a certain price under the condition that the defenders should have a week's trial, and that they returned the horse within the week, that would have been quite unambiguous and would have raised no question of law on the face of it, and we would not have been entitled in that case to look at the note in order to discover if a question of law was involved. But I agree with your Lordship in thinking that here the interlocutor itself raises a clear question of law.

Cranston v.
Mallow &
Lien.

Lord Guthrie.

With regard to that question I have no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordship that, where a horse is sold with a warranty and a period is defined in connection with the sale, there is no presumption that that introduces a new condition, but that the presumption rather is that the parties intended to agree that if the horse was to be rejected under the warranty intimation must be given within the period fixed. That being so I agree in law with the decision your Lordship has come to.

I also think that we do not require to decide whether, in a case where on the face of the interlocutor it is doubtful whether or not a question of law is raised, it might not be competent to look at the Sheriff's note. In this case I think it is quite unnecessary to consider that question.

LORD CULLEN.—The Sheriff found in fact (1) that on 25th May 1910 the pursuer sold to the defenders for £28 a bay horse, with a warranty that it was a good worker and sound in wind, and (2) that the defenders bargained that they should have a week's trial with the horse. Such being in fact the terms of the bargain between the parties as found by the Sheriff, the only question in law is whether on a true construction of it the defenders were thereby given a right to return the horse within a week on any ground whatever without reference to the particular terms of the warranty. I am unable to construe the contract in that way, in view of the fact that the seller gave a warranty to run from 25th May. It seems to me that the fair reading of the stipulation for a week's trial is that it was intended that the defenders should have that period for testing whether the horse conformed to the warranty or not.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the . . . interlocutor appealed against except in so far as the findings in fact therein are concerned: Find in law that under the warranty contained in the contract of sale as found by the Sheriff the defenders were entitled to reject the horse within one week if disconform to warranty, but not otherwise, and in respect the Sheriff has not held that the horse was disconform to warranty, decern against the defenders for the sum of £28, with interest, as concluded for; Find the defenders liable in expenses in this and in the Inferior Court (with the exception of the expense of printing the Notes of Evidence), and remit, &c.

Process—Reclaiming—Double reclaiming notes—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 52.

A party can competently present a reclaiming note after his opponent has already reclaimed. But it is a question for the Auditor to decide whether there was any proper reason for presenting a second reclaiming note and, if there was not, it will be his duty to disallow the expenses of that note.

Observations on the circumstances in which a second reclaiming note may properly be presented.

1ST DIVISION. ON 25th February 1911 Elizabeth Gow Fairgrieve brought an action of damages for slander against David Robertson Chalmers.
 Lord Dewar.

On 9th November 1911 an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) approving of an issue for the pursuer and of a counter issue for the defender.

On 11th November the defender's agent informed the pursuer's agents by telephone message that the defender intended to reclaim.

On 13th November the pursuer's agents wrote advising the defender's agent that they had prepared a reclaiming note and a notice of motion to vary the counter issue for the defender, and had instructed the printer to proceed with printing the reclaiming note.

On the same day the defender's agent acknowledged receipt of the letter from the pursuer's agents, and repeated the intimation of the defender's intention to reclaim.

The defender's reclaiming note was boxed on 14th November, and was called in the Single Bills of the First Division on 15th November, when it was sent to the Summar Roll.

On the same day (viz., 15th November) the pursuer's reclaiming note and notice of motion were boxed and, when they were called in the Single Bills of the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Skerrington) on 16th November, counsel for the defender objected to the competency of the second reclaiming note, and argued ;—By section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* every reclaiming note had the effect of submitting to the Court the whole proceedings in the cause, and here any legitimate purpose of the pursuer in reclaiming was served as soon as the defender's reclaiming Nov. 17, 1911.

note was boxed.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called upon.

Fairgrieve v.
Chalmers.

At advising on 17th November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question here raised is as to whether we should send this reclaiming note to the roll. The circumstances are these: There was a judgment, and one of the parties—the defender—intimated to the pursuer that he intended to reclaim. He carried out his intention by printing and boxing in the ordinary way, and his reclaiming note appeared in the Single Bills and was sent to the roll.

This is a reclaiming note by the pursuer, and it appeared in the Single Bills one day after the reclaiming note for the defender had been sent to the roll, and the defender now argues that this reclaiming note should not be sent to the roll, because, under the provisions of section 52 of the Court of Session Act, the pursuer had really got all he wanted, viz., the possibility of attacking the interlocutor which had been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, by the fact that the case had already been sent to the roll upon the defender's reclaiming note.

I do not think that this matter amounts to incompetency. Section 52 of the Court of Session Act does not say so. It simply says that the effect of a reclaiming note is, first of all, to submit to review all prior interlocutors—unlike the older practice in which you had to reclaim against each separate interlocutor which you disliked; and, secondly, it gives the other side the opportunity of calling in question each and every interlocutor; but it does not say that it makes a reclaiming note at the instance of the other side incompetent. Accordingly, I think that this reclaiming note ought to go to the roll.

I am, however, very far from saying that I think it is good practice that there should be a second reclaiming note for the purpose of doing no more than could be done on a reclaiming note taken by the other side, and it really comes to be an Auditor's question and nothing else. It is quite evident that there are cases in which different results might be reached. For instance, if a party gets notice from the other side that he intends to lodge a reclaiming note and he himself at the same time wishes to reclaim, it is quite evident that he would not be in safety to trust to a simple intimation. He would be quite right to go on with his preparations so as to be quite sure that the reclaiming days did not run out, because the other party might write to him and say, "Now we have changed our minds," and he might find that the reclaiming days had gone.

On the other hand, if a reclaiming note has not only been intimated but also printed and boxed and the case sent to the roll early in the reclaiming days, I think it would be quite out of the question that the other party should then and there sit down and pen another reclaiming note with the view of getting the expense of it in the event of success being with him. I think the matter can be fairly left to the Auditor, who, in a case where there are double reclaiming notes, will fairly judge whether there was any proper reason for lodging the second reclaiming note, and if there was not,

Nov. 17, 1911. will certainly disallow the expense of it, even although that party may be successful.
 Fairgrieve v. Chalmers.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I quite agree with what your Lordship has said. The only point which I wish safeguarded is this, viz., I do not think that the mere written notice of one party that he is going to reclaim is a thing upon which the other party is bound to rely; because the party giving that notice may perfectly well change his mind, and if he does so just on the eve of the reclaiming days running out, then his opponent may find himself in the position of having an interlocutor against him against which it is too late for him to reclaim.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT appointed the cause to be put to the Summar Roll, on the reclaiming note for the pursuer and the notice of motion for her to vary the issue for the defender.

Armour v. Duff & Co. Agent and Principal—Disclosed principal—Ship—Owner—Order from brokers for ship's stores—Liability for price.

A ship chandler received an order from a firm of "steamship owners and brokers" in these terms:—"Please supply the s.s. 'Silvia' with the following stores." He delivered the goods under the erroneous belief that the firm were the owners of the vessel, and sought to hold them liable for the price.

Held that the firm were not liable, in respect that they were acting as agents for the owners, and—since the latter could be discovered by reference to the Register of Shipping—as agents for a disclosed principal.

Expenses—Awarding—Misleading statements on record.

Circumstances in which successful defenders were refused full expenses on account of misleading statements in their defences, calculated to induce the pursuer to proceed with the action, which he might otherwise have abandoned.

2D DIVISION. IN May 1910 Thomas W. Armour, ship store merchant, brought an Sheriff of action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against T. L. Duff & Company, Lanarkshire. steamship owners and brokers. The claim of the pursuer was for payment of £228, 13s. 7d., being the amount of an account for goods sold and delivered.

The circumstances of the case, as ascertained by a proof, were as follows:—

The pursuer was a ship store merchant and ship chandler, and the defenders carried on business as "steamship owners and brokers" in Glasgow. The pursuer deponed that a Mr Dunlop told him to call on the defenders with reference to an order for stores for the s.s. "Silvia," which was then at Port-Glasgow, and mentioned that Mr

T. L. Duff, or his firm, were the owners of the vessel. The pursuer accordingly went to the defenders' office and, after an interview between him and Mr Duff, an order was sent to the pursuer on 22nd December 1909 (No. 9/2 of process) in these terms:—"Please supply the s.s. 'Silvia' with the following stores to be put on board at Port-Glasgow on Monday forenoon, 27th inst. . . .

Nov. 17, 1911.
Armour v.
Duff & Co.

(Signed) T. L. DUFF & Co."

The goods were delivered and an account rendered to the defenders, headed "Captain and owner of s.s. 'Silvia,' Dr. to Thomas W. Armour." The defenders refused to pay the account, and this action was then brought.

From the Register of Shipping at Glasgow it appeared that on 22nd December 1909 the "Silvia" was owned by the "Silvia" Steamship Company, Limited, but was subject to a mortgage in favour of persons named, that the mortgagees were in possession, and that T. L. Duff had been appointed manager. On 21st January 1910 the vessel was sold by the mortgagees in possession to the Grahamstown Shipping Company, Limited, incorporated on 18th January 1910.

The pursuer deponed that at the time the order was given he believed Mr Duff's firm to be the owners of the vessel, and that he only became aware who the real owners were in July 1910, when, in consequence of the statements in the defences, he went to the Custom House and examined the Register of Shipping.

The pursuer averred:—"The defenders . . . are owners of the s.s. 'Silvia,' or in any event, at the time of giving the order for the account now sued on, held themselves out as owners to pursuer." "Said order was given by defenders as apparent owners. The pursuer never heard of any other party being owners of s.s. 'Silvia' until defenders lodged their defences to this action."

The defenders, besides stating that the account was overcharged, averred:—"The defenders are not personally liable for the said account, which is against the owners of the said vessel. The owners are the Grahamstown Shipping Company, Limited, having their registered office at 24 George Square, Glasgow, and the pursuer knew this, and he knew that Messrs T. L. Duff & Company were merely acting as brokers, and were not personally responsible for the said account. The pursuer has in fact rendered his account against the captain and owners of said vessel. The defenders did not guarantee payment thereof."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders not having ordered the said goods from the pursuer, and same not having been supplied to the defenders, decree of absolvitor should be granted, with expenses. (2) The defenders being merely managers for principals known to the pursuer for whom the goods were ordered, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced, with expenses.

On 14th October 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the order for the goods, the price of which is sued for, given by the letter dated 22nd December 1909, No. 9/2 of process, was an order by known ship-brokers to a ship store merchant, to supply goods to the disclosed steamship 'Silvia'; (2) that the defenders are not and never were the owners of the s.s. 'Silvia': Finds that the defenders, having acted as agents for a disclosed principal, are not liable for the sum sued for; therefore assoilzies the defenders, and finds them entitled to expenses."

Nov. 17, 1911. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 19th January 1911, adhered to the judgment appealed against.*

Armour v.
Duff & Co.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) on 17th November 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The liability to pay for the stores depended, not on who was the owner of the ship, but on who made the contract.¹ On the evidence it was clear that the contract was made with the defenders, and that it was to them that credit was given.² This was not a contract for a disclosed principal, and the order was not signed as agent for the owners, and further was given by a firm who described themselves as shipowners. The suggestion that the defenders were not the responsible persons was never made in the correspondence which preceded the raising of the action, and this position was taken up for the first time in the defences. The statement in the defences that the Grahamstown Company were the owners of the vessel was so inaccurate and misleading, that, even if the defenders were successful on the merits, they should not be allowed expenses.

Argued for the respondents;—According to the ordinary rule the shipowner was the person responsible for payment for stores, and the pursuer had not shown anything in the nature of this contract to take it out of the ordinary rule. The order was in the usual form, and it was immaterial that the defenders did not sign expressly as agents.³ There was no evidence to show that the defenders had interposed their personal credit. They were not the owners, they had never been the owners, and had never pretended to be the owners. They had acted merely as agents for a disclosed principal. To order stores for a named ship was as good as disclosing the owner's name, since that could be immediately ascertained from the Register of Shipping. It was literally correct that the Grahamstown Company were the owners of the vessel when the defences were lodged, and in any case the pursuer was not misled in any way, since he knew from the examination of the register the whole history of the vessel. The defenders'

* "NOTE.—There is no question in this case that the defenders are not the owners of the 'Silvia,' but that they have the authority of the owners to purchase stores for the ship. The goods were supplied by the pursuer in terms of the written order No. 9/2 of process, and the question is whether the defenders are personally responsible in payment of the price. The question is entirely one of contract. The defenders are shipbrokers, and are said to be in a large way of business, although they are also said to be steamship owners. The order is in these terms:—'Please supply the s.s. "Silvia" with the following stores.' If a firm of brokers gives an order in these terms, it seems to me that they are acting on behalf of the owners of the ship, and, as these can be discovered, the principals of the broker are disclosed. Unless, therefore, the defenders put themselves forward as being the owners, I do not think they are liable as principals. There is no evidence of their having done so in the present case, although the pursuer says he believed them to be the owners at the time when the order was given. I think, therefore, the interlocutor of the learned Sheriff-substitute should be affirmed." misstatement—assuming it to be one—was not the consideration which induced the pursuer to proceed with the action, and should not therefore affect the question of expenses.

Armour v.
Duff & Co.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The question which was opened by the pursuer and appellant before us related to the merits of the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff. A question subsequently arose on the suggestion of the Court as to what should be done in any case with the expenses of the action ; but that was not opened upon by the appellant and does not seem to have been separately argued before the Sheriff-substitute or the Sheriff. With regard to the merits of the case I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have come to a right conclusion. The case may be looked at in two ways : either on the documents alone or on the documents taken along with the evidence which has been led.

If one takes the documents alone, one has to consider the original order given by Duff & Company along with the account which was subsequently rendered to them, and also along with the title by which the defenders are known, that is to say, "steamship owners and brokers." It is said by the pursuer that he was entitled when he went to Duff & Company—and it must be observed that they did not go to him, but that he went to them—to assume that they were owners of the steamship "Silvia." In defence of that view he does not found on any surrounding circumstances and he has to fall back on what he says is a general rule. It appears to me that we must consider what was the position of parties when the order was given. The position of parties was that Duff & Company held themselves out in two capacities—as steamship owners no doubt, but also as brokers. It is quite certain that brokers are in the habit of acting as managers for steamships belonging to others. That being so, I am of opinion that the pursuer was not entitled, simply because he found that T. L. Duff & Company were willing to give him an order, to assume that they were owners of the ship. Indeed when one looks at the proof it is fair to say that the pursuer does not take up any such position. That has been put forward by his counsel as his position now, but his true position is quite clear—namely that he proceeded on certain information which he had got from a friend, Mr Dunlop. Mr Dunlop had told him, as he says, that Duff & Company were the owners of the "Silvia." I think the effect of Mr Duff not being examined is, not to throw discredit on Mr Armour's credibility, but to lead to the inference that he must have mistaken what Mr Dunlop said—honestly mistaken it no doubt. But that being his position he says quite frankly : "Supposing I had had no previous communication with Mr Dunlop at all, and had never heard of the 'Silvia,' I would have called upon Mr Duff and I would have asked who was responsible for this . . . I took it from Mr Dunlop that T. L. Duff & Company were the owners of the ship, and for that reason I hold them responsible."

There is no moral blame upon Mr Armour in the matter : but it is clear that had he not had, what he supposed was, this information from Mr Dunlop he would have asked Mr Duff, and there is no reason to doubt that Mr Duff would have told him how the matter of the ownership stood, or he

Nov. 17, 1911. would have gone to the register to ascertain that for himself. It seems to me that that was his duty in any case. I do not say what might have happened if the matter had been reversed and if Duff & Company had gone to him and without telling him anything had simply given him an order. But in the circumstances of his going to Duff & Company it seems to me that it was his clear duty either to ask them how the matter stood or to ascertain for himself from the register what the position of matters was.

Armour v.
Duff & Co.
Lord Guthrie.

Now, it so happens that there would have been no difficulty in ascertaining from the register how things stood, because the excerpt which has been lodged shows that not only does the register contain full information as to the owners of the ship, but it shows that the ship was subject to a mortgage, it tells who the mortgagees were, and it shows that these mortgagees were in possession. In these circumstances I think the Sheriffs were right in holding, without in the least impugning Mr Armour's bona fides in the matter, that he had no right to raise this action against Duff & Company, either on the footing, which is now abandoned, that they were the true owners, or on the footing, which is still maintained, that although not the true owners they held themselves out as the true owners. I do not agree with the Sheriff-substitute in the statement he has made in his note, which was quite unnecessary for the decision of the case, when he says:—"I think the evidence is sufficient to show that the pursuer quite well knew that he was transacting with agents."

If that be the sound view, the question still remains as to the conduct of the defenders in the defences which they put forward. As I read the evidence it seems quite clear that they have made several statements which are not only inaccurate in themselves, but which might quite well have misled, and probably did mislead, the pursuer. It may be that some of these statements, if the sentences are read by themselves, are on the face of them literally accurate; but the result certainly is so misleading as this, that—ordinarily read and taking the context along with the individual sentences—the statement is distinctly made that, while the defenders are not liable for the account, the people who are liable, and the owners of this vessel, are the Grahamstown Shipping Company, Limited; and further, that the pursuer knew that that was the fact.

It is common ground that that is a totally inaccurate statement, because the interest, as owners, of the Grahamstown Company, Limited, did not arise until after the contract had been entered into. It is quite true, as appears from the proof, and from the evidence of Mr Armour himself, that he came to be aware of how the register stood, and what information it contained, at a very early date, because he says that when the defences were lodged he then got the information by going to the Custom House and getting a copy of the register. And therefore I do not think that this is a case where one can say either that the pursuer would be entitled to his expenses, or that the defenders should have their expenses entirely disallowed. In such cases you cannot say absolutely whether, if the pursuer had not been misled by the defenders, he would have gone on with his action or not; but you can certainly say that under the advice of his legal advisers he might not have gone on with his action.

I should suggest for your Lordships' consideration that a just result would be to hold that down to the date of the Sheriff-substitute's inter-locutor no expenses should be allowed to either party, and the defenders should get their expenses subsequent to that date. I think that result would mark the sense of the Court that when defenders are brought into Court it is their duty to make a full disclosure of their position, and that in any event it is their duty not to do as the defenders here did—to make a statement which, if they had chosen to consider the information within their own knowledge, they would have seen to be entirely misleading, and not only misleading, but calculated to induce the pursuer to go on with an action with which he might otherwise not have proceeded.

Nov. 17, 1911.
Armour v.
Duff & Co.
Lord Guthrie.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think this is a very unfortunate action, because if the pursuer had acted with a little less precipitation, and the defenders had treated the case with more candour, it would have been obvious to the parties at a very early stage that there was nothing to fight about. The account was substantially admitted, and each of the three parties who might be suggested as being liable for it was perfectly solvent and able to meet it. Yet we have had a dispute going into three Courts as to whether the particular party who is sued was the person who ought to have been sued in the first instance.

On the merits of this case, such as they are, I think the Sheriffs have reached a sound conclusion. The Sheriff expresses his view in a single sentence. He says,—“The order is in these terms:—‘Please supply the s.s. “Silvia” with the following stores.’ If a firm of brokers gives an order in these terms it seems to me that they are acting on behalf of the owners of the ship, and, as these can be discovered, the principals of the broker are disclosed.” I think that is a substantially accurate statement of the law applicable to a contract of this kind, with this qualification that the owners of the ship are not bound unless the firm of brokers who gave the order had their authority to place it. In this case it is perfectly evident that the defenders had a mandate from the legal owners of the ship for the time being—that is, the mortgagees in possession. This was disclosed upon the face of the register, and it was on the owners’ behalf that they gave the order.

It is therefore very surprising that the defenders when they came to state defences did not take up the true position, but said that they ordered the goods as agents for the owners, and that the owners were the Grahams-town Shipping Company, who were in fact the owners at the date of the proof, but were not the owners of the ship at the time when the order was placed. That was a very misleading statement, and was calculated, as Lord Guthrie has indicated, to induce the pursuer to go on with his action, because he felt that he was able to refute the only defence that had been put forward. I think we ought to penalise the conduct of the defenders in the way that Lord Guthrie has suggested, by refusing them their expenses before the Sheriff-substitute. I think it would be going too far if we carried that refusal beyond the Sheriff-substitute’s Court, especially as the pursuer never seems really to have ascertained what his true legal position was, and came before the Sheriff and before us maintaining that upon the proof and documents he had established personal liability against the defenders.

Nov. 17, 1911. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with what your Lordships propose. I will say for myself that if I had been deciding this case alone I should have been a little more drastic in dealing with the defenders' expenses. I think this case is—shall I call it—a model of what ought not to be. I never have seen such a defence as that stated here. It is absolutely misleading. Your Lordships have dealt with it by proposing that expenses should not be allowed up to the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. While I concur in that, I repeat what I said at the beginning, that I would have taken a more drastic course had I been left to myself.

Armour v.
Duff & Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutors appealed against, except in so far as the finding for expenses in the said interlocutors is concerned, which is hereby recalled: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor of 14th October 1910: Therefore of new assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court from 14th October 1910, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and report."

Partnership—Liabilities of partners—Partner of firm of law-agents acting as secretary of Company—Misapplication of Company's funds—Liability of firm—Money received "in the course of its business"—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 11 (b).

The Partnership Act, 1890, enacts, sec. 11 (b), "Where a firm in the course of its business receives money or property of a third person, and the money or property so received is misapplied by one or more of the partners while it is in the custody of the firm; the firm is liable to make good the loss."

C., a law-agent, was appointed salaried secretary to a mining and exploring company in May 1907. On 1st August 1907 he and H., another law-agent, entered into an agreement "to become partners as law-agents and conveyancers" on certain conditions, including, inter alia, that the partners should devote their whole time to the business, and that "all fees, including directors' fees, salaries, and other emoluments payable to either party individually" should be credited to the firm. C. remained secretary of the Company until 17th December of that year, when his firm of C. & H. were appointed secretaries in his place. In February 1908 C. absconded, and it was discovered that during the whole period of his connection with the Company he had been embezzling their funds. H., who was completely ignorant of C.'s dishonesty, admitted that the firm and he were liable for the sums embezzled after 17th December.

In an action at the instance of the Company against the firm and H. for repayment, inter alia, of sums embezzled between 1st August and 17th December it was proved that during this period the clerical work connected with the Company's business was done by the firm's staff; that entries connected with the Company's business were made in the firm's books ; and that C. paid into the current bank account of the firm sums which he received from the public in payment for shares in the Company amounting to £925, of which only £175 was ever applied for behoof of the Company. It was also proved that at the date of the first of these payments by C., the firm's current bank account was overdrawn by £2601 ; that during the remainder of the period the overdraft always exceeded that amount ; and that during this period C. was indebted to the firm for upwards of £1000, and drew £1840 from the firm's bank account for his own purposes.

The Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that they were not liable under the Partnership Act, 1890, sec. 11 (b), in respect that the monies had not been received by the firm "in the course of its business" ; and (2) that they were not liable at common law in respect that they had discharged the onus which lay on them of proving that the firm had not been gratuitously benefited by the payments into its bank account.

(REPORTED ante, on a question of caution, 1909 S. C. 1390.)

DIVISION.
Lord
Skerrington.

The New Mining and Exploring Syndicate, Limited, brought an action against the dissolved firm of Chalmers & Hunter, Writers to the Signet, Edinburgh, and against Hugh B. Hunter, W.S., Edinburgh, as a partner of the firm and as an individual, and R. M. MacLay, C.A., Glasgow, trustee on the sequestrated estate of R. S. Chalmers, the only other partner of the firm. The conclusions of the action were for payment of a sum representing the amount of monies belonging to the pursuers, which they alleged had been embezzled by Chalmers while he, and his firm in succession to him, were acting as secretaries of the pursuers' Company. It was admitted that the sums had been embezzled without the knowledge of the defender Hunter, who was entirely ignorant of his partner's dishonesty.

The action was defended by Hunter as an individual and on behalf of the dissolved firm, but no defences were lodged by Chalmers' trustee.

A proof was led before the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) on 13th December 1910, when the following facts (which will be found more fully set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Mackenzie) were established :—

The pursuers were a mining Company registered in Scotland, the board of directors including in their number Robert Scott Chalmers, S.S.C., Edinburgh. At the first meeting of directors, held on 21st May 1907, Chalmers was appointed secretary of the Company, and also law-agent.

On 1st August 1907 Chalmers entered into a partnership with the defender Hunter, a Writer to the Signet, the agreement of co-partnership providing, inter alia, "the parties agree to become partners as law-agents and conveyancers, and to carry on the business at present carried on by the said Robert Scott Chalmers as law-agent and conveyancer, on the following terms and conditions, namely . . . (7) Both partners shall devote their whole time and attention to the business. . . . (10) Neither partner shall be entitled to sign the firm name to any cheque, bill, or other negotiable instrument for other than copartnership purposes. (11) All fees, including directors' fees, salaries, and other emoluments payable to either partner individually shall be credited to the firm unless by special agreement between the partners to the contrary. . . ."

On 17th December 1907 Chalmers resigned the secretaryship, and the firm of Chalmers & Hunter were formally appointed secretaries in his place. In February 1908 Chalmers, having become involved in financial difficulties, left the country, and it was discovered that, between May 1907, when he was appointed secretary, and the date of his leaving the country, he had embezzled large sums of money belonging to the Company. As secretary of the Company he was in the habit of receiving from applicants for shares the price of shares allotted to them, and the monies so received he appropriated to his private purposes.

The pursuers did not ultimately contend that the compearing defenders were liable for sums embezzled by Chalmers prior to 1st August 1907, the date of the partnership, and, on the other hand, the defenders admitted liability for the sums embezzled by Chalmers after 17th December 1907, the date when the firm were appointed secretaries. Therefore the only question that remained in the case was the defenders' liability for sums embezzled between 1st August and 17th December.

During that period Chalmers paid into the current bank account of the firm sums which he had received on behalf of the pursuers amounting in all to £925, and of that amount only £175 was ever paid out for behoof of the pursuers.

At the date when the first of these payments was made into the current account the account was overdrawn to the extent of some £2601. During the remainder of the period in question the overdraft was always in excess of that amount.* During the whole period in question Chalmers was indebted to the firm for upwards of Nov. 18, 1911. £1000, and drew out of the firm's bank account, for other than firm purposes, sums amounting to £1840.

The clerical work connected with Chalmers' individual appointments, including his secretaryship to the pursuers' Company, was done by the firm's staff, and in Chalmers' absence Hunter superintended the work. A letter, dated 27th August 1907, relating to the pursuers' business, was signed, in the handwriting of Hunter, "Chalmers & Hunter, Secretaries." The cash-book of the firm included payments and receipts on behalf of the pursuers, and the firm ledger included an account in the pursuers' name. There was evidence which tended to show that a considerable proportion of the firm's income was derived from emoluments payable to Chalmers in respect of appointments held by him as an individual.

New Mining
and Exploring Syndicate,
Limited, v.
Chalmers &
Hunter.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The sum sued for having been embezzled or misapplied by the said Robert Scott Chalmers while a partner of the defenders Chalmers & Hunter, and in the course of the said firm's business, as condescended on, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (4) The sums sued for received since 1st August 1907 having been received by the firm of Chalmers & Hunter in the course of its business, and having been misapplied by the partners, or one of them, while in the custody of the firm, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. (6) The defenders having in their custody or possession the sums belonging to the pursuers sued for, or at any rate a portion thereof, as condescended on, decree should be granted therefor as craved. (7) The firm of Chalmers & Hunter by their course of dealing having made the whole transactions had with the pursuers part of the ordinary business of the firm, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved.

The compearing defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons so far as directed against these defenders, and the action as against them should be dismissed. (3) (a) These defenders not being responsible to the pursuers for any of the sums embezzled by R. S. Chalmers prior to 17th December 1907, as condescended on, and (b) these defenders having, prior to the raising of the action, admitted liability and offered to pay all sums embezzled by R. S. Chalmers during the firm's tenure of the secretaryship, these defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

On 23rd December 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced an interlocutor in which he, inter alia, sustained the third plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are a mining company which was registered in Scotland on 17th May 1907. Three of the directors lived in Manchester, and the remaining director was a Scottish solicitor called Chalmers, who was also the solicitor and secretary of the Company. He absconded about the end of February 1908, having embezzled a considerable amount of the pursuers' money. The object of the action is to make Mr Hunter, a Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, liable for Chalmers' defalcations. Mr Hunter had the misfortune to enter into partnership with Chalmers as from 1st August 1907 while the defalcations were going on. It is common ground that Mr Hunter is a man of honour, and that he neither knew nor suspected that his partner was dishonest. The action is defended by Mr Hunter in his own name and in that of his dissolved firm of Chalmers & Hunter.

Nov. 18, 1911. The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 9th and 10th November 1911.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The defenders were bound to repay to the pursuers the money embezzled by Chalmers either in respect of sec. 11 (b) of the Partnership Act, 1890,¹ or in virtue of the common law doctrine "Nemo debet ex alieno damno lucrari."² (1) Partnership Act.—The money had admittedly been "misapplied" by Chalmers, one of the partners, and the only question, therefore, was whether it had been received by the "firm in the course of its business." In the circumstances it clearly had been so received. What constituted the course of a firm's business was in every case a matter for proof. The mere fact that a firm styled itself a firm of law-agents did not free the firm from liability for the actions of one of its partners in another sphere, if that other sphere was in fact included in the ordinary scope

The trustee on Chalmers' sequestrated estates is also cited, but does not appear as a defender.

"The moneys embezzled by Chalmers did not come into his possession in his capacity as the Company's solicitor. They consisted of sums paid for shares by members of the public to whom Chalmers gave in return a receipt as secretary of the Company. A secretary as such has no authority to receive money on behalf of his employer. His office has been described as a humble one—George Whitechurch, Limited, v. Cavanagh, [1902] A. C. 117, at p. 124; Tendring Hundred Waterworks Company v. Jones, [1903] 2 Ch. 615, at p. 621. But the pursuers allowed Chalmers to handle their cash, believing no doubt, as did also Mr Hunter, that he was an honest man. The embezzlements began before the Company was registered, and they amounted to more than £500 at 1st August 1907 when the partnership of Chalmers & Hunter came into existence. About £1200 more was embezzled between that date and 17th December when, as the pursuers allege in condescendence 4, 'Messrs Chalmers & Hunter were formally appointed secretaries of the pursuers in place of the said Robert Scott Chalmers.' The minute of appointment in favour of the firm bore that it was made 'at the request of the secretary' (Chalmers). In asking for and accepting this appointment on behalf of his firm I hold that Chalmers exceeded his powers under the partnership agreement, which stated that the parties were to carry on business as law-agents and conveyancers. It is no part of a solicitor's business to act as secretary or treasurer to a company. Although Chalmers acted without the authority of Mr Hunter, the latter, when he came in January 1908 to know of the appointment, ratified it, and so made it binding upon the firm and himself as from its date, but no earlier. It was not proved that Mr Hunter knew that the appointment was virtually as secretary and treasurer; but he has raised no question on this head, and has admitted liability for the sum of £200 which was embezzled by Chalmers in the two months during which the firm held the appointment. The only dispute is as to his liability for the money embezzled by Chalmers between 1st August and 17th December 1907.

"I hold it proved that between 21st May 1907, when Chalmers was appointed secretary, and 17th December, when the firm was appointed to that office, no agreement of any kind, either express or implied, was made between the pursuers or their directors on the one part and either Chalmers or Mr Hunter on the other part in regard to the secretaryship. It follows that the original appointment, which was by minute of the directors and for no defined period, remained in force until 17th December 1907, and that until that date there was no contract between the pursuers and the firm of the firm's activities.¹ In the present case it was clear from the deed of copartnership that company work was expected to be an important part of the business of the future firm,² and in actual practice it had been proved that company work, i.e. the secretaryships of companies, had been the firm's most important source of revenue. In particular the duties in connection with the pursuers' Company had been treated as firm business; the clerical work had been done by the office staff; the defender had given his assistance and had, within the period in question, signed at least one letter "Chalmers & Hunter, Secretaries," and the firm's ordinary books contained numerous entries in connection with the pursuers' Company. Even, however, if the business in question had been outwith the strict line of the partnership, and had been transacted without the sanction of Hunter, still the defenders were liable in respect that the transactions in question had gone through the firm's books and ought therefore to have been known except as regards any legal business which the former employed the firm to execute. In point of fact, however, the firm did not perform any legal business for the pursuers prior to January 1908. The pursuers' counsel pointed out that partners are agents for each other and for the firm (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 39, sec. 5), and he referred to the law as to undisclosed principals and ratification with the object of showing that the pursuers were now entitled to treat the firm as if it had made a contract with them (the pursuers) through the agency of Chalmers. But these rules of law presuppose the existence of a contract upon which they can operate. The unauthorised contract of 17th December 1907, which Chalmers purported to make on behalf of his firm, and Mr Hunter's subsequent ratification, illustrate the law as to ratification which was fully considered and explained by the House of Lords in Keighley, Maxsted, & Company v. Durant, [1901] A. C. 240. If the pursuers could have proved a similar contract of an earlier date professing to bind the firm, and duly ratified subsequently, they would have made some advance towards gaining their case. Again, if on or after 1st August 1907, Chalmers had made a new contract with the pursuers for his appointment as secretary without mentioning the firm, it would have been possible to argue that such contract had been entered into by him as the authorised agent of the firm who were his undisclosed principals. Such an argument, though possible, would have been obviously bad, because a contract for the personal services of one man cannot be converted by any legal subtlety into a contract for the personal services of two men—See Mabon v. Christie, 6 D. 619.

"The pursuers' counsel founded specially on two clauses in the partnership agreement, viz.—(Seven) 'Both partners shall devote their whole time and attention to the business.' . . . (Eleven) 'All fees, including directors' fees, salaries, and other emoluments payable to either partner individually shall be credited to the firm unless by special agreement between the partners to the contrary.' These clauses show that in a certain sense it was part of the business of the firm of Chalmers & Hunter that its partners should hold individual appointments and so earn profits for the firm, and that a partner attended to the firm's business when he did his duty as a director or secretary under an appointment in favour of himself as an individual. In no proper sense, however, can it be said that a firm's business includes matters as to which the firm has no right and no duty to concern itself.

"The proof did not, in my opinion, add anything material so far as

The cases of Keighley, Maxsted, & Company v. Durant,² and Mabon v. Christie,³ were distinguishable. The former was the case of an isolated transaction, the latter a case in which it was very properly held that the proprietors of an estate who had appointed a factor were not bound to recognise his partner as their factor. (2) Common Law.—It was well established that no one was entitled to derive a gratuitous benefit out of another person's loss.⁴ The paying in to the firm's account of the sums embezzled was per se a gratuitous benefit, and it was not necessary for the pursuers to trace these sums further, regards the question of Mr Hunter's liability. It was proved that the clerical work connected with Chalmers' individual appointments was done by the firm's staff, and that in his partner's absence Mr Hunter lent a hand to do what was necessary. It was also suggested, though not clearly proved, that a considerable proportion of the firm's income was derived from emoluments payable to Chalmers as an individual. The volume of this kind of business and the way in which the necessary clerical assistance was provided are matters which do not affect the argument. One might figure an extreme case where two pluralists who had no professional practice agreed to divide as partners the emoluments of their several individual offices and to provide at joint expense suitable house-room and clerks to the satisfaction of the various employers. Seeing that such a firm could not sue any of the employers for salary, it is difficult to understand why it should be supposed to owe these employers any duty except the ordinary duty of honesty which it owed to the whole world. Another point much insisted on was the firm's mode of book-keeping. Their cash-book included payments and receipts on behalf of the pursuers, and their ledger included an account in name of the pursuers. Even if Mr Hunter had known and approved of this mode of book-keeping, the fact would not have affected the legal relation of the firm to the pursuers except if and in so far as Mr Hunter had notice from the entries in the firm's books of his partner's breach of trust. Technically it was incorrect that any of the pursuers' transactions should be recorded in the firm's books, but it was natural that Chalmers should borrow from his firm what he needed for petty cash advances on behalf of the pursuers. Of course it was inexcusable on his part to pay the pursuers' money into the firm's overdrawn bank account, and one wonders why he took the trouble to record such transactions. But it was not suggested that Mr Hunter saw these entries and so had notice of the breach of trust. It was said that he was negligent in not supervising his partner's book-keeping. I do not agree. He was entitled to rely on Chalmers so long as he believed him to be honest and competent. In any case Mr Hunter and his firm owed no duty to the pursuers as to how they kept their books.

"For the foregoing reason I hold that the firm and Mr Hunter incurred no liability to the pursuers under any section of the Partnership Act. Chalmers' wrongful acts were not committed while he was 'acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm or with the authority of his copartners'

the automatic reduction of the firm's overdraft being in itself a benefit to the firm.¹ When these sums were paid into the firm's account they became the property of the firm; and it was quite irrelevant, in a question with the pursuers, for the defenders to say that, by a further fraud of Chalmers, the monies had in fact been appropriated to his benefit and not to that of the firm.

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuers' argument failed on both branches. (1) Partnership Act.—The payments made to Chalmers as secretary of the Company were not received by the "firm in the course of its business" within the meaning of sec. 11 (b) of the Partnership Act. The partnership according to the agreement was "as law-agents and conveyancers," and accordingly Chalmers' secretaryship did not fall within the scope of the partnership business. It was moreover purely as secretary that the monies came into Chalmers' hands—it being in no way the business of the firm to receive them—

(section 10). Nor was the pursuers' money received by Chalmers when 'acting within the scope of his apparent authority' (section 11 (a)). Nor did the firm itself receive the money 'in the course of its business' (section 11 (b)). Lastly, Mr Hunter had no notice of the breach of trust (section 13 (1)), and the money cannot now be followed and recovered as it is not in the possession and control of the firm (section 13 (2)). Subject to the provisos (1) and (2), section 13 is clear to the effect that the employment by one partner of trust property in the business of the firm does not create any liability against the other partners. 'If a partner, being a trustee, improperly employs trust property in the business or on the account of the partnership, no other partner is liable for the trust property to the persons beneficially interested therein.' In the 7th edition of his book on Partnership (p. 192), Lord Lindley states that this section has not introduced any change in the previous law, and he quotes two cases where trust money having been applied in paying partnership debts, or to other partnership purposes, the amount so applied was held to be not provable against the 'joint estate.' Though a firm in Scotland is a separate persona I do not suppose that our law was different. I do not, however, interpret the statute as excluding liability on the part of the firm and its innocent partners in a case where it could be proved that the firm and partners had been actually enriched by the dishonesty of a partner who had misapplied trust money in paying off the firm's liabilities. Such a case is unlikely to occur in real life. The first victims of a dishonest partner are his firm and copartners, and Mr Hunter is no exception to the general rule. If, however, such an exceptional case should occur, a remedy would be found in what Stair (i. 6, 33) calls 'that common ground of equity, "Nemo debet ex alieno damno lucrari."' The same rule of equity was stated in other words by Lord Chancellor Campbell in an English case cited by Lord Shand in his opinion in Clydesdale Bank v. Paul, (1877) 4 R. 626, 628,—'I consider it to be an established principle that a person cannot avail himself of what has been obtained by the fraud of another unless he is not only innocent of the fraud, but has given some valuable consideration.' This equitable rule has no application to the facts of the present case. Although about £925 of the pursuers' money—which was trust money in the hands of their agent Chalmers—was paid by him into the firm's bank account between 1st August and 17th December 1907, and was never repaid to the pursuers, the firm and Mr Hunter are not a whit the richer, but, on the contrary, are much the poorer for Chalmers' frauds. The pursuers' counsel

Nov. 18, 1911. and it was purely as secretary that he embezzled them.¹ The monies further had never been in any true sense "in the custody of the firm"; they ought to have been paid direct by Chalmers into the Company's own account. Indeed, strictly speaking, they ought never to have been received by Chalmers at all, for a secretary had, as such, no power to receive money on behalf of his employer.² The pursuers accordingly were endeavouring to bring within the scope of firm business an appointment which was not a firm appointment and a series of actions which, in any event, did not fall within the scope of that appointment. The clause in the contract of copartnership that fees and salaries were to be credited to the firm did not mean that the business in respect of which the fees and salaries were payable must necessarily be firm business. (2) Common Law.—If there was no case under the statute there was no case at common law, because the statute merely codified the common law. But assuming that there was the difference founded on the case of Clydesdale Bank v. Paul, already cited, and in particular on Lord Shand's opinion. The opinions of the Lord Ordinary (Rutherford Clark) and of Lord President Inglis (in which Lord Deas and Lord Mure concurred) were based on a rule of the law of agency to the effect that if an agent commits a fraud 'while doing his business of agent,' the principal is liable, at any rate to the extent to which he has benefited. In other words, assuming that the principal is entitled to repudiate the transaction (which may not always be the case) he must repudiate it as a whole, and he cannot at the same time refuse to return the consideration received by his agent from the third party. In the present case, Chalmers' fraudulent acts were not done by him in his capacity as agent for the firm, and accordingly the firm is not called upon to elect whether it shall repudiate or ratify his actings. The ground of judgment in Clydesdale Bank v. Paul is really covered in the case of a firm by sections 10 and 11 of the Act. A difficulty arises from Lord Shand's reference to the general rule of equity. With the greatest possible respect, I doubt whether the judgment can be supported on that ground. Further, it humbly appears to me that the rule of agency law founded on by the majority of the Judges is different, both in principle and in practical working, from the general rule of equity invoked by Lord Shand.

"I have already said that Chalmers' frauds did not arise out of his or the firm's employment as solicitors. I assume that the firm did execute various pieces of legal business for the pursuers, and that if the whole facts were examined the inference would be that the pursuers employed the firm and not Chalmers as an individual. In the course of the argument a good deal was said as to the effect of the agreement of copartnership upon Chalmers' former clients. For the sake of clearness I may state my views, though the question does not really arise. (1) As regards legal work which Chalmers was employed to do before the partnership began, and as to which there was no new contract express or implied either with the firm or any partner, I should have thought it clear that the firm could neither sue nor be sued, even though the work was in fact done by them. My only difficulty arises from the contrary opinion of Lord Kyllachy in Tully v. Ingram, (1891) 19 R. 65, 70. In the Inner-House the Lord President pointedly suggested by the pursuers between the case at common law and under Nov. 18, 1911. the statute, it was necessary for them, if they were to succeed at common law, to prove that the firm had received a gratuitous benefit. Here, however, the benefit, if there was any benefit, was not gratuitous. Chalmers was indebted to the firm, and the payments accordingly were not gifts but payments in consideration of debt. But, in point of fact, there was really no benefit; the mere fact that the money had been temporarily in the firm's account was not a benefit,¹ and the pursuers had entirely failed to discharge the onus which lay on them of proving that, apart from a mere question of bookkeeping, the defenders had received some tangible benefit from Chalmers' fraud. Further, it was to be noted that Hunter had no reason to imagine that the money embezzled had belonged to the Company, the cheques having all been payable to Chalmers as an individual.

New Mining
and Exploring Syndicate,
Limited, v.
Chalmers &
Hunter.

At advising on 18th November 1911,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The purpose of this action is to make the defender liable for the defalcations of his late partner, Robert Scott Chalmers, S.S.C., who acted as secretary of the pursuers—the New Mining and Exploring Syndicate, Limited. It is common ground that the defender was entirely ignorant of his partner's dishonesty. The question to be decided in this case is which of two innocent parties is to suffer for Chalmers' fraud.

The pursuers seek to recover from the defender certain payments which are traced into the firm's bank account, and this they do upon two grounds, (1) under section 11 (b) of the Partnership Act, 1890, which provides, "Where a firm in the course of its business receives money or property of a third person, and the money or property so received is misapplied by one or more of the partners while it is in the custody of the firm; the firm is liable to make good the loss"; and (2) at common law, on the ground that no one can retain a gratuitous benefit which he has obtained through the fraud of another.

Three periods were dealt with in argument—the first being from 17th May to 1st August 1907. It was stated that during these months £525 of the Company's money was misappropriated by Chalmers whilst secretary of the Company. Mr Hunter did not, however, enter into partnership with Chalmers until the 1st of August 1907, and pursuers' counsel admitted reserved his opinion on this question (pp. 73, 74). (2) As regards clients of Chalmers who knew that he had assumed a partner and who employed him without mention of the firm, it would be a jury question whether the contract was with him as an individual or as agent for the firm. Generally, I think, the inference would be that he acted for his firm, but if the circumstances pointed to an individual employment, say, as permanent solicitor to a corporation, the inference might be the other way. The British Homes Assurance Corporation, Limited, v. Paterson, [1902] 2 Ch. 404, is an example of a case where a client was held to have employed a solicitor individually, and not his firm. (3) As regards clients who employed Chalmers without knowing of the partnership, the firm might sue or be sued as Chalmers' undisclosed principal, if that exceptional rule of law is applicable to so personal a contract as the employment of a solicitor. I express no opinion as to this." [His Lordship then dealt with a point which is not reported.]

Nov. 18, 1911. that no claim could be made against the defender prior to that date. The real question in the case relates to the second period, from 1st August to 17th December 1907. Hunter and Chalmers entered into partnership as law-agents and conveyancers on 1st August 1907. During the period from that date to 17th December 1907 Chalmers was secretary of the Company. It is alleged that £925 of the pursuers' money was during this period paid by Chalmers into the firm's bank account; that he paid out for behoof of the pursuers' Company only £175; and that he embezzled the balance of £750. The defender is sought to be made liable for this sum. The third period was from 17th December 1907 to the end of February 1908, when Chalmers absconded. During this time the firm acted as secretaries to the Company. The defender admits his liability for a sum of £200, but counter claims for sums which in cumulo amount to more than this. These counter claims have been given effect to by the Lord Ordinary. As regards £100 there is a question which will be referred to later on.

New Mining
and Exploring Syndicate,
Limited, v.
Chalmers &
Hunter.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Confining attention to the second period, from 1st August to 17th December, the claim by the pursuers under the Partnership Act, 1890, section 11 (b), depends upon whether the firm received the money—"in the course of its business." Now, during this period it was Mr Chalmers who was secretary of the Company—not the firm. The pursuers' counsel laid great stress upon the terms of the agreement of copartnership between the defender and Chalmers, particularly the provisions (7) "both parties shall devote their whole time and attention to the business, . . ." and (11) "all fees, including directors' fees, salaries, and other emoluments payable to either partner individually, shall be credited to the firm unless by special agreement between the partners to the contrary . . ." It was argued that a large part of the firm's business consisted of work in connection with companies; that the directors of the pursuers' Company were aware of the assumption of the defender as a partner by Chalmers; that the partners treated the pursuers' business as part of that conducted by the firm; that this was evidenced by the way the books were kept; and that consequently the Company could elect even after the event to hold the firm liable for what their secretary had done. I am unable to assent to this view. Hunter and Chalmers agreed to become partners "as law-agents and conveyancers" according to the terms of the copartnership agreement. The firm were not secretaries of the Company, nor indeed were they its law-agents. Chalmers was the secretary, giving his personal service. There is only one item of evidence put forward against this, and that is a letter, dated 27th August 1907, signed "Chalmers & Hunter, Secretaries." The signature of the firm is in the handwriting of the defender—Mr Hunter—but the letter is a typewritten one, and the signature "Chalmers & Hunter" might well have been appended per incuriam.

So far as the £925 is stated to have consisted of cheques, these were made payable to Chalmers as an individual. As the Lord Ordinary points out in his reference to the case of Mabon v. Christie,¹ it is impossible in the circumstances to hold that the contract by which Chalmers gave his personal service to the Company became a contract under which the firm was bound. I am accordingly of opinion that the case sought to be made against the defender under the Partnership Act, 1890, fails. It was admitted in argument that if liability could not be established against the firm under section 11 (b) no case could be made under any of the other sections.

The case against the defender at common law creates more difficulty. An argument was submitted by the Dean of Faculty on behalf of the defender that sections 10 and 11 of the Partnership Act, 1890, contained all the grounds upon which one partner could be made liable for the default of another. According to this contention the defaulter must have received the money in his capacity as agent. It was argued that the case of the *Clydesdale Bank v. Paul*¹ did not go further than this. It is no doubt quite true that, if it is sought to make a principal liable as such, agency must be established. The common law ground of liability, however, rests upon a much wider basis. The Lord Ordinary quotes the passage from *Stair*² in which it is described as "that common ground of equity, 'Nemo debet ex alieno damno lucrari.'" This principle is independent of the question of agency. The Lord Ordinary refers to Lord Shand's dicta in Paul's case,¹ and expresses a doubt whether the judgment there could be supported on the general rule of equity. It is not necessary to discuss that question here. No doubt is expressed in the Lord Ordinary's opinion as to the existence of such a general rule of equity—his opinion being that the equitable rule has no application to the facts of the present case. It is here that, in my opinion, the difficulty of the case lies, although in the conclusion I arrive at the same result as the Lord Ordinary. The question is whether the firm took a gratuitous benefit. It was argued for the defender that consideration was given by the firm, because at the time the payments in were made by Chalmers he was the firm's debtor, and that accordingly it must be regarded that he was merely paying his debt. The answer to this, in my opinion, is that in point of fact he never did pay his debt. It is no doubt of importance (as will be adverted to later on) that he was debtor to the firm during the period in question, but I cannot see evidence in the case to entitle me to take the view that he paid his debt to the firm and obtained a discharge for the amount.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The question, in my opinion, really depends on the view taken of the firm's bank account. I should say first of all that I think it sufficiently established that there are five credit entries in that account which represent money of the pursuers' Company. This is instructed by the evidence and minute of admissions which I need not go into in detail. The sums are £300 paid in in notes on 7th November 1907 in respect of the allotments of shares in the pursuers' Company to the brothers Reid; £200, part of a cheque of £350 in favour of Chalmers paid in on 8th November in respect of an allotment of shares to Dr Cramer; £150 by cheque to Chalmers paid in on 9th November in respect of an allotment of shares to Mr Barbour; £25, part of a cheque for £175 to Chalmers, paid in on 13th November in respect of shares allotted to Mr George Campbell, and £250 paid by cheque to Chalmers on 9th December 1907 in respect of shares allotted to Mr James Donaldson.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

From one point of view it may no doubt be represented that the firm took a gratuitous benefit from these payments to credit of its bank account. At the date of the first of the payments the account was overdrawn to the extent of £2601, 12s. 7d., and the argument is that the amount of the overdraft was extinguished pro tanto by the payment in of the £300. If, however, the debit side of the account is examined, it is found that at the close of the banking operations on the 7th of November, the day when the £300 was paid in, so far from the overdraft being diminished, it was increased to the figure of £2934, 14s. 10d. The pursuers, however, say, We have charged you, the firm, with receipt of £300 of the Company's money—you do not discharge yourselves of the receipt of that money by merely pointing to the fact that cheques were drawn the same day which in cumulo are much more than sufficient to draw out the amount paid in. This in the ordinary case would appear to me to be a formidable argument. I have come, however, to be of opinion that it is sufficiently met by the evidence led for the defender. It is conclusively proved that Chalmers drew out of the firm's bank account for other than firm purposes sums amounting to £1840. It is also proved that throughout the whole of the period in question he was in debt to the firm for upwards of £1000. There is a want of specification about both these items of evidence. When, however, it is said that Chalmers was throughout a debtor to the firm for the amount stated, I think it may fairly be held to mean that he had drawn out by upwards of £1000 more than he had put in, including in his payments to credit the amount of the pursuers' money. This being the case, it is impossible, in my opinion, to say that the firm took a gratuitous benefit to the extent of the £300. If the succeeding payments are scrutinised in the same way, the same considerations, I think, apply to them. As already stated the £300 was paid in on the 7th of November and the last of the payments—the sum of £250—on the 9th of December. The amounts of the overdraft, as noted on No. 23 of process, are during the whole of this time always in excess of the sum of £2601, 12s. 7d., with which the period commences. The amount of the overdraft on the 9th of December is £2611, 15s. 4d.

An onus is put on the defender by the pursuers when they prove that money belonging to them was paid into the bank account—the onus being to show that the firm was not enriched thereby. On an examination of the bank account, taken with the whole evidence in the case, I have come to be of opinion, though not without difficulty, that this onus has been discharged by the defender. The facts of the case make it like one in which a partner of a firm puts cash into the firm's safe for a limited period which he takes out again. The fact that the money has been deposited in the safe does not per se benefit the firm.

I should notice another way of putting the case against the defender, which is this. At the close of the day on 15th July 1908 he squared off the bank account by paying in the sum of £224, 5s. 7d. It was argued that, but for the five credit entries I have above referred to, the amount he would have had to pay would have been swelled by the sum of £925. I am not satisfied of this. It is not established that the bank would have allowed the overdraft to mount up, and it may fairly be said that the sums which were allowed to be drawn out were to a certain extent in respect Nov. 18. 1911. of the sums which were paid in. The defender's answer was that the amount of the overdraft was limited by the value of the securities deposited. Here the proof is deficient, as I regret to say it is on other points in the case. It is not proved what the value of the securities deposited was, nor what limit the bank put upon the amount of the overdraft. For the reasons, however, previously stated, I think there is sufficient in the case to entitle the defender to escape liability. The Corporation of Edinburgh, under powers conferred by Acts of Parliament, issued Corporation stock, the certificates of which bore that the holders were the proprietors of a certain value "of Edinburgh Corporation two and a half per cent Redeemable Stock, subject to the Acts of Parliament relating thereto. . . . Redeemable at par after Whitsunday 1927."

Held, on a construction of the certificate, together with the Acts which authorised, and the resolution of the Corporation which effected, the creation of the stock, that the Corporation were bound on the application of the holders to redeem the stock at par at Whitsunday 1927, and had not merely an option of so doing.

ON 21st October 1910 the British Linen Bank brought an action EXTRA against the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of DIVISION.

under which the defenders in 1897 created and issued £750,000 two defenders are bound to redeem the said stock immediately on the expiry of the 15th day of May 1927 on the application of the holders thereof, and are not entitled to postpone the right of the holders of the said stock to have the same redeemed by the defenders for any further period after the said 15th day of May 1927."

The circumstances connected with the issuing of the stock were as

Nov. 18, 1911. follows:—On 7th April 1897 the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of Edinburgh passed the following resolutions:—
 British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh. “First. That under the authority and subject to the provisions of the Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894,* and the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896,† the Corporation do hereby, in exercise of their several statutory powers, create stock to be called the Edinburgh Corporation 2½ per cent Redeemable Stock, and to be issued to an amount which shall be sufficient for the following purposes, but not exceeding £750,000 . . .

“Second. That such stock shall be issued at the price, and shall bear the dividends, and be transferable in the manner hereinafter specified: (that is to say) (a) The minimum price of issue to be £99 per cent, the first dividend to be payable on 11th November 1897, for the half-year ending on that date . . . (d) Dividends at £2, 10s. per cent per annum, to be payable half-yearly at the terms of Martinmas (11th November) and Whitsunday (15th May) . . .

“Third. That such stock shall be redeemable at par after the expiration of a period of thirty years from 15th May 1897.”

Thereafter they issued a prospectus‡ in the following terms:—

* The Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. lvi.) enacts:—

“ . . . Whereas it is expedient that the Corporation should be authorised to exercise their statutory borrowing powers for the time being by means of the creation and issue of Corporation stock as in this Act provided . . .

“Sec. 5 (1) Where the Corporation have for the time being any statutory borrowing power then, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the Corporation may from time to time by resolution exercise the power by creation of redeemable stock to be from time to time issued for such amount within the limit of the power at such price to bear such half-yearly or other dividend and to be so transferable . . . as the Corporation by the resolution for the first creation of Corporation stock direct: Provided that all Corporation stock at any time and from time to time so created shall be created on and subject to such terms and conditions as that the same shall form one and the same class of stock bearing one and the same rate of dividend, and shall become redeemable as hereinafter provided after the expiration of one and the same period from the first creation of Corporation stock.

“(3) The resolution for the first creation of Corporation stock shall provide that such stock shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at par after the expiration of a period to be fixed by the resolution not exceeding sixty years from the first creation of the stock. . . .

“(4) Each resolution for creation of stock shall specify that the stock thereby created is redeemable.”

† The Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. ccxxiv.) enacts:—

The Corporation's resolution to create this stock is dated 7th April 1897, and bears to be under the authority and subject to the provisions of two private Acts of Parliament dated in 1894 and 1896 respectively. It purports to 'create stock to be called the Edinburgh Corporation 2½ per cent Redeemable Stock, and to be issued to an amount which shall be sufficient for the following purposes, but not exceeding £750,000.' It also bears 'that such stock shall be redeemable at par

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinneir, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie), on 7th and 8th November 1911.

Argued for the reclaimers;—On a sound construction of the stock certificate read in the light of the resolution of 7th April 1897, which created the stock, and the Acts of 1894 and 1896, which authorised the creation, the respondents were under an absolute obligation to redeem the stock at par at Whitsunday 1927 on the application of the holders. It must be admitted that the language of the statutes and of the certificate was not free from ambiguity and difficulty, but the interpretation contended for by the reclaimers was the only one which gave the statutes a reasonable meaning. The respondents founded chiefly on the word “redeemable.” They argued that the suffix “able” connoted, not an obligation, but merely a faculty or power of redemption, and they appealed to the ordinary use of the word in after the expiration of a period of thirty years from 15th May 1897.’ In the present action the pursuers ask for declarator that on a sound construction of the statutes and resolution above referred to, and also of a certain prospectus, the defenders are bound to redeem the said stock immediately on the expiry of the 15th day of May 1927. Though the conclusion is not so expressed, the pursuers mean that the defenders must redeem the stock at par. The prospectus referred to in the conclusion represented with perfect truth that the stock would ‘be redeemable at par after 15th May 1927,’ but that representation has no bearing upon the present dispute. The defenders have, in the exercise of their Parliamentary powers, created a peculiar species of property, and the only point in controversy is whether the property so created does or does not possess the quality which the pursuers attribute to it, viz., that it must be redeemed on 16th May 1927. It must be clearly understood that the present action relates exclusively to what is called the new or 2½ per cent Edinburgh stock which was created and issued under the combined powers of the Acts of 1894 and 1896. It has nothing to do with the original or 3 per cent stock which was issued under the powers of the 1894 Act alone. It will be necessary for me to express an opinion as to the meaning of the 1894 Act, but, of course, the rights of the 3 per cent stockholders depend not merely on that Act but on statutory resolutions, the terms of which are not before the Court in the present action. It will also conduce to clearness if I state that counsel on both sides thought it unnecessary to debate the question whether the holders of either class of stock have a legal interest in the ‘Loans Fund’ established by the Act of 1894 for the purpose of providing for the payment of dividends and the redemption and extinction of all Corporation stock. Even if this question were answered affirmatively, it would not entitle the pursuers to the declarator for which they ask.

“Prior to the year 1894 the City of Edinburgh had obtained from Parliament and had partially exercised borrowing powers of various kinds, but none of its private Acts had authorised the creation and issue of municipal stock. The defenders might probably have taken advantage of the powers conferred upon local authorities by the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Acts, 1891 and 1893 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 34, and 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 8), and have issued redeemable stock in terms of these Acts. This course might, however, have involved disputes with the creditors under the then existing city debt, and the Corporation would further have been subject to the control of the Secretary for Scotland in the management of its finances. The defenders accordingly obtained a private Act, which is an adaptation of the public Act of 1891 to the special requirements of the City of Edinburgh, and which authorises the Corporation to exercise any unexhausted statutory borrowing powers by the creation and issue of redeemable stock. It is called everyday language and to the case In re Chicago and North-Western Granaries Company, Limited.¹ That case, however, was a decision upon the meaning of the word "redeemable" in connection only with the particular documents which were there under consideration; and although undoubtedly in ordinary language the word had in general the meaning attributed to it by the respondents, it had undergone, when used in connection with stocks and shares, the same change of meaning as had occurred in the words "payable" and "repayable." These words, both in popular and legal and judicial language, when used in connection with sums borrowed or with interest, connoted, not an option to pay or repay, but an absolute obligation to do so.² A reference to any broker's share-list or any Stock Exchange Year Book would readily show that this was the case. Further, it was contrary to all rules of interpretation to give so much weight as the respondents sought to do to a single word. The the Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. lvi.). The draftsman of the private Act had the public Act of 1891 before him. Section 5, which deals with the 'creation of stock,' is practically the same in the two statutes, except that in the Edinburgh Act the reference to the Secretary for Scotland and all words expressly imposing an obligation on the Corporation to redeem the stock have been omitted. Nothing can be more significant than the contrast between section 5 (1) and (4) of the public Act and the corresponding clauses of the Edinburgh Act. This observation is not, of course, conclusive as to the construction of the Edinburgh Act, because the statute read as a whole may, by necessary implication, impose such an obligation on the Corporation. After carefully reading the statute, however, I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to hold that the Corporation was impliedly bound by the Act of 1894 to redeem all stock created under the powers of that statute; though it may be that it was entitled in the statutory resolution for the creation of such stock to fix a date at which the option of redemption would be exercised.

"Section 5 (1) of the Act of 1894 contains a proviso requiring that all Corporation stock from time to time created under the powers of that section 'shall form one and the same class of stock bearing one and the same rate of dividend, and shall become redeemable as hereinafter provided after the expiration of one and the same period from the first creation of Corporation stock.' Various issues of stock were made under the powers of this section, all of which bore the same rate of dividend, viz., 3 per cent, and were redeemable at the same date, viz., 16th May 1924. It seems to have occurred to the defenders that they could borrow money on more favourable terms, and accordingly a single section was introduced into the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. ccxxiv.), authorising the issue of a new class of stock, being that with which alone the present action is concerned. Section 83 of the Act of 1896 is as follows:— 'The Corporation in addition to the powers contained in the Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894, may, and they are hereby authorised, at any time to create and issue a new class of stock for all or any of the purposes for which the Corporation may create and issue stock, to bear any rate of dividend which the Corporation may fix, and all stock of such class shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years from the first issue of such stock.' It is remarkable that the 1896 Act does not enact that the whole provisions of the 1894 Act with reference to the original stock shall apply mutatis mutandis to the new stock. Unless some such

Nov. 18, 1911. British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh. Act of 1896 had admittedly to be read in the light of the Act of 1894, without which the 1896 Act was more or less meaningless. Now, the preamble to the Act of 1894 showed that it was with "borrowing" powers that the Acts were dealing. But borrowing connoted repayment, and (apart from the respondents' argument from the word "redeemable") there was nothing in the Acts or documents to suggest that there was not to be repayment. There was no statement anywhere that the stock was to be perpetual. In public borrowing the policy of the Legislature was that, when the benefit arising from the loan had been exhausted, the money borrowed should be repaid; hence the introduction of the period of sixty years. There was not, as the Lord Ordinary seemed to think, any essential difference between the public Act of 1891¹ and the Edinburgh Acts; but, even if there were, it was immaterial, as the issue of this stock had taken place entirely under the Edinburgh Acts, which fell to be con-enactment is implied section 83 of the later Act is unworkable. It appears from the resolution already quoted that the defenders assumed that the provisions of the 1894 Act applied to the new stock, and I think that they were right. I read section 83 of the 1896 Act as an addition to and an amendment of section 5 (1) of the 1894 Act. The result is that from 1896 onwards the defenders had power to create and issue two different kinds of stock, and that the provisions of the earlier Act apply equally to the original stock and to the new stock.

"Whether that is or is not the right way to get over the difficulty, I agree with the pursuers' counsel (the Dean of Faculty) in thinking that, so far as the present controversy is concerned, the rights of his clients fall to be determined primarily on a construction of the resolution quoted at the beginning of this opinion and of section 83 of the 1896 Act, the language of which is somewhat more favourable to his case than that of section 5 of the 1894 Act. As regards section 83 he argued that the new stock was stamped by Parliament as a redeemable stock and that it was absurd to suppose that the Corporation had an option to convert it into a perpetual stock by simply doing nothing. He argued that the words 'at the option of the Corporation' as used in the section did not qualify the antecedent 'redeemable' but referred to what came afterwards, and were intended to make it clear that the Corporation should be entitled to fix the date of redemption at any date which they chose to select within sixty years from the first issue of the stock. He also maintained that the word 'period' as used in the section meant a specific date to be fixed by the Corporation. It followed that according to the intention of Parliament the stock must be redeemed within sixty years at the outside, and in the present case at the expiry of thirty years, being the date fixed by the Corporation itself. It seems to me that the Dean of Faculty's reading of the section reduces the words 'at the option of the Corporation' to mere surplusage. Even, however, if his reading of section 83 is accepted, the section and the relative resolution come to no more than that the stock 'shall be redeemable' at a particular date. The word 'redeemable' is a familiar one in our law and it imports no more than that the creator of a right has a 'power or faculty' to re-acquire it on certain terms (Ersk. ii. 8, 2). So too it has been decided in England on the construction of a contract between a limited company and its debenture-holders that prima facie the word 'redeemable' means nothing more than that the debentures are 'liable to redemption.' Of course there is nothing to prevent a person who strued independently. "After" clearly meant "at," and the words "at the option of" referred merely to the period which the Corporation might fix for the obligatory redemption within the limit of sixty years. Nov. 18, 1911.

British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Argued for the respondents;—On a sound construction of the statutes, resolution, and certificate, the Corporation were not bound to redeem the stock at May 1927 or at any other period. The reclaimers argued that it was a priori improbable that the stock should be irredeemable, it being, as they said, the policy of the Legislature to discourage anything in the nature of perpetual loans to corporations. That might have been its policy at one time in the case of loans for particular purposes, but the Local Authorities Loans Acts clearly showed that that policy was changed, at any rate in the case of the general consolidated stocks issued by so many corporations in which the holders were just in the position of the holders of stock in ordinary companies.¹ There was no reason, therefore, from the point of view of public policy, why the word "redeemable" should not be given its ordinary meaning, viz., open to or capable of redemption, a meaning given to it in closely analogous circumstances in In re Chicago and North-Western Granaries Company, Limited.² The word "repayable" was not analogous, as in ordinary everyday language that word had undergone a change and had come to connote obligation. It was exceedingly significant to contrast the clauses in the private Acts with the corresponding clauses in section 5 of the Act of 1891, and to note how the words implying obligation were omitted in the private Acts. The respondents' reading was, in short, the only one which made reasonable sense of the various sections of the Acts, and gave some meaning to the expression "at the option of the Corporation" in section 83 of the Act of 1896. It was not perhaps very easy to find a completely satisfactory reading of the sections. It might be contended that they meant that the option of the Corporation to redeem fell to be exercised within a certain period, and if not exercised within that period that the stock thereafter became permanently irredeemable; or it might be contended that the stock was irredeemable for a certain period and that after the expiry of that period it became redeemable at any time at the option has reserved a power of redemption from contracting to exercise that power at a particular time and in a particular manner, and such bargains were resorted to at one time in the hope of evading the Usury Acts. Again the Local Authorities Loans Act, 1891, affords an excellent example of a statutory power to redeem 'coupled with a duty.' I use the phraseology of the interpretation clause of the 1891 Act, which is followed in the corresponding clause of the Edinburgh Act of 1894. Anyone who alleges that a redeemable stock must be redeemed is bound, in my opinion, to show the existence of the obligation upon which he founds, and this the pursuers have failed to do. Parliament might quite well have followed the same policy in the Edinburgh Acts as it adopted in the Local Authorities Loans Acts, and have made all stocks issued by the Corporation compulsorily redeemable within a certain period. But I see nothing absurd or improbable in the scheme which was actually adopted, viz., that the whole question should be left to the discretion of the Corporation. I accordingly sustain the defenders' second plea in law and dismiss the action."

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

At advising on 18th November 1911,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an action by the British Linen Company against the Corporation of Edinburgh for a declarator that on a sound construction of certain statutes and a resolution, under which the defenders in 1897 created and issued £750,000 two and a half per cent redeemable stock, the defenders are bound to redeem the said stock immediately on the expiry of the 15th day of May 1927, on the application of the holders thereof. The defenders plead in answer, in the first place, that the action is premature and incompetent, and should be dismissed. That plea, which I suppose was founded upon the notion that we ought not to declare at present a right which will only emerge in 1927, is no longer insisted in; and counsel for both parties stated at the bar that it is in the interests of both that the question between them should now be decided. Accordingly, we must entertain the action as being properly brought.

The only other specific defence is that under the terms of the issue of the stock the stockholders have no right to demand repayment of the loans prior to 15th May 1957. Reading that plea as it stands, I should have thought it implied—I do not know whether it was meant to imply—that on the arrival of 15th May 1957 the stockholders would have a right to demand payment which it is denied they have at present; but the defenders' counsel and the Lord Ordinary have gone further, because, according to the argument maintained to us, and according to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, the view of both is that the right of the Corporation is to redeem or not redeem according to their own judgment and discretion. The stockholders, who have advanced money upon the terms contained in the Acts of Parliament and the documents regulating the issue of the stock, are, according to that view, never to be entitled to demand repayment of the money which they have advanced.

The question depends upon the terms of the certificate which has been issued to the pursuers, read with reference to the statutes which authorised the creation of the stock. The certificate sets out that the person named is proprietor of so much of two and a half per cent redeemable stock, subject to the Acts of Parliament relating thereto, and there is a note that the stock is redeemable at par after Whitsunday 1927, and that interest is payable half yearly on the 15th May and 11th November. If one were to take this document by itself prima facie it would appear to me to mean that the stock, whatever "stock" may mean, is to be redeemed at par at or after Whitsunday 1927, and that until then it is to bear interest at two and a half per cent, payable half yearly on 15th May and 11th November. But then the argument is that that is not the true nature of the Corporation's undertaking.

The first argument which was maintained by the defenders' counsel, I must confess, does not much impress my mind. It was maintained that taking the word "redeemable" by itself, it means only that the Corporation has a power to redeem, but is under no obligation to exercise that power. I must say I think very little importance is to be attached in questions of this kind to etymological considerations. It is a most fallacious way of construing an Act of Parliament, or any legal instrument, to take a single word by itself and pull it to pieces in order to get at what is supposed to be its original or primary meaning, because words in common use acquire secondary meanings and carry a variety of different implications according to the connection in which they are used. We must read the whole clause and interpret the language used with reference to the context and the subject-matter and the avowed object of the statute. I think that is very clearly brought out by the two authorities which were cited by the defenders' counsel in support of their contention as to the meaning of the word "redeemable." The opinion of Mr Justice North,¹ to which they referred, as to the meaning of the word in a particular prospectus which he was construing, is not founded upon the view that the word has one fixed and definite signification which is always to be attached to it wherever it occurs, but it is founded upon an exact consideration of the actual document with which he was dealing, and it was upon a reading of the whole document that he came to his conclusion in the particular case. The other authority is Erskine, ii. 8, 2, referred to by the Lord Ordinary in the passage of his opinion in which he says,—“The word ‘redeemable’ imports no more than that the creator of a right has ‘a power or faculty’ to re-acquire it on certain terms.” Mr Erskine in the passage referred to begins by stating that a redeemable right is defined by Mackenzie as “that which returns to the disposer or granter on payment of the sum for which it was granted.” But then he goes on to point out that there may be cases in which the granter has a right to redeem that which he has granted without payment, and he says that although that is not in accordance with the strict grammatical meaning of the word, since no price is to be paid for getting back the subject, still, according to the ordinary familiar reading it is for all purposes a redeemable right. He then continues (in the passage referred to by the Lord Ordinary):—“Under the appellation, therefore, of redeemable rights all those may be included in which a power or faculty is in a certain event, or within a certain period of time, or without any restriction in point of time, competent to the debtor or granter of the right.” Now, in his explanation of that doctrine Mr Erskine is, I think, proceeding according to ordinary usage and common sense. The redeemable right must always be one which the granter has power to redeem, but the power may or may not be coupled with the duty or obligation of repayment according to the nature of the right itself and the conditions under which it is created. Therefore it appears to me, without any further consideration of the etymological signification of the word, that we must go to the Acts of Parliament in order to see what the right is which the Corporation is authorised to create and what are the mutual rights and liabilities of the parties to the transaction.

There are two statutes, the Act of 1894 and the Act of 1896, and the particular stock with which we are now concerned was created and issued under the second of these Acts. The Act of 1896 by its 83rd section authorises the Corporation to issue a new class of stock; but then I think it is common ground, and the Lord Ordinary has so held, that this specific

Nov. 18, 1911. provision in the Act of 1896 cannot be taken by itself, and that in order to ascertain its true meaning and effect we must refer back to the Act of 1894, which first gave the Edinburgh Corporation the power of creating and issuing stock. I think that is quite obvious, because if we look at the 83rd section by itself it is practically unworkable. If we could not go back to see what was meant by "stock" in the Act of 1894, I do not think anybody would be able to make out what was meant by the 83rd section. The stock issued by the Corporation does not define itself. It is not a term that, in the connection in which it is used in these Acts, is very easily understood, and, indeed, I should not have been able to understand it had there not been the provision in the Act of 1894, and to a certain extent a provision in another Act—a general statute—which is not before us. The word is more familiarly used in connection with joint stock companies. What was intended was to create an interest in the funds of the Corporation which could be transferred from one name to another and could stand in any name; and so far there is an analogy between the stock of public joint stock companies and this interest which is to be created under the statutes. But in other respects there is no resemblance between the two rights. The stock in a public company means merely the capital of a commercial undertaking, and a stockholder is simply a shareholder—a person having a right to a share in the capital; whereas the Corporation, as a municipal corporation, is not a trading company and has no capital—and the persons who are called stockholders are in no sense shareholders in any undertaking whatever.

But then, I think, when we come to the Act of 1894 the whole scheme of the statute and the special provision which we have to construe bring out quite clearly what it was that the statute intended to authorise. I may say for the purpose of clearness that I think the question as to the construction of this statute between the two parties is one which is capable of being very simply stated. The pursuers say that the transaction between them was a loan of money by them and others to the Corporation, which was therefore repayable just because it was a loan; and that the legal interest in the fund is the security for repayment of the loan, with interest at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent charged upon the revenue of the Corporation. The defenders, on the other hand, say that the transaction was a sale of a special kind of property in the shape of a perpetual annuity for payment of a sum of money down, which therefore may never be called up and which they are never bound to repay. That is really the controversy between the parties on the construction of this Act.

Now, I must say I cannot have any doubt that the pursuers are right, and that the transaction between the parties is one of loan. I think that is made perfectly clear by the explicit provision of the Act of 1894. That Act begins by a preamble, which we are quite entitled to look at for the purpose of throwing light on the enacting clauses by ascertaining the avowed purpose for which they were passed. The preamble, so far as it refers to the creation of stock, proceeds: "Whereas it is expedient that the Corporation should be authorised to exercise their statutory borrowing powers for the time being by means of the creation and issue of Corporation stock"; and then the statute goes on to say what they are to do in order to exercise the power of borrowing. In the fifth section of the statute, Nov. 18, 1911. which is the material one, it is enacted that where the Corporation have for the time being any statutory borrowing power, then the Corporation may from time to time by resolution exercise the power by creation of redeemable stock to be from time to time issued for such amount within the limit of the power, to bear such half-yearly or other dividends, and to be so transferable as the Corporation may direct. They are to issue what is called redeemable stock for the purpose of carrying into effect their power of borrowing. Then the section goes on to provide that this is to be done by resolution, and that the resolution for the first creation of Corporation stock shall provide that such stock shall be redeemable, at the option of the Corporation at par after the expiration of a period to be fixed by the resolution not exceeding sixty years from the first creation of the stock; and each resolution for creation of stock shall specify that the stock thereby created is redeemable. This condition is imperative. There is no power given to the Corporation to issue an irredeemable stock, or, in other words, to create a perpetual charge upon the town's revenues. Now, in accordance with that section, the Corporation did pass a resolution for creation of the stock now in question, in which they set forth, as it was their duty to do, that it was redeemable. Then there follow certain clauses which I do not think so material, but they all go to confirm the view which I take of the two sections I have read. In the first place, there is clause 6, which says that the borrowing power is to be exercisable for the actual sum raisable by the Corporation; and then clause 7 enacts (1) that the Corporation stock shall be charged indifferently on the whole revenues of the Corporation from time to time, arising from lands and heritages and from the city undertakings, and on all funds, rates, and assessments leviable under the City Acts and this Act; and (2) that the dividend for the time being payable on the stock shall rank equally with the interest on all other securities granted by the Corporation.

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.
Lord Kinnear.

Now the plain meaning of this appears to me to be beyond question. There is a power to borrow, which means that the Corporation is to obtain money on loan; and if it is not directly provided that the money so borrowed shall be repaid, that is because the obligation to repay follows as a necessary consequence from the right to borrow. A loan implies in law an obligation to repay the money lent, when the subject of the loan is money. Nothing more is required to create an obligation to repay than the fact that the loan was made, because that carries with it an obligation to repay. If there is an express obligation to repay at a definite time, then the lender is entitled to call up his money at that time; if there is no definite time, then the money is repayable on demand or on reasonable notice. But always and in every case, if there is a loan at all it is repayable; and the statutes authorise nothing here except a loan, because the power to borrow is just a power to obtain money on loan. If then this consideration were the only one to be taken into account, I confess I should have no doubt that this money is repayable some time. But then it is repayable with interest. Some confusion may be introduced into the interpretation of the statutes by the use of the term "dividend upon stock"; but that really means nothing more than interest upon money lent.

Nov. 18, 1911. If the loan is repayable some time, the question is whether the statute provides for a time of repayment or not. I think it does by the third subsection of the fifth section, which I have already adverted to. That subsection enacts that such stock shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at par after the expiration of a period, to be fixed by the resolution for the first creation of stock, not exceeding sixty years from such creation. If we drop out for a moment the words "at the option of the Corporation," which alone create any difficulty in the construction of this subsection, it is, to my mind, clear what is intended. The Corporation is to borrow money; it is to give the lender a charge upon its revenues, which is to be called stock, and this stock is to be redeemable at par after the expiration of a period which does not exceed sixty years from the first creation of the stock. That appears to me to bear only one meaning. The statute says that the right which the Corporation is to give must be redeemable, and it is to be redeemable at any period to be fixed by the Corporation itself which does not exceed sixty years. During the sixty years, therefore, the Corporation may, if it think fit, leave the charge upon its revenues standing; but they are only to do that for a period which does not exceed sixty years; and therefore when that period has expired, they are bound to relieve their funds of that charge.

It was argued that these words "not exceeding sixty years" would be satisfied by a resolution for repayment of the stock at any time after the passing of sixty years. That is to say, there might be redemption as soon as sixty years had passed, or there might be no redemption until centuries after the sixty years, because the most distant date that can be imagined must be later than the fixed period. I do not think that is a reading which can possibly be put upon the provision of a statute which is intended to regulate a business transaction of a very important kind. The plain meaning of it seems to me to be that, so long as the period allowed by the statute for the charge upon the revenues being unredeemed lasts, the Corporation is not bound to redeem, but at the moment that period is exhausted then the Corporation is bound to redeem.

The only difficulty, to my mind, is created by the introduction of the words "at the option of the Corporation"; but I think that difficulty arises, not from any ambiguity in the words themselves, but from their position. I cannot read the words as meaning that the stock is to be redeemable or not as the Corporation chooses; because I think that would be to subvert the whole series of direct and positive enactments as to the character of the right that is to be created by language intended primarily and obviously to state the specific manner in which the right created is to be carried out. The right given to the Corporation is a right to burden the rates, that is to say, to assess and levy rates for the purpose of the loan among other purposes, and but for the statute, of course, the Corporation would have no power to levy these rates; and, therefore, when the statute says that they may levy rates it does not mean that they may levy rates in perpetuity. The sole purpose as expressed in the word "redeemable," seems to me to be this, that the Corporation may create a charge upon the rates; but it is not to be a perpetual charge, it is to be a charge redeemable under certain conditions.

If that is the plain meaning of the direct provisions of the statute it would be contrary to all reasonable rules of construction to say that all that is to be subverted by the introduction of the term "option," unless it be clear upon the construction of the clauses that the statute intended, first of all, to say that the stock shall be redeemable and that you shall not create a perpetual burden upon the revenues of the Corporation, and then afterwards to say that it shall not be redeemable and that you may create a perpetual burden on the revenues of the Corporation if you like. Therefore we must read this clause in such a way as will enable the "option" to be referred to something else than the redeemable or irredeemable character of the stock itself. The clause is somewhat clumsily constructed; but what it really means, I think, is this, that inasmuch as the Corporation is required to redeem the stock at some time, but not necessarily until after the lapse of sixty years, they may leave it standing for sixty years and then must redeem it, but may redeem it at any such time within the sixty years as they may choose to fix. Its character during the sixty years is to depend on the option of the Corporation. They may redeem or not within the sixty years; after the sixty years they must redeem. That appears to me to be the true meaning of the clause. I think it is preferable to a construction which would be entirely repugnant to everything else which the statute provides.

Nov. 18, 1911.
 British Linen
 Bank v.
 Magistrates
 of Edinburgh.
 Lord Kinnear.

If that be the true reading of the Act, it follows, in my opinion, that the capital may be called up at such period as the Corporation may be required to redeem, because what lies at the root of the whole question is that it is a loan. The Corporation has borrowed money, and it necessarily follows that the money has to be repaid. In any other kind of document it may be that the more obvious way of expressing the duty of repayment would not have been to give the debtor power or obligation to redeem, but to provide directly that the money should become due and payable at a certain date; but the explanation of the departure from this very natural form in this Act of Parliament is quite obvious, because the Act is passed to give a power to the Corporation, which they would not otherwise have, to create this charge upon the property of the Corporation. It is quite immaterial whether the one form of language or the other is used for the purpose of determining the period of the loan, because the payment of a secured debt, and the redemption of the security, are not two different things, but two sides of one and the same transaction. It follows, I think, that the lender is entitled to call for payment at the time at which the stocks become redeemable, simply because there is no other known method of redeeming the charge upon the Corporation funds except by paying back the loan for which their funds are impledged, and also because there is no other date of payment stipulated, and the borrowers would have no answer to a demand for immediate payment if it were not a perfectly sufficient answer that the stock is not to be redeemed before a certain date.

Now, if that is the true construction of the Act of 1894, I do not think the Act of 1896, which is the one with which we are immediately concerned, creates any difficulty. The only clause we need to consider is the 83rd; and the difference between the 83rd clause of this Act and the third subsection of the fifth clause of the former Act is certainly immaterial.

Nov. 18, 1911. The Lord Ordinary says it is more favourable to the pursuers than to the defenders. That may or may not be ; the clause provides that the Corporation "may create and issue a new class of stock for all or any of the purposes for which the Corporation may create and issue stock to bear any rate of dividend which the Corporation may fix ; and all stock of such class shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years from the first issue of such stock." Now, the main difference in phraseology is that instead of saying it is to be redeemable "after" a period, it says it is to be redeemable "at" a period not exceeding sixty years. I think there is no difference between "at" and "after," in the view I take of the first statute. As in the first statute, so in this, the Corporation is given an option ; the stock is to be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at a period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years. The only natural reading of these words seems to me to be that it is to be redeemable, but the period at which it is to be redeemable is to be fixed at the option of the Corporation, provided it be not fixed later than sixty years after creation. The clause gives an option to the Corporation ; they have, however, in my opinion, exercised that option by the terms of the resolution and the certificate they have issued to the pursuers ; because their certificate says that redemption is to be at par after Whitsunday 1927, a determination which is quite within their option. Therefore I take it that the Corporation has issued to the pursuers what is called stock—although I doubt whether the phrase is at all right—but stock redeemable at par at Whitsunday 1927.

I am unable to put any other construction upon the language of the statute, and I am therefore unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which accordingly falls to be recalled and decree granted to the pursuers.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. I have considered this important and interesting case as well as I can ; and have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor reclaimed against ought to be recalled, and decree pronounced in the pursuers' favour. The matter really comes to resolve itself into a short point of construction of section 83 of the defenders' Act of 1896 (read, so far as necessary, in the light of their earlier Act of 1894), their resolution of 7th April, and the form of certificate issued by them for the stock in question. The stock is throughout characterised as "redeemable" ; and the gist of the matter, as I construe it, is that the Corporation may, at their option, fix by resolution the period of redemption, subject to the provision that the stock must be redeemed within sixty years from its first creation. I think the Corporation did in fact exercise the option conferred upon them when they fixed, by their resolution, the period of redemption of the stock at par "after" 15th May 1927. Looking to the terms of section 83, I read "after" as equivalent to "at," and this again is, I suppose, fairly rendered by the words in the pursuers' summons, "immediately on the expiry of the 15th day of May 1927." The construction indicated seems to me to give due effect to every material word which we have to construe. It gives, on the one hand, a reasonable meaning to the words "at their option," upon which the defenders so strongly rely, and Nov. 18, 1911. avoids, on the other hand, the result that the Corporation are entitled, by simply doing nothing, to make "redeemable" stock perpetual; and it seems also to afford an answer to the Lord Ordinary's view that "anyone who alleges that a redeemable stock must be redeemed is bound . . . to show the existence of the obligation upon which he founds," for the obligation on the Corporation is, ex hypothesi, to redeem the stock at the period which they themselves have fixed by resolution. I do not desire to elaborate the matter further, but am content simply to express my entire concurrence with the reasons for the proposed judgment which have been so fully stated by your Lordship in the chair.

British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.
Lord Dundas.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The British Linen Bank are holders of £254,000 Edinburgh Corporation 2½ per cent Stock issued under the authority of the Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894, and the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896. They bring this action to have it declared that the Corporation are bound to redeem the stock immediately on the expiry of the 15th day of May 1927 on the application of the holders. The position taken up by the defenders is that they are not under obligation to redeem the stock at any time, and this is the view given effect to by the Lord Ordinary. The form of the certificate for the stock is in these terms:—

"This is to certify that the Proprietor of Pounds of Edinburgh Corporation
Two and a-half per cent Redeemable Stock, subject to the Acts of Parliament relating thereto."

A note is appended which contains the following:—"Redeemable at par after Whitsunday 1927."

The statutes referred to in the certificate are the above-mentioned Acts of 1894 and 1896. The sections which require construction are section 5 (1) and (3) of the 1894 Act, and section 83 of the 1896 Act. The stock in question was created under the authority of section 83 of the 1896 Act, but it is necessary to read along with this the provisions of the 1894 Act, in order to discover, not only the procedure to be adopted in exercising the powers conferred by the 83rd section of the Act of 1896, but also the conditions upon which these powers can be put in force. The object of the later Act was to enable the Corporation to borrow money at 2½ per cent. For the money obtained under the 1894 Act the rate of interest was 3 per cent.

Turning to the Act of 1894, the first point to be observed with regard to section 5 (1) is that the procedure is conditional upon the Corporation having for the time being a statutory borrowing power. This is also necessary as regards section 83 of the 1896 Act. If the Corporation has such statutory power, it may proceed to exercise it by the creation of "redeemable stock." The fact that it is a power to borrow which is to be exercised makes it unlikely that the creation of perpetual annuities was in the contemplation of the Legislature. On this point reference may be made to the case of The Southern Brazilian Rio Grande Do Sul Railway.¹ Borrowing implies repayment at some time and under some circumstances. The succeeding sections of the 1894 Act expressly deal with the formation of a "loans fund" for the redemption of Corporation stock. The fact that the power is to create "redeemable stock" negatives the idea that the stock should, under any circumstances, be irredeemable. The concluding words of section 5 (1) are that the stock "shall," not "may," become redeemable as after provided. The provision for redemption is contained in section 5 (3), which enacts: "The resolution for the first creation of Corporation stock shall provide that such stock shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at par after the expiration of a period to be fixed by the resolution not exceeding sixty years from the first creation of the stock, and shall declare whether the stock shall be transferable in books or by deed"; and (4) provides that each resolution for creation of stock shall specify that the stock thereby created is redeemable. The corresponding provision in the 1896 Act is at the close of section 83—"All stock of such class shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years from the first issue of such stock." The limitation in point of time to sixty years points strongly to the conclusion that it was not intended that the Corporation should have power indefinitely to delay redemption. The words "at the option of" are founded on as indicating that the Corporation is to have an absolute discretion. In my opinion, these words refer to the period which the Corporation may fix for redemption within the sixty years. The second schedule of the Act of 1894 contains (as provided by section 5 (1)) a form of resolution which may be used on the creation of stock. One clause of the resolution runs: "That such stock shall be redeemable as follows (state terms)." The resolution as to the creation of the stock in question is dated 7th April 1897, and provides—"Third. That such stock shall be redeemable at par after the expiration of a period of thirty years from 15th May 1897." Although the word "after" is here used it must mean "at," because this is the expression in the Act of 1896. When the Corporation passed this resolution, they exercised the option conferred upon them by section 83. The terms of the certificate must be construed with reference to the statute and resolution. When, therefore, a certificate was issued which said as regards this stock, "Redeemable at par after Whitsunday 1927," this must be construed with reference to the statute and resolution as meaning that the stock shall be redeemable at par at Whitsunday 1927. It is not stated in the pleadings what the actual price of issue was. The decision must depend on the effect of the statutes, resolution, and certificate.

It was maintained for the Corporation that there is no obligation, expressed or implied, upon them to redeem the stock in question; that the expression "redeemable" naturally means "liable to be redeemed," not "shall be redeemed"; that the use of the phrase "at the option of" shows (if there were any doubt) what was meant by "redeemable"; that they were entitled, in their option, to fix any period within the sixty years mentioned in section 83, after which they were entitled to begin to redeem (according to this the use of the word "redeemable" was a note of warning to those tendering for the stock). The result of this argument, which has been given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, is that the matter of redemption is left entirely to the discretion of the Corporation within the period of sixty years. After the sixty years have expired the option ceases, and the stock becomes irredeemable. In order to meet this difficulty the position taken up by the defenders on record, as stated in their third plea in law, is this: "In respect that the stockholders, under the terms of issue of said stock, have no right to demand repayment of their loans prior to 15th May 1957, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor." This contention, however, or admission, is not, so far as can be discovered, based on any statutory provision, and was not made the foundation of the defenders' argument.

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

An obligation on the Corporation to repay within sixty years, coupled with a faculty of redemption sooner, would have been in accordance with the policy of Parliament which is shown by the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 34), section 5 (1) and (4), as amended by the Act 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 8, section 2. It is no doubt evident that the draftsman of the local Acts of 1894 and 1896 must have had the Acts of 1891 and 1893 before him. He, however, altered the phraseology, and the question is, what has been effected by the language used?

"Redeemable," no doubt, naturally means "liable to redemption,"—In re Chicago and North-Western Granaries Co., Limited.¹ It requires, however, to be construed with reference to the context, and if this indicates that it is used in the sense of "repayable," this may be its true meaning in the section. According to the defenders' argument the words "at the option of" add nothing to the meaning of the word "redeemable." That, according to their argument, imports a faculty of redemption and nothing more. The provision, therefore, in this view, would have been complete if it had run: "The stock shall be redeemable after the expiration of a period to be fixed by the resolution not exceeding sixty years from the first creation of the stock." If, however, the expression "at the option of" is referred to the selection of a period short of the maximum of sixty years a definite meaning is assigned to it. The meaning of the clause is therefore this, the stock shall be redeemable, i.e., shall be in fact redeemed sixty years from its first creation, with an option to the Corporation to fix by resolution an earlier period. It was necessary for the period to be fixed by the resolution, because it was essential that persons about to tender should know the terms upon which their money was to be lent. If, as was contended for by the Corporation, the period for redemption was notified in order to warn intending offerers, the words "not exceeding sixty years" seem very inappropriate. They suggest that the Corporation could not defer the discharge of a duty for a longer period. The argument for the Corporation involves that the stock shall not be "liable to redemption" at any period after sixty years. This, in my opinion, would stultify the provision altogether.

It follows, from what is above stated, that the pursuers are entitled, in my opinion, to the decree they ask. I therefore concur with your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel and considered the reclaiming note for the British Linen Bank against the interlocutor of Lord

Title to sue—Interdict—Title of proprietor to interdict nuisance affecting letting value of his property.

Held that vibration due to the working of a gas-engine, whereby the structure of the adjoining premises was injured and the comfort of its occupants affected, constituted a nuisance which might be restrained by interdict, notwithstanding that the premises were situated in an industrial district of Glasgow.

Opinions (per Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen) that the law of Scotland allows “a proprietor to apply for interdict in respect of operations by a third party, complained of by his tenant, and lowering, or reasonably calculated to lower, the letting value of his tenement.”

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 6th October 1909 Mrs Mary Gibb or M'Ewen (with the concurrence of her husband, Charles M'Ewen), James Gibb, and William Gibb, being (along with another whose residence was unknown) the pro indiviso proprietors of property at 103 Cathcart Street, Kingston, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Steedman & M'Alister, cork manufacturers, who occupied premises, in which they had placed a gas-engine, at 35 Ardgowan Street, Glasgow, adjoining the pursuers' property. The pursuers craved the Court “to interdict the defenders, their servants, and all others acting under their authority, from working the said gas-engine in the premises occupied by the defenders at 35 Ardgowan Street, Glasgow, in such a way as to cause vibration of the said property situated at 103 Cathcart Street, Kingston, Glasgow, or at least in such a way as by the vibration occasioned thereby to cause material discomfort and annoyance, and to be a nuisance to the tenants and occupants of the property at 103 Cathcart Street aforesaid.”

The defenders lodged defences in which they averred that the tenement No. 103 Cathcart Street was in the immediate neighbourhood of many large engineering and other works where large quantities of heavy machinery were in constant use.

The pursuers pleaded ;—The vibration occasioned by said gas-engine being a nuisance, and causing material discomfort and annoyance to the pursuers' tenants and damage to pursuers' property, the pursuers are entitled to interdict as craved. Nov. 21, 1911.

The defenders pleaded;—The pursuers' averments being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. M'Ewen v. Steedman & M'Alister.

A proof was allowed and led in the Sheriff Court. The evidence led by the pursuers, as to the effect of the vibration on the structure of their premises, was that the ceilings and plaster of the walls of the rooms were cracked, the pointing in the gable became bare, the brigs between the vents were loosened and the slates were caused to slide. The evidence as to the effect on the comfort of the tenants is summarised in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. The facts which the Court on appeal held to be proved are given in the following findings in fact in their interlocutor:—“(1) That the pursuers are the proprietors of a tenement forming No. 103 Cathcart Street, Kingston, Glasgow, containing ten dwelling-houses; (2) that the defenders are tenants of an adjacent property where they carry on the business of manufacturers of lifebuoys, &c.; (3) that near to the mutual gable wall dividing the properties the defenders have erected a gas-engine for the purposes of their business; (4) that this gas-engine is worked during week days from about 7 A.M. till about 5.30 P.M., and on Saturdays from about 7 A.M. till 1 P.M.; (5) that as at the date of the action being brought the said gas-engine was being worked in such a way as to cause vibration to the said tenement, and so as to cause injury to its structure, and to raise a reasonable apprehension of further injury if such working is continued; (6) that the vibration occasioned by the working of the said gas-engine caused material discomfort and annoyance to the tenants and occupants of the said tenement.”

On 21st October 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) found that the pursuers “having failed to establish that the defenders are making an unreasonable use of their premises to the detriment of the pursuers' property” were not entitled to the interdict craved, and assoilzied the defenders.*

* “NOTE.—This action raises a question of no small importance to manufacturers and residents in industrial localities. There is no doubt about the general law applicable to neighbouring properties, that each proprietor or tenant, in making use of his property, must pay reasonable regard to the safety of adjoining property and to the comfort of his neighbours.

“But this general rule, if applied in the manner in which the pursuers here seek to apply it, would, I fear, shut up a very large number of industrial concerns in the city of Glasgow, where it happens that there is residential property in the neighbourhood.

“Each individual case must of course be regarded in the light of its own special circumstances, and it is an important element in the present case that the pursuers elected to set down a residential tenement in the very heart of a busy engineering centre of the city. Neither a proprietor who so sets down a tenement, nor the tenants who elect to reside in it, can expect to be free from disturbance.

“The pursuers in their pleadings and the pursuers' witnesses in their evidence have been exceedingly anxious to characterise the defenders' operations as ‘a nuisance,’ but this is a word which is very often misapplied. If disturbing elements to the peace and quietness of residents in a large industrial city constitute a nuisance, I am afraid very few people indeed who reside anywhere within the city of Glasgow are without cause of complaint. It is a resident's own choice to live in an industrial city, and, if he Argued for the appellants;—Although it was true that in a question of nuisance regard must be had to the character of the neighbourhood, yet even in a district devoted to noisy trades a serious addition to the noise might be restrained at the instance of an owner of property in the district.¹ There was no question but that vibration and noise were a nuisance²; and it was proved that the occupants of the pursuers' property had suffered from the noise of, and the vibration caused by, the defenders' engine. The interdict must, therefore, be granted, whatever might be the loss thereby occasioned to the defenders³; and it was no answer to say that the nuisance had been abated.⁴ The respondents could not take objection to the appellants' title to sue, as there was no plea to title on record. Even according to English law the appellants had a good title, seeing that one of their does so, he must accept certain disadvantages which a resident in a lonely wood or on a mountain top is not subjected to. There are a great many things in a noisy city which quiet people may very well regard as a nuisance in the popular sense of the term, but that is a very different thing from a nuisance in the legal sense, the former being a thing to be endured and the latter a thing to be removed. I do not find in the evidence anything to warrant me holding the defenders' operations to be an offence at law. They are conducting a manufacturing business in premises which have been long used for such a purpose, and in a district of the city mainly devoted to such works. In the conduct of their business they are using necessary machinery, as similar works are doing all round about, and I am unable to hold upon the proof that they are doing so in an unreasonable manner.

"I have all along in this case had some doubt as to the pursuers' exact ground of action. They state only one plea in law as follows:—'The vibration caused by the said gas-engine being a nuisance, and causing material discomfort and annoyance to the pursuers' tenants and damage to the pursuers' property, the pursuers are entitled to interdict as craved.' That is to say, to interdict against the defenders working the gas-engine on their premises in such a way as to cause vibration to the pursuers' property, or at least in such a way as to cause material discomfort and annoyance, and to be a nuisance to the tenants. The ingenious fashion in which the discomfort to the tenants is, in the pleadings, worked in to the allegation of injury to the property, rather suggests doubt on the pursuers' own part as to their ability to establish any relationship of cause and effect between the existence of the gas-engine in the defenders' premises and any specific weakness in the tenement property. The tenement is some forty years old, and the proprietors do not appear to have been anxious to spend much on its upkeep. I am not prepared to accept the theory that some trifling matters which have been spoken to, and which may quite well be the results of ordinary tear and wear, are results of the working of the gas-engine in the adjacent building.

"So far as allegations of damage done to the pursuers' property are concerned, I think the proof entirely fails to establish the occurrence of damage, houses was empty and another was occupied by one of the appellants, James Gibb, and also that part of the damage was structural. But Scots law differed on this point from English law¹; and by the law of Scotland a proprietor could interdict a nuisance although he was not in occupation of his property,² just as a superior could protect the lands feued by him,³ or a landlord could prevent trespass on the lands he had leased.⁴

Argued for the respondents;—The district in which the properties were situated was one in which there were many engineering works; and the vibration and noise of which the appellants complained were such as might be expected in a district of that character. There was nothing therefore to justify an interdict. In any case the appellants had no title to sue. The evidence failed to establish either that the appellants' property had sustained structural injuries or that its letting value was depreciated. All that was proved was that some —far less to connect it with the defenders' operations. I have therefore no hesitation at all in rejecting this branch of the pursuers' claim, upon which it is significant that, neither in the pleadings nor at the proof, any specific figure was put.

"As regards discomfort and annoyance to the pursuers' tenants, I have all along had serious doubt as to the title of the pursuers to sue at all; but, on this branch of the case, the proposition which I think the pursuers mean to present is, although they do not expressly say so, that because the setting up by the defenders of the gas-engine has caused vibration in the pursuers' property—and because the tenants are thereby annoyed—the pursuers' property has been prejudiced as a letting subject, and therefore they can plead that the annoyance to the tenants, although not a claim for material damage to the property, is at least a ground for the landlord seeking interdict. But, unless annoyance to the tenants goes the length of actual prejudice to their property, I do not think the pursuers have any title to use the annoyance to their tenants as a ground for asking interdict against the defenders, and the only prejudice suggested is that the property is rendered less easy to let. But it is a significant circumstance that, in these days of wail about unlet property, this tenement is fully let at the present time, and appears to be a property with the accommodation of which, and the conditions of let of which, the ten tenants are quite satisfied. The factor, no doubt, says now that the current missives were signed upon a condition that he should raise this action, but he has not produced any missive which is so qualified, and I am not able to spell out from the proof that the fact that the gas-engine is there has deterred, or will deter, any tenant, who finds it convenient to reside in this tenement, from doing so.

"Upon the question of annoyance from vibration, a perusal of the notes of evidence confirms the very strong impression which I formed at the proof, that the tenants' evidence is largely hysterical, and upon that I place very little weight. I am inclined to think that with these people (perhaps quite unconsciously to themselves) the wish to get the gas-engine stopped has been father to the thought that the little inconveniences they describe are traceable to the existence of the gas-engine.

"I have very carefully considered the contradictory skilled evidence adduced on either side, and I have come to the conclusion that the prepondiscomfort had been caused to the tenants. This would give the tenants a right of action; but the landlord could not sue in respect of a transitory nuisance. That was the law in England¹; and there was no ground for holding that Scots law was different. In any event efforts had been made to abate any nuisance there might be, and therefore the interdict craved should not be granted meanwhile.

At advising on 21st November 1911,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers in this case seek to prevent what is alleged to be a nuisance caused to the tenants of premises belonging to them at 103 Cathcart Street, Kingston, Glasgow, through the working of a gas-engine in contiguous premises occupied by the defenders. The engine is placed close to the mutual gable between the two premises, and the supports of the pulleys, which run from that engine for the purpose of working the various machines in the defenders' premises, are attached to the gable.

The form in which the case is presented is unfortunate. The pursuers in their pleadings ask the Court to interdict the defenders and their servants from working the gas-engine at all "in such a way as to cause vibration of the property" at 103 Cathcart Street, Kingston, Glasgow, "or at least in such a way as by the vibration occasioned thereby to cause material discomfort and annoyance, and to be a nuisance to the tenants and occupants of" the property. In the argument before us it was maintained on behalf of the defenders that the pursuers have no right whatever to complain, in respect that although they are the proprietors of the property in question they are not the occupants of it. But as to that contention, it is enough to say that there is no plea as to title on record; and there is also, as Lord Dundas pointed out, no plea as to relevancy. It is indeed rather curious that the latter plea, which appears in almost every record, should be absent in a case like this where it might have proved useful to the defenders. I was always under the impression that this plea was a sort of rubber-stamp plea which was inserted in every record in order to meet possibilities which might arise during the progress of the case. However, it does not appear in this record; and even if both pleas were on record, I should have difficulty in perceiving how they could have been upheld, seeing that one of the pursuers was at the time of this complaint, and I suppose still is, an occupant, and therefore is in the position of being his own tenant in the premises.

As regards the facts of the case, I must say I cannot agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute's view. The Sheriff-substitute has not, I think, derance of weight is with the defenders. The tenants in this tenement can never expect absolute quietness and freedom from disturbance, and the question which it seems to me I have to answer is, Whether, having regard to the locality, the defenders are making a use of their property which is unreasonable towards the pursuers? I am unable on the proof to hold that they are doing so, and therefore I refuse the interdict craved."

acted here as a jury would in deciding the question of fact, but has proceeded upon a theory of his own as to the facts. I cannot doubt that, if this case had been tried by a jury, the jury would have been directed that, if they were satisfied upon the evidence that certain things which were proved to have occurred in the pursuers' premises were indications of injury by vibration in these premises caused by the use of this large gas-engine in connection with the various machines in the defenders' premises, then they,
the jury, would be entitled to consider it proved that there was such vibration or such annoyance as would entitle them to find a verdict for the pursuers. But unfortunately the Sheriff-substitute has not dealt with the case in this way. He has proceeded on his own view that certain witnesses were "largely hysterical" in the evidence they gave. What the meaning of "hysterical" evidence is I do not quite understand, but the Sheriff-substitute has gone upon this view, and not upon the facts which were proved. If the facts are proved, it does not matter whether the persons who proved them were hysterical or not. Then the learned Sheriff-substitute says that he looks upon certain things "as trifling matters which have been spoken to, and which may quite well be the results of ordinary tear and wear," and adds that he is not prepared to hold that such things are the results of the working of the gas-engine in the adjacent building.
Here again I am in the position of not being able to agree with the Sheriff-substitute. I think that the matters to which he refers, although they may quite well be such as would result from ordinary tear and wear, are proved in this case to be due not to that cause, but to the vibration of the building. No witness was brought to depone that he had examined these matters and was able to say that they are the result of fair wear and tear occurring before, or apart from, the establishment of the gas-engine and the running of the machinery connected with it.

Therefore we must approach the case independently altogether of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and must look at the evidence for ourselves, taking it as evidence which is laid before us in the ordinary way, and giving our decision upon the question at issue as a question of fact. In the ordinary case we would give very great weight indeed to the views expressed by the Sheriff who saw the witnesses and heard the evidence, but I do not think this is a case in which we can do so.

Now, what are the facts? The facts are that from the time that this engine was established and set to work there were serious complaints made to the landlords in regard to the effect of its working upon the adjoining houses which belonged to them. There is evidence, and it is uncontradicted evidence, that these houses, when the engine was in use, were in a constant state of vibration or shaking; that that could be seen in any vessel holding water; that it could be noticed on articles such as dishes on a dresser, or a mirror standing unfastened on a mantelpiece; that clothes hanging up to dry were in a constant state of motion; that the tenants felt the motion; that it had an effect upon them; and that people who came to visit the houses noticed it and felt it. One very marked instance of that is given in the evidence of one of the tenants, who tells us that when visitors came to see her she advised them to keep on the rug in order that they might feel the vibration less. Many of the witnesses say that it affected their rest—

Nov. 21, 1911. not at the time that the engine was running, for they would not be in bed at that time—but that it affected them nervously, and that various results followed. The doctor who attended one of the tenants attributed the latter's attacks of asthma to the vibration, and gave it as his opinion that in the case of a person susceptible to asthma the vibration would cause nervousness, and thereby produce asthma. I cannot, however, go into the details of all the cases spoken to in the evidence; I can only give the result of my general reading of them. But let me refer to the evidence of Dr Yuill Anderson, who attended patients in the tenement, and who is an important witness. He is a man who, necessarily, from his position, would be observant, and he speaks to certain facts. Thus he says: "After the new gas-engine was installed I noticed the vibration very markedly. I had not noticed anything of the kind before. The place was quite quiet before, and it was a very nice building. The vibration was specially noticeable in Hamilton's house, which was on the north side of the tenement—the side next the engine. One could feel the vibration, and it was very disagreeable." And Mrs Hamilton, whom he attended, he adds, "was so situated that she could not remain there without serious detriment to her health, because of the vibration of the building. I attended Mr Hamilton, not exactly from any effect of vibration, but he was ill and sleepless. He was out most of the day. When I was attending them in October and November 1908 the vibration was very bad; it was always bad when I happened to call in the forenoon or the afternoon. If anyone were ill and in that tenement I would not allow them to remain in the house; they would run a considerable risk in remaining there. Mrs Brown was affected by the vibration to some extent. The vibration was decidedly so bad as to amount to a nuisance." Now, that evidence—and it is that of one who was a visitor to the house, and who is a person accustomed to observe things—is in entire accordance with the evidence of those who lived in the house during the day, and who all speak to the fact of their suffering from this vibration, more or less according to their state of health. That evidence convinces me that there was ground, serious ground, of complaint as regards the working of the defenders' engine. And there is other evidence going further, which I see no ground for disregarding. I refer to the very important evidence which proves that this vibration was not merely in the lower rooms, but that it affected the whole building, so much so, indeed, that the vibration was greater at the very top of the house than it was in the lower storeys. There was a sort of shaking action affecting the whole premises, and the sweep who swept one of the chimneys says that he was afraid lest the vibration might cause him to fall. Now, a sweep is not usually nervous, but he says that he does not like the top of the chimney-head to be shaken, with possible danger to his own safety. With this state of things existing in the building, it appears to me that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute cannot be justified, and that it will not do to speak of the matters as being "trifling," and the evidence as "hysterical."

The next question is whether the nuisance has been abated or so abated that it is no longer a tangible nuisance. Now, I think we must accept the view that something has been done to make the nuisance less than it was before—at least in a matter to which I have not yet alluded. It is proved that there was not merely vibration from the working of the engine and machines, but that there were also a series of thumping noises caused by explosions in the exhaust of the gas-engine. That is a separate cause of nuisance, and is of a very serious nature. I am inclined, however, to think that the evidence shows that that has been abated to a very considerable extent, if not wholly.

M'Ewen v.
Steedman & M'Alister.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

But coming to the conclusion, as I do, that it has been established that there is a nuisance of which the pursuers are entitled to complain, and which ought to be abated, the next question is what is to be done at the present juncture. Mr Wilson has suggested that if we came to that conclusion, it would be only fair to give the defenders an opportunity of abating the nuisance to the best of their ability, in order that it may be ascertained whether there is any necessity for making the interdict perpetual, and Mr Watson very rightly said that to that there could be no objection. In that view I suggest to your Lordships that some reasonable time should be given, say two months, before the matter is brought up before us again, in order that we may know what proceedings the defenders propose to take in order to avoid the decree which would otherwise follow from the judgment. We must find that what is complained of is a nuisance, and in the meantime I think, as the defenders have been wrong in their contention, according to the view I have expressed, they ought to be found liable in the expenses that have been incurred by the pursuers in the conduct of this case.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion, and shall add very little to what your Lordship has said. A considerable amount of argument was offered to us by the respondents' counsel to the effect that a proprietor who is not in the occupation of the subjects has no title to ask an interdict in respect of alleged annoyance, inconvenience, or discomfort caused to his tenants by the operations of a third party, if the injury is only of what was called a "transitory" character, even though he could show that the letting value of his premises was thereby lowered; and some English cases were cited which were said to support that view. I have not considered these cases, and I do not know how far they may support such a doctrine. But it seems to me that the argument is not open in this case; because, as your Lordship has pointed out, there is no plea to raise it; the defenders' only plea on record is one directed to fact. Mr Wilson, when invited to amend his record by adding a plea raising the question of title to sue, said, and I was not surprised, that he was not prepared to add such a plea, with whatever consequences might attend that addition. If it were necessary to point out further difficulties in the way of this argument, one might observe that one of the houses was unlet at the date of the action, and another was in the occupation of one of the proprietors. Upon the question of title to sue, therefore, I need say nothing; but my impression is that the law of Scotland does allow a proprietor to apply for interdict in respect of operations by a third party complained of by his tenant, and lowering, or reasonably calculated to lower, the letting value of his tenement. The point seems at best to be a purely technical one, for I suppose it might have been got over, if necessary, by inducing one or more of the tenants to lend their names, upon security as to expenses, as pursuers of the action.

Nov. 21, 1911. Upon the merits, I agree with all your Lordship has said. One is, of course, slow to differ upon a question of fact from the Sheriff-substitute, especially a Sheriff-substitute so experienced as the one who tried this case; and, if he had said that from the demeanour of the witnesses, or from some other specified cause, he was unable to accept them as credible or veracious witnesses, one would have attached weight to that consideration. But, as your Lordship has pointed out, all that the learned Sheriff-substitute says is that he formed a strong impression at the proof, which a perusal of the notes of evidence confirmed, "that the tenants' evidence is largely hysterical, and upon that I place very little weight." I am not sure that I understand what hysterical evidence may mean, and the learned Sheriff-substitute does not say that anything in the demeanour of the witnesses led him to disbelieve them, or that for any other definite reason their evidence was not, in his opinion, worthy of credit as honest evidence. I confess that, reading the tenants' evidence for myself, it seems to me to be robust and sensible evidence; and if it is true, which I see no reason to doubt, it appears amply sufficient for its purpose, especially when coupled with that of the other witnesses,—doctors, engineers, and so forth. I think the Sheriff-substitute is wrong, and that we should recall his interlocutor, and find that the pursuers are entitled to interdict; but as Mr Wilson suggested delay for the purpose of seeing what could be done, and as Mr Watson very reasonably said he had no objection, the proper course will be to allow a period, as your Lordship suggests, of two months for that purpose.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur. There are two grounds upon which the pursuers here ask interdict. The first is that the engine which has been erected in the defenders' premises is causing injury to the structure of their property. In my opinion there is sufficient evidence to the effect that there has been a certain amount of injury to the property through the vibration, and that if the vibration which existed at the time that the action was brought had continued, there was reasonable apprehension of further injury being caused. That of itself would support an action of interdict of this kind. I further hold, for the reasons which your Lordship in the chair has fully explained, that the vibration at the time that this action was raised—and that is the crucial point in determining whether it was properly raised or not—was such as to cause material discomfort and annoyance to the occupants of the property, including one of the pursuers who was himself occupying a house in the tenement.

These two matters of fact being found against the defenders (and I think we should formulate them in a series of findings), there is really no question of law at all. But as the question has been argued and insisted in I wish to state that my impression of the law of Scotland on the question of title to sue is the same as that which Lord Dundas has indicated. I should be very slow to affirm, as at present advised, that a proprietor would not be entitled to complain of operations which affected materially the comfort of his tenants, and might be likely to induce them not to renew their tenancies, on the mere ground that the whole of his property was at the time let, and that he himself was suffering no personal inconvenience from the operations complained of. But that question really does not arise for decision; because the facts here, being found against the defenders in the way suggested, give ample reason for holding that the pursuers are entitled to the remedy they seek. I only say with regard to the form of this interdict that when we come to consider that, which we need not do at the present time, it seems to me that the first branch of it is much too wide, and will require very serious modification before it can be given effect to in a perpetual interdict.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the said interlocutor [of the Sheriff-substitute]: Find in fact [here followed the findings quoted supra, p. 157]: Find in law that the pursuers are entitled to be protected against a continuance of the said nuisance; but, on the motion of the defenders, not objected to by the pursuers, allow the defenders to take such remedial steps as they may be advised for the removal of the said nuisance, within a period of two months as from this date: . . . Quoad ultra continue the cause."

Executor—Trust—Testamentary trustees—Administration—Payment of debts—Provision for contingent debts—Personal liability of trustees and executors. Taylor & Ferguson, Limited, v. Glass's Trustees.

Three years after the death of a testator, who had granted a letter of guarantee, his testamentary trustees were called upon by the persons in whose favour the guarantee was granted for payment of the sum due thereunder. The trust-estate had proved insufficient to pay the testator's creditors in full, and the trustees, having paid away to them the greater part of the estate, had not sufficient funds left to pay the claim under the guarantee. The creditors under the guarantee thereupon brought an action in which they sought to have the trustees found personally liable for the sum guaranteed, in respect that they had received notice of the guarantee, and that it was their duty to have made provision for payment thereof.

The Court assolized the trustees from the conclusion for personal liability, holding that, as they were not trustees for creditors, they were entitled after six months to pay the testator's debts primo venienti without making provision for this contingent claim.

Observations (per the Lord President) on the duties of trustees and executors with regard to payment of debts.

ON 16th June 1910 Taylor & Ferguson, Limited, wholesale wine merchants, 11 Oswald Street, Glasgow, brought an action against John Glass and others, the testamentary trustees of the deceased John Glass, 597 Gallowgate, Glasgow, as such trustees and as individuals, for payment of a sum of £500, being the sum due under a guarantee granted by John Glass to the pursuers.

The following narrative of the facts, down to the death of John

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Skerrington.

Nov. 22, 1911. Glass, is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington):—

Taylor &
Ferguson,
Limited, v.
Glass's
Trustees.

" On 23rd March 1900 the late John Glass gave to the pursuers a letter of guarantee which bore that the pursuers were about to advance to John Donohoe the sum of £2100 on loan, 'to continue so long as you (the pursuers) may think fit, and that it has been arranged that I should guarantee you due repayment thereof to the extent after mentioned.' By the said letter the said John Glass bound himself and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, all jointly and severally with the said John Donohoe, to repay the said loan to the pursuers (at any time, on receiving two months' notice of their desire to obtain repayment), but that only to the extent of £500 sterling, to which sum the said guarantee had been agreed to be limited. The said guarantee further provided that 'although any promissory-note or bill held by you for the said loan is not presented for payment, or is held unenforced, or is renewed, this guarantee shall remain binding upon me, and shall be a continuing guarantee so long as the said sum of two thousand one hundred pounds, or any part thereof, and interest thereon, shall remain unpaid by the said John Donohoe or his representatives.'

" John Glass died on 2nd June 1906, at which date the principal sum due to the pursuers was £1650. Since then £20 has been paid to account, leaving £1630 still due. These figures are not formally admitted on record, but it was not disputed by the defenders' counsel that a much larger sum than £500 is still due by Donohoe to the pursuers."

After John Glass's death the defenders' agent, on 29th June 1906, wrote to the pursuers for a note of the amount standing at the credit of the deceased in their books, and on the same day he received a reply that the pursuers had a letter of guarantee from the deceased for Mr Donohoe for £500.

On 25th December 1906 the defenders' agent wrote to the pursuers as follows:—"The guarantee of the late Mr Glass to you will cause considerable trouble to the trust-estate, and I will be glad to know if you can suggest, outside of payment from the trust-funds, any means whereby the guarantee could be changed," and pursuers replied that they had no suggestion to make.

Nothing further was done until 9th December 1909, when the pursuers intimated to the defenders that they would require payment of the sum guaranteed. On the pursuers pressing for payment, the agent for the defenders wrote as follows:—"There is not the slightest chance of the £500 you refer to being paid in the course of a few days. The trustees have no funds, and the properties are bonded, if not for more than their value, at all events it is up to it."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 6) "Since the death of the deceased John Glass the defenders have administered his estate; and although they were aware of the obligation contained in the said letter of guarantee, they have made payments out of the trust-funds to other creditors from time to time. In particular, it is believed and averred that on or about 23rd August 1907 a sum of £780 was divided among certain ordinary creditors of the deceased, being a payment to them of 10s. per £ on the amount of their debts; and that on or about 27th May 1908 a further sum of £385, 7s. 2d. was paid to the creditors in respect of a further dividend of 5s. per £. In these circumstances, in the event of it being the case, which, however, is not admitted, that there are no available funds in the trust to satisfy the claim of the pursuers, the defenders have rendered themselves personally liable for payment of the said debt, in respect that they have paid away trust funds in their charge without making provision for payment of the pursuers' debt."

Taylor &
Ferguson,
Limited, v.
Glass's
Trustees.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders being liable to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £500 under the letter of guarantee libelled, decree should be pronounced as craved. (2) The defenders having failed to make provision for payment of the said sum out of the trust funds in their charge before paying away the sums condescended on, they are personally liable to the pursuers therefor."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) In respect that the defenders acted in good faith and in the ordinary course of trust administration in making the payments to the deceased's creditors condescended on, and that the pursuers at that time made no claim against the trust-estate, the defenders are not individually liable for the sum sued for.

On 8th November 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the fifth plea in law for the defenders, and repels the second plea in law for the pursuers; and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, so far as laid against them personally, and decerns against them as trustees of the deceased John Glass in terms of the conclusions of the summons," &c.*

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted supra]—The first ground upon which the defenders, Mr Glass's testamentary trustees, claimed to escape liability was that, subsequent to the death of Mr Glass, the pursuers had continued to renew the bills for the principal sum due by him. It was argued that the clause above quoted had no reference to the period subsequent to the death of Mr Glass. This construction is, in my opinion, far too narrow—the plain object of the parties being that the guarantee should continue until the loan had been repaid, notwithstanding the fact that bills had been held over or renewed. It was further argued that the trustees' liability was barred mora and personali exceptione, but I find no relevant averments in support of this contention. It follows, in my opinion, that the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for against Mr Glass's trustees.

"The pursuers further claim that they are entitled to decree against the defenders as individuals, in respect that the latter have incurred personal liability for the debt by paying to the creditors, other than the pursuers, dividends amounting to 15s. per £. It is doubtful whether the trust-estate still in the hands of the defenders will be enough to provide the pursuers with an equalising dividend. I am of opinion that this claim is unfounded. The pursuers' claim under their letter of guarantee was essentially conditional upon the principal debtor failing to pay when called upon; and it was further in terms conditional upon the pursuers giving to the guarantor two months' notice of their desire to obtain repayment. Instead of liquidating their claim against Mr Glass's estate, as they might have done, by demanding payment from the principal debtor and from Mr Glass's representatives, the pursuers contented themselves with informing Mr Glass's trustees by letter, dated 29th June 1906, that they held the said letter of guarantee. They did not demand repayment, as they no doubt preferred to continue the former course of dealing with the principal debtor. In these circumstances, Mr Glass's trustees were, I think, entitled to pay the creditors

Nov. 22, 1911. The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 20th June 1911.

Taylor &
Ferguson,
Limited, v.
Glass's
Trustees.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The defenders having made payments to some of the creditors of the deceased in knowledge of his obligation to the pursuers, but without making provision therefor, had incurred personal liability in respect thereof.¹ The case might be contrasted with the case of Stewart's Trustees v. Evans,² in which payments were made by trustees in the reasonable belief that all debts had been satisfied. It was the duty of the defenders to preserve the trust-estate until the pursuers were paid.³ As trustees the defenders were liable for the full sum sued for, and as individuals, for 15s. in the £, being the amount paid to other creditors of the deceased.

Argued for the respondents;—Whatever might be the duties of executors or testamentary trustees as between beneficiaries and creditors, they had no duty as between different creditors of the deceased, because they were not trustees for creditors.⁴ They were free to act as the deceased might honestly have done; and if the pursuers had suffered prejudice they had only themselves to blame, for they had by their delay taken the risk of their guarantee not being met. Testamentary trustees were not bound to provide for contingent debts.⁵

At advising on 22nd November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case Messrs Taylor & Ferguson, wine and spirit merchants, sue certain gentlemen who are executors of the late Mr Glass in respect of a letter of guarantee which was granted by Mr Glass during his lifetime, in which he guaranteed the account of Mr Donohoe up to the extent of £500. The Lord Ordinary has granted decree against the defenders in their representative capacity, but he has refused to give decree against them personally, and in the reclaiming note before your Lordships the respondents do not complain of the decree which was given against them in their representative capacity, but the pursuers insist that besides that they ought to have decree against the defenders personally.

Now the state of affairs was this, that Mr Glass died in June 1906. There seem to have been various transactions between Mr Glass and Messrs Taylor & Ferguson, because there was an application by the trustees, through their solicitor, to Messrs Taylor & Ferguson to know what credit he had standing in their books. In answer to that, the trustees and executors were told that there was a letter of guarantee existing which had who had liquid debts; and it is not, in my opinion, material that they were unable to pay in full, but only paid a dividend.

“I accordingly assoilzie the defenders from the action so far as laid against them personally.”

been granted by Mr Glass for Mr Donohoe to the extent of £500. The Nov, 22, 1911. trustees then asked Messrs Taylor & Ferguson if they had any proposal to make in connection with the letter of guarantee and they said they had none, and upon that nothing was done. I ought to explain that the letter of guarantee was for sums in which Mr Donohoe might be indebted to Messrs Taylor & Ferguson, and no steps were taken by Messrs Taylor & Ferguson at this time to constitute their debt against Mr Donohoe, but their course of dealing with Mr Donohoe was allowed to go on.

Nothing more seems to have been heard of the matter until three years after the death of Glass, when Messrs Taylor & Ferguson proceeded to constitute their debt against Mr Donohoe and then intimated to the trustees that they would require payment of the £500, Donohoe, it seems, not having been in a position to pay what he was due. The trustees intimated that they had not now sufficient money to pay £500, most of the money in their hands having been paid to Glass's creditors. To that Messrs Taylor & Ferguson replied that they "understand Mr Glass's creditors have received a composition of 15s. per £," and that they "think a sum should have been set aside to meet this guarantee. Under the circumstances, we consider that the trustees are responsible." And that is the position that is taken up in this action.

Now, it is perhaps curious that there is not more explicit law upon this subject; but, it seems to me, the matter is really perfectly well settled. I should like to repeat here—as I can now do with more authority—what I said in a case of Laird v. Hamilton,¹ which I decided for Lord Guthrie in the Outer House; and there, speaking of an executor, I said that though he is not a trustee for creditors, "I do not think that the proposition that he is not a trustee in a question with a deceased's creditors is exactly the same as saying that he therefore has no duty whatever to them. The authorities are somewhat vague upon what the precise confines of this duty are, but that there is such a duty may be well gathered, I think, from the way in which Lord M'Laren² has expressed the matter in section 2159 of his work."

Now, I think that the duty comes to be this: Emphatically he is not a trustee. That was laid down in a considered judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the *Globe Insurance Company v. Mackenzie*³; and the same proposition was repeated, following, of course, that judgment, in the case of Mitchell v. Mackersy,⁴ which reaffirmed the case of Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart's Executrix,⁵ and which finally overruled the case of Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.⁶ Accordingly, we start with the proposition that the executor is not a trustee for creditors. He is eadem persona cum defuncto, and as eadem persona cum defuncto he is bound to pay, and can be made to pay, the deceased's debts. He cannot be sued within six months, but after the six months, I think he is bound to pay any just debt that is brought to him; and, as it is often expressed, he is bound to pay Nov. 22, 1911. primo venienti. I do not mean that that expression must be pressed too far. As I said in Laird's case,¹ I do not think the executor would be entitled, so to speak, to get up early on the first day after the six months had expired and run round to those creditors whom he liked best and leave the others in the lurch. But, on the other hand, I think he is entitled to pay when persons come forward. If they come forward in such numbers that he sees that the estate is insolvent, I think it would certainly be his duty to give notice to them to that effect and not pay more to one than to another; and, undoubtedly, he is not entitled—because there are cases decided to that effect—he is not entitled to pay a creditor whom he knows to be a deferred creditor and leave the preferred creditor unsatisfied. Of course, there are not many creditors who are in the position of preferred creditors in the sense in which I am using the word, but there are some. On the other hand, the trustee is not bound to turn himself into a trustee in bankruptcy, and I think, therefore, what it comes to is this—that the next step lies with the person who says that the money is due to him.

Taylor &
Ferguson,
Limited, v.
Glass's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

In other words, in this case I think it was Messrs Taylor & Ferguson's business to make up their minds in 1906 either to constitute their debt against Mr Donohoe and then proceed to make good the liability under the guarantee, or else to go on dealing with Mr Donohoe, but in that way to take the risk that the deceased guarantor's money might be paid away to his lawful creditors. Really, when you say that the executor is eadem persona cum defuncto, you seem to solve the problem. Suppose one of those other creditors had come to Mr Glass when alive and had said to him, "Pay me my debt," would it have been any answer on Mr Glass's part to say, "No, I cannot pay you your debt in full because I know there is a guarantee under which, in a few years' time, I may be called on to pay, and I must really keep some money to pay that creditor as well as you"? That answer would have been no answer at all, and, therefore, it really comes to this—that we should either have to lay down the proposition that no executor was in safety to pay unless he was actually made to pay by legal process, or else, if that is not so—and it is well settled it is not so,—then we must take the position which I am venturing to take here.

Accordingly, I think this view, which is really merely expressing at rather greater length the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary has come, is a just one.

Process—Reclaiming note—Competency—Failure to box prints—Excusable cause—Conjoined actions—Record in one action only boxed—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 18—A. S., 11th July 1828, sec. 77. Henderson v. D. & W. Henderson.

The Judicature Act, 1825, section 18, provides that a party reclaiming against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary shall box, along with his reclaiming note, printed copies of the record; and the Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, section 77, provides that a reclaiming note against an Outer House interlocutor shall not be received unless there be appended thereto copies of the record.

Objection was taken to the competency of a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, disposing of two conjoined actions, on the ground that the reclaimer had boxed, with his reclaiming note, copies of the record in one only of these actions. The Court (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) repelled the objection and ordered the case to be put to the roll, holding that it was within the power of the Court to permit prints to be lodged if in their view it was from some excusable cause that they were not lodged at the proper time, and that in the circumstances of this case there was excusable cause, looking to the confusion between the two records brought about by the conjoining of the actions.

By interlocutor dated 21st February 1911, the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) ^{1ST DIVISION.} conjoined two cross actions, the parties to which were respectively the dissolved firm of D. & W. Henderson and Mr Lawrence David Henderson, a partner of the firm. ^{Lord Cullen.}

By interlocutor dated 10th June 1911, the Lord Ordinary assolized the firm from the conclusions of Mr Henderson's action against them, and by the same interlocutor decerned against Mr Henderson in the action at the firm's instance.

Mr Henderson reclaimed against this interlocutor, and boxed with his reclaiming note copies of the record in the action at his own instance against the firm, but failed to box copies of the record in the firm's action against himself.

On 6th July 1911, in Single Bills of the First Division, counsel for the respondents opposed the reclaimer's motion to send the case to the roll, and argued;—The reclaiming note was incompetently presented in respect of the reclaimer's failure to box prints of the record in the firm's action against him. The provisions of the Judicature Act and Act of Sederunt of 11th July, 1828,* on this subject were peremptory and could not be dispensed with.¹

* The Judicature Act 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), enacts:—Sec. 18. "And be it further enacted, that when any interlocutor shall have been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, either of the parties dissatisfied therewith shall be entitled to apply for a review of it to the Inner House . . . provided that such party shall, within twenty-one days from the date of the interlocutor, print and put into the boxes . . . a note reciting the Lord

Nov. 28, 1911. Argued for the reclaimer;—The statutory provisions founded on Henderson v. D. & W. Henderson. were directory, not imperative. The Court might allow prints to be lodged in circumstances where, as here, the mistake was excusable, and the other party had suffered no prejudice.¹ The omission here was excusable; it arose from the mistake of the printer who, having boxed one record with the reclaiming note, did not realise that there were conjoined actions and that two records should have been boxed. Alternatively, if the reclaiming note was held to be incompetent, this was a case in which the reclaimer should be allowed to submit the interlocutor to review by petition under section 16 of the Administration of Justice and Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. cap. 151.)²

At advising on 23rd November 1911, the opinion of the Court, (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the decisions quoted to us were indubitably conflicting, and accordingly we have reconsidered the whole matter along with the Second Division.

The decision of the Court is that it is within our power to permit prints to be lodged if, in our view, it was for some excusable cause that they were not lodged at the proper time. We think that in this case there was an excusable cause looking to the confusion between the two records brought about by the conjoining of the actions and, accordingly, we shall send the note to the roll. But we wish it to be distinctly understood that this does not mean that there is to be any relaxation of the rules as to printing, and lodging, and boxing, and so on, and that persons must not think they will be allowed to get their cases to the roll unless there is really a very good cause shown.

THE COURT repelled the objection and ordered the case to be sent to the roll.

Process—Printing documents for Inner House—Documents not in process.

It is the duty of the Clerks of Court in the Inner House to refuse to receive into process prints of any documents which are not already in process. If a party has failed to lodge a document on which he intended to found, he must move the Court for leave to lodge it.

IN an action at the instance of Mrs Alice Stanley Peake or Grierson, with the concurrence of her husband, James Cullen Grierson, solicitor, Lerwick, against Charles Ernest Mitchell, fishcurer, Northness, Lerwick, the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington), on 21st June 1910, pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the action.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord
 Skerrington.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) on 30th June, 24th October, and 7th and 8th November 1911.

While the case was in the Inner House prints of documents for both parties were boxed to the Court and lodged in process. It appeared at the hearing that the documents so printed had not been lodged in process.

At advising on 24th November 1911,—

LORD SALVESEN.—[In the course of his opinion said]—In the Inner House various prints were boxed to the Court containing some correspondence which had passed between the agents for the parties, partly before and partly after the action was raised. It appeared in the end that none of the correspondence was in process, that there was no admission of its genuineness, and it was said by the defender to be incomplete. In these circumstances it was entirely irregular to print and box the various appendices which contain it. It cannot be too clearly understood by the profession that no documents must be printed for the Inner House which have not been lodged in process; and it is the duty of the Clerk to refuse to receive into the process any print of documents which are not already in process. If there has been an error in failing to lodge some document on which parties intended to found, a motion must be made to the Court for leave to lodge it in process. So firmly has this rule been fixed in our practice that the Court is entitled to assume that any appendix which is boxed to it will contain only documents which are in process.

In the circumstances above narrated I think it is the duty of the Court to refuse to look at the correspondence.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

Reparation—Slander—Trade slander—Representation that person is unworthy of commercial credit—Privilege—Malice—Trade Protection Society.

A local association of traders issued to its members a list of the names and addresses of certain persons in the district. The list bore no title and contained no comment on the persons whose names were included; but it was admittedly compiled from the "black lists." A person whose name appeared in the list brought an action of damages for slander against the association, in which he averred that the list was known in the district as the "black list," and that the defenders by inserting his name in it had represented that he was unworthy of business credit.

The Court held (1) that the publication of the pursuer's name in the list was defamatory; but (2) that the defenders were privileged in issuing the list; and, as facts inferring malice were not averred, dismissed the action.

Macintosh v. Dun, [1908] A. C. 390, considered.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

JOHN BARR, china-merchant, Musselburgh, brought an action of damages for slander in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against the Musselburgh Merchants Association and certain individuals, "members of committee, and as such office-bearers representing the said Association."

The material averments on record were as follows (the passages italicised being added by amendment at the hearing before the Inner House):—(Cond. 2) "The defenders' Association has for a considerable number of years annually printed, published, and circulated, or caused to be printed, published, and circulated, to and among the traders in Musselburgh and district a list of names and addresses of persons in Musselburgh and district. The said list is prepared and published by the defenders for the purpose of setting forth the names of persons who are unworthy of business credit, and whom it would be unsafe for traders to deal with. It is understood by the members of the Association that the list is composed of the names of persons who are unworthy of business credit, and with whom it would be unsafe to deal. The list is known and referred to as the Black List. In particular, the said defenders on or about the year 1909 printed, published, and circulated, or caused to be so printed, published, and circulated, among said traders a list of such names and addresses, and in each of said lists the defenders wrongfully and maliciously and without probable cause included the name and address of the pursuer, and published and circulated said lists with pursuer's name included therein. By so including the name and address of the pursuer in their said list for the said year before mentioned, and publishing and circulating the same as aforesaid, the defenders have repeatedly and persistently, falsely and maliciously, and without probable cause, represented to the traders and business community of Musselburgh and district that pursuer is a person who will not or does not pay his debts, that he is absolutely unworthy of business credit, that he is unsafe or untrustworthy in his dealings, and that all transactions with him should be for cash payments, and not left to be dealt with according to the usual course of trade. Further, by wrongfully and maliciously including pursuer's name in said list, the defenders intended to represent, as they falsely and maliciously did represent, Nov. 24, 1911.

to the traders and business community of Musselburgh and district that the pursuer is untrustworthy and a person with whom it is not wise to do business upon the ordinary terms of credit; that the trading community required to be frequently warned against him; and that the pursuer was a person whose financial position was so bad as to render it unsafe for traders to have business relations with him. The said representations so made by the defenders of and concerning the pursuer were false and calumnious and unfounded in fact. They were made maliciously and recklessly by the defenders, who could, had they taken the trouble to inquire, have discovered they were groundless. The defenders' statements, as far as not coinciding with those of the pursuer, are denied. With reference to the case in Court on 15th March 1905, defender failed to attend Court, but paid immediately after. The pursuer did not know that he had incurred any liability, his wife having, unknown to him, signed his name to a cautionary obligation. With reference to the case in 1908, there was a bona fide contest and decree given after proof, and this appeared in Stubbs' list. The pursuer paid the sum." (Ans. 2) "Denied. The defenders' Association have issued to their own members only two lists containing the names and addresses of persons resident in the locality whose names have appeared in the various publications issued in Scotland and known as 'black lists.' The first of the said two lists was issued by the defenders' Association in the year 1908, and the other in 1909. Pursuer's name was included in the second of said two lists for the following reasons. Pursuer's name had appeared on two occasions in the said black lists, once in March 1905 in respect of a decree against him for £6 obtained in Edinburgh Small-Debt Court on 15th March 1905, and once in July 1908 in respect of a decree for £14 obtained in Edinburgh Small-Debt Court on 16th July 1908. Said decree for £14 was pronounced in an action at the instance of a Musselburgh man. After the last-mentioned decree was pronounced the pursuer refused to pay the sums decerned for, and the holder of the decree proceeded to poind the effects in pursuer's premises.
The pursuer alleged that he was possessed of no means, and that everything on his premises belonged to his wife. The poinded goods were advertised in the local newspapers to be sold by warrant of the Sheriff under the said decree and poinding before the present pursuer paid the amount decerned for against him. These proceedings against the present pursuer and advertisements were well known among the trading community of Musselburgh. One of the purposes of the defenders' Association is to inform its members of the names and addresses of persons in the locality against whom small-debt decrees have been pronounced, and in consequence of the foresaid proceedings against the present pursuer the defenders' Association were justified in including his name in the said list of names issued by them to their members. The said list was for private circulation only, and was not issued to any person not a member of the defenders' Association." (Cond. 3) "During the years 1905, 1906, and 1907 the defenders marked, or caused to be marked, in the Musselburgh Directory of these years the names of such persons in Musselburgh and district who they represented were unworthy of business credit, and with whom it would be unsafe for traders to deal, and in the Musselburgh Directory of each of the said years the defenders wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause marked, or caused to be marked, the name and address of pursuer as a person unworthy of business credit, and published, or caused to be published, Musselburgh Directories with pursuer's name so marked. It was known to all those who had cause to consult said Directories the reason of said marking. By so marking the name and address of pursuer in said Directories for each of the said years the defenders have repeatedly and persistently, falsely and maliciously, and without probable cause, represented to the traders and business community of Musselburgh and district that pursuer is a person who will not, or does not, pay his debts, that he is absolutely unworthy of business credit, that he is unsafe," &c. [the rest of the alleged representation being set forth in identical language with that of Cond. 2]. (Ans. 3) "Denied."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The action as laid is incompetent. (3) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) The list issued by the defenders' Association having been so issued without malice and in discharge of a duty to the members of the Association and being for their benefit, defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

On 4th August 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof. The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Maconochie) who on 25th October 1910 recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 2nd and 3rd November 1911.

Argued for the appellant ;—(1) The publication complained of was defamatory. It was not disputed that the fact that decree had been obtained against a person might be published with impunity ; but this was so only if the whole facts necessary to a true representation were disclosed.¹ In the present case, if the respondents' publication had stated that decrees had been obtained against the appellant, and had given the dates of these decrees, the appellant would have had no ground for complaint. But the representation in the respondents' list went beyond this. It held up the appellant as unworthy of credit. It would not avail the respondents that ex facie the list might not appear to be defamatory. The circumstances attending its publication must be considered,² and these attached to the list a defamatory meaning. In fact, the respondents had placed the appellant's name in a black list ; and this was prima facie actionable.³ (2) There was no privilege here. The respondents' rights were no higher than the rights of any member of the public. It was only where communications were made in the interest of the general public that there was privilege.⁴ There was no privilege if the communication was made in the interest of an individual only, or of a class of individuals as here. In *Macintosh v. Dun*⁵ the statement complained of, although it was contained in a confidential document, was held not to be privileged. In Bayne & Thomson v. Stubbs, Limited,⁶ the statement complained of was held to be privileged, but mainly because it was elicited by a specific request for information. There was no such request in the present case. *Keith v. Lauder*¹ was described by Lord Stormonth-Darling "as dangerously near the line." Even if the list here were held to be privileged, there were facts and circumstances averred in condescendence³ which indicated malice on the part of the respondents. (3) In any case, the respondents were guilty of an actionable wrong. The principle of *Quinn v. Leathem*² applied here. As in that case the plaintiff complained of an attempt by the defendants to prevent other persons employing him, so here the appellant complained of an attempt on the part of the respondents to prevent other traders giving him credit. There was co-operation to injure the appellant in his business. (4) The action was properly laid. The defender in the action was the Association. The individual members were called in their representative capacities, and were conjoined with the Association only in order that the pursuer might obtain a valid decree.³

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The appellant's case was irrelevant. The list contained no heading or comment, and there was nothing to support the appellant's innuendo. But even if the respondents had represented that the appellant was unworthy of credit, that representation was not actionable.⁴ Further, as the list was a private document the appellant must state how, and to whom, it had been published. (2) The respondents were privileged.⁵ Where the members of a trade were all interested in obtaining information for their protection, they were entitled to communicate that information to each other.⁶ In *Macintosh v. Dun*⁷ the decision in favour of the plaintiffs was based on the fact that the defendants were a firm who sold information; and it was clearly indicated in Lord Macnaghten's opinion that had the defendants been a trade association such as the respondents the action could not have been maintained. (3) The appellant's action was for damages on the ground that he had been slandered; and he could not, therefore, rely on the principle of Quinn v. Leathem.⁸ (4) The action was not properly laid against the individual defenders. Some of these were not members of the committee of the Association in 1909, and could not therefore be made liable for what had been done in that year.

Nov. 24, 1911. defenders having issued to their members a four-page leaflet or 'black list' containing the names and addresses of people in Musselburgh and vicinity, who were therein represented as unworthy of credit, which leaflet or 'black list' maliciously, wrongfully, and without probable cause, included the name and address of pursuer, meaning thereby that he was unable to pay his debts and was a person unworthy of credit, whereby pursuer has suffered in his feelings and reputation." Certain persons named as the "office-bearers representing the said Association" are called as defenders; but the pursuer's counsel explained that this was done merely to obviate any objection to the Association being cited solely in its own name, and not with the intention of asking or obtaining decree against these defenders as individuals. I greatly doubt whether this explanation justifies the pursuer's crave for "decree against the defenders conjunctly and severally"; but in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to say more upon this point.

Barr v.
Musselburgh
Merchants Association.
Lord Dundas.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof; but the Sheriff recalled the interlocutor, and dismissed the action as irrelevant. The pursuer appealed; and at our bar his counsel asked and obtained leave to amend his record. His averments now disclose, in my opinion, a relevant case, apart from the question of privilege, which I shall presently deal with; and it is unnecessary to consider whether or not I should have been prepared to assent to the learned Sheriff's view in regard to the averments as they stood before him. The pursuer alleges that the defenders' Association caused to be prepared and circulated among its members a list of names and addresses of persons in Musselburgh district. "The said list is prepared and published by the defenders for the purpose of setting forth the names of persons who are unworthy of business credit and whom it would be unsafe for traders to deal with. It is understood by the members of the Association that the list is composed of the names of persons who are unworthy of business credit, and with whom it would be unsafe to deal. The list is known and referred to as the 'black list.'" The pursuer states that the defenders wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause included his name in their black list, to his loss, injury, and damage. It seems to me that the case thus summarised would, if no questions of privilege and malice were involved, be relevant. I may add, however, that it would, to my mind, be relevant only as an action of slander of the pursuer in regard to his trade or employment; and I decline to follow Mr MacRobert in his ingenious effort to bring the case within the category to which such decisions as *Allen v. Flood*¹ and *Quinn v. Leathem*² belong.

But a further difficulty lies in the pursuer's way. We have to consider whether, even on his own showing, the matter of privilege does not arise; and if it does, whether he has averred (as he would be bound to do) malice on the part of the defenders. This point, which is evidently intended to be raised by the defenders' fifth plea in law, does not seem to have been argued in the Courts below, though the Sheriff-substitute alludes in his note to "malice and privilege as these may be disclosed in the proof." The record on both sides is very meagre (as regards essentials) and ill drawn. But I gather from it, and from the admitted conditions of the Nov. 24, 1911. argument at our bar, that the defenders are not a company trading as such for profit, but merely a private association of traders who, at their own expense and for the protection of their mutual trading interests, cause to be prepared and circulated annually among their members (but to no one who is not a member) a list of names such as that which is produced and which includes the name of the pursuer. The list has no heading, nor anything to indicate with what object it has been put together; but, for the purpose of the present argument, we may assume the pursuer's account of that matter to be correct.

Barr v.
Musselburgh
Merchants Association.
Lord Dundas.

It was not, I think, disputed, and, at all events, I am prepared to hold, that an association of traders for the protection of its members' interests by the mutual interchange of information as to the financial stability of persons with whom they may be called upon to trade is not in itself illegal—see, e.g., Keith v. Lauder.¹ Such an association seems to me to stand on an essentially different footing from that of a company formed for the purpose of acquiring and publishing for profit information as to the pecuniary circumstances of persons in whose solvency (or the reverse) subscribers may be interested. Information so communicated is given at the peril of the company which has chosen to engage in a risky and hazardous commercial enterprise; and their statements, if in fact false, though made in bona fide, will not be held privileged. But privilege does, I think, extend to the case of information of a similar sort circulated among the members of an association like the present for the protection of their mutual trade interests, unless the information is not only false in fact, but has been obtained and circulated maliciously, or with such recklessness as to its truth or falsehood as the law holds to be equivalent to malice. The law on this matter and the distinction I have indicated are well set out in a recent and authoritative decision of the Privy Council—*Macintosh v. Dun*²—where the opinion of the Committee (consisting of Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lords Ashbourne, Macnaghten, Robertson, Atkinson, and Collins) was delivered by Lord Macnaghten. The defendants there carried on an extensive business as a trade protective society, under the name of "The Mercantile Agency," which consisted in obtaining information with reference to the commercial standing and position of persons in New South Wales and elsewhere, and in communicating such information confidentially to subscribers to the agency in response to specific and confidential inquiry on their part; and they issued to their subscribers forms upon which to fill in the substance of their requests for information. The defendants were sued for damages for libel in respect of certain statements made by them about the plaintiff in response to a request for information by a subscriber. The High Court of Australia entered judgment for the defendants. The Privy Council reversed that decision. The only question raised by the appeal was whether or not the occasion on which the libels (as they were admitted to be) were published was a privileged occasion. Lord Macnaghten's opinion was in the negative. It is important to observe the grounds of his judgment. He first pointed out that the defendants were to be regarded as volunteers in sup-

² [1908] A. C. 390.

Nov. 24, 1911. plying the information, and that their motive in so doing was not a sense of duty, but a matter of business. "Their motive is self-interest. They carry on their trade just as other traders do, in the hope and expectation of making a profit." His Lordship then considered whether it is in the interest of the community and the welfare of society that "the protection which the law throws around communications made in legitimate self-defence, or from a bona fide sense of duty, should be extended to communications made from motives of self-interest by persons who trade for profit in the characters of other people," and gave answer in the negative, because "it is only right that those who engage in such a business, touching so closely very dangerous ground, should take the consequences if they overstep the law."

Barr v.
Musselburgh
Merchants Association.

Lord Dundas.

It seems to me that the present defenders' position places them on the safe or favoured side of the line thus drawn by Lord Macnaghten. The information complained of was circulated by them among their members "in legitimate self-defence"; they are not "persons who trade for profit in the characters of other people." I think *Macintosh v. Dun*¹ affords a clear and authoritative rule for the decision of questions like this. It may be noted that Lord Macnaghten's opinion was delivered after the citation of a great mass of decisions. His Lordship relied upon a well-known passage, "frequently cited, and always with approval," from the opinion of Lord Wensleydale (then Parke, B.), in Toogood v. Spyring,² which I shall quote at length, as I believe it to be a correct statement of Scots (as of English) law: "The law considers such publication" (i.e., of statements false in fact and injurious to the character of another) "as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned. In such cases the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorised communications, and affords a qualified defence depending on the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society; and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits." Parke, B., added, a little later: "If made with honesty of purpose to a party who has any interest in the inquiry (and that has been very liberally construed) the simple fact that there has been some casual bystander cannot alter the nature of the transaction." In Whiteley v. Adams,³ Erle, C.J., to whose opinion Lord Macnaghten refers, in explaining the circumstances which warrant a Judge in holding an occasion to be privileged, includes a communication honestly made "on the ground of an interest in the party making or receiving it," and goes on to state (at p. 418) the underlying principle of the matter to be "that it is to the general interest of society that correct information should be obtained as to the character of persons in whom others have an interest."

I see no reason to doubt that the principles of law laid down or approved in *Macintosh v. Dun*¹ are applicable in Scotland as well as in England ; and I think it may be deduced from these that the law does, Nov. 24, 1911.

² (1834) 1 C. M. & R. 181, at p. 193.

 in the general interests of society, extend the protection of privilege to communications made in bona fide (though erroneously) about a third person, Barr v.
 where the parties making and receiving them have a legitimate business Musselburgh interest in the communication. The conclusion thus reached seems also to Merchants fall within the limits of the doctrine laid down by the First Division in Association.
Macdonald v. M'Coll.¹ Accordingly, it appears to me that, when this Lord Dundas.
 Association circulated the leaflet complained of among its members, the communication was privileged, because every one of the members had a legitimate interest in its contents, and they were entitled to obtain and share these, so long as the matter was gone about honestly and without malice. We were referred during the discussion to Bayne & Thomson v.
Stubbs, Limited,² where Lord Moncreiff appears to have reserved his opinion as to a question such as we are now dealing with. I am not sure that some of the views expressed by the learned Judges might not, if a similar case arose, be subject to reconsideration in the light of the later and authoritative decision in Macintosh v. Dun,³ but it is sufficient to observe that, in any view, Bayne & Thomson v. Stubbs, Limited,² forms no obstacle to the disposal of the present question in the sense I have indicated.

If my view is correct, there seems to be an end of the matter, for, though the word "maliciously" is occasionally used by the pursuer, I cannot find in his record anything that amounts to a sufficient averment of malice on the part of the defenders. I accordingly agree with the learned Sheriff in holding—though not upon the same grounds—that the action is irrelevant, and must be dismissed.

LORD SALVESEN.—I agree in Lord Dundas' opinion and have little to add. The pursuer's record as now amended is, I think, plainly relevant ; and I would have held it to be so even in its original form. The mere fact that the list of names which the defenders circulate amongst their members does not contain any heading is, in my opinion, immaterial, if it in fact conveys to the members receiving it the information that the persons named are unworthy of business credit. The defenders themselves admit that the list contains the names which appear in the various publications issued in Scotland known as "black lists"—that is to say, it is a list of persons against whom decrees in absence have been obtained, or against whom judicial proceedings have been taken, which suggest that such persons are in embarrassed circumstances. Indeed, such a list might be the more damaging to a particular person included in it because of no reason being given why he was so included. Had the case therefore stopped there I should have been inclined, differing from the Sheriff, to have allowed inquiry.

There is, however, another ground on which the same result as the Sheriff arrived at may be reached. The complaint in the initial writ is that the list was issued by the defenders to their members, and it appears that these members are all traders in Musselburgh, who have formed an association for their own protection in dealing with possible customers. Each of them has ¹ (1901) 3 F. 1082.² 3 F. 408.³ [1908] A. C. 390.

Nov. 24, 1911. a legitimate trade interest in knowing the persons from whose past history it might reasonably be inferred that more than the average risk is incurred in supplying them with goods on credit. Now I think that if one trader in Musselburgh communicates to another in good faith information which he has received with regard to a possible customer of both, bearing on such customer's credit, that such a communication is privileged; and it makes no difference that the information is systematically obtained by an official of the Association on the instructions of the members for their guidance in their business dealings. The cases referred to by Lord Dundas quite bear out this proposition. It is probably true that a communication of this kind is not made in the discharge of either a public or a private duty; but it is made by the Association in the conduct of its own affairs in cases where the interests of each and every member is concerned. These are substantially the words used by Parke, B., in Toogood's case,¹ and they are in terms applicable to the present. It would have been a different matter if a statement had been published in some newspaper or to members of the public who were not members of the Association. On these short grounds I concur in the judgment proposed.

Barr v.
Musselburgh
Merchants Association.
Lord Salvesen.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that the absence of a heading from the printed list in question might not be enough if it could be alleged that the list had been got up from malicious motives and intent, but I agree with Lord Salvesen that the issuing of such a list among a number of traders, one to the other, stands in no different position from a communication by one individual trader to another. Now I cannot doubt that if one trader comes to another with bona fide information as to the solvency of a third party, there will be no liability attaching to such a communication unless it be shown that the informant was actuated by specific malice. I have no difficulty in concurring in the views which Lord Dundas has stated with such accuracy and completeness.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal, and affirm the said interlocutor [of the Sheriff] appealed against: Of new sustain the third plea in law for the defenders: Dismiss the action, and decern. . . ."

JAMES CAMPBELL, Pursuer (Appellant).—Moncrieff.
THE UNITED COLLIERIES, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—
H. P. Macmillan.

Campbell v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

Reparation—Negligence—Master and Servant—Action laid alternatively at common law or under the Employers Liability Act—Sheriff—Process—Pleadings—Necessity of discriminating between grounds of claim.

In an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a father against a colliery company, concluding for damages at common law, or alternatively under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in respect of the death of his son who was killed while in the employment of the defenders, the pursuer averred a defective condition of the defenders' works, but Nov. 25, 1911. did not discriminate between the two grounds of claim.

Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant, in respect that they disclosed and gave notice of what was a good ground of claim either at common law or under the Act. Campbell v. United Collieries, Limited.

M'Grath v. Glasgow Coal Co., 1909 S. C. 1250, distinguished.

Reparation—Contributory negligence—Disclosure in pursuer's pleadings of case of contributory negligence.

A pursuer in an action of damages in respect of the death of his son, who was killed while working in a coal-pit, averred that the lad, his lamp having become extinguished, continued to advance towards the place of his work on the face, and in doing so stepped on an unfenced piece of machinery in motion, and sustained the injuries from which he died. Averments which were held (diss. Lord Johnston) not to disclose such a clear case of contributory negligence as to disentitle the pursuer to a proof.

ON 20th July 1911 James Campbell, a miner at Uddingston, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Airdrie against the United Collieries, Limited, in which he claimed £500 as damages at common law, or alternatively £195 under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in respect of the death of his son, John Campbell, who was killed by an accident in a pit at Uddingston while working in the employment of the defenders. 1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The pursuer averred that, on 22nd February 1911, his son, while going to his work on the face in the pit, had to pass a horizontal wheel of about 42 inches in diameter (forming part of the machinery in use in the colliery) which was fixed on a pivot on a level with the pavement, and acted as pulley for an endless rope which worked the haulage of the pit. He further averred:—(Cond. 4) "Shortly before reaching the said wheel the lamp carried by the said John Campbell was extinguished, and the said John Campbell, who continued to advance towards the face, inadvertently stepped upon the said wheel, which was revolving, and sustained very severe injuries, from the results of which he died the following day in the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow." (Cond. 5) "The death of the said John Campbell was due to the fault of the defenders in failing to take precautions for the safety of their employees and to provide safe and suitable plant. In particular, the defenders were in fault in not providing sufficient fencing round the said wheel, whereby persons employed in the pit might be prevented from being caught in the wheel while the same was in motion. The wheel was so placed that it revolved below the level of the rails which carried the hutches, and was in such a position that only one half of it was covered by the boards on which the rails were laid. The remaining half of the wheel, which extended towards the side of the roadway was not covered with boards or otherwise protected. Two boards were fitted to uprights so as to act as a fence parallel to the line of rails, but no cross fencing was fitted up so as to close the passage formed by the space between the uprights and the wall within which the exposed portion of the wheel revolved, with the result that there was nothing to prevent persons who were passing along the said roadway close to said wall from stepping upon said wheel while the same was in motion. The defenders have, since the said 22nd February 1911, completely covered over the said wheel with boards, and the same is now in a condition of safety. Had the

Nov. 25, 1911. said wheel been so covered over, or had any cross fencing been fitted up so as to close the passage between the uprights and the said wall within which the exposed half of the wheel revolved at 22nd February, or had other sufficient fencing been provided, the said accident would not have happened, and the said John Campbell would not have lost his life."

Campbell v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The death of the said John Campbell having been occasioned by fault on the part of the defenders, the pursuer, as father of the said John Campbell, is entitled to reparation as concluded for. (2) In the circumstances condescended upon the sums alternatively claimed as damages are reasonable, and decree should be pronounced as concluded for, with expenses.

On 31st October 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) dismissed the action as irrelevant.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division on 25th November 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The defenders' duty to fence their machinery was clear,¹ and the pursuer had made a substantive averment of defective ways and works, which was relevant to support either ground of action. The case of *M'Grath*² on which the Sheriff-substitute had proceeded was distinguishable. In that case several different grounds of action were suggested in a set of confused averments, and the Court held that the record, as framed, did not give fair notice of the case which the defenders had to meet either at common law or under the Act. Here fair notice was given of a ground of action, i.e., deficiency of ways and works, which was sufficient to instruct liability under either claim. The only bearing of the Employers Liability Act on the present case was that it excluded the defence of common employment. With regard to the respondents' argument on contributory negligence, there was a presumption that the boy would not have proceeded in the dark if means of relighting his lamp had been available. It must therefore be held that he was innocently in the dark until the contrary was proved against him, and no facts and circumstances were averred from which culpability in this respect could be inferred.

* "NOTE.—The only averment directed to instructing liability for fault on defenders' part is condescendence 5. The pursuer there in effect avers that defenders should have fenced a certain wheel, and that it was not fenced. This is a good averment of a defect in plant, but is insufficient in regard to fault inasmuch as it does not disclose whose fault it is that pursuer seeks to hold this limited Company responsible for. The pursuer avoids a good many difficulties by taking no notice of obvious facts, and he is, of course, not bound to raise difficulties if he can avoid them, but he cannot withhold explanations which known circumstances require. As regards his common law case, it may be asked how did this Company become liable for an act of negligence of its servants, and, as regards the Employers Liability case, Who was the negligent servant? Information should have been given on both heads, but instead of doing so, and distinguishing between the two grounds of claim, he simply makes the bald averment mentioned. The case seems to fall within the rule laid down in M'Grath v. Glasgow Coal Company, 1909 S. C. 1250, and I accordingly dismiss it."

² 1909 S. C. 1250.

Argued for the respondents;—The Sheriff-substitute had decided Nov. 25, 1911. rightly, and the case was ruled by that of M'Grath.¹ The pursuer's averments were irrelevant at common law, in respect that they did not specify the person who was responsible for the defective plant. A limited company must delegate the duty of inspection of plant, and its duty was fulfilled if reasonable care was taken to appoint a competent deputy.² It was necessary therefore for relevancy that there should be an averment that the underground manager was incompetent. As to the case under the Act, the provisions of section 1 (1) were qualified by those of section 2 (1), and therefore there should be an averment excluding the application of the latter subsection. In any event the pursuer's averments in cond. 4, to the effect that the lad had allowed his lamp to go out and had proceeded to the face in the dark, disclosed a case of contributory negligence which would disentitle him to succeed in the action.

Campbell v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that an issue must be allowed here, because I think that the pursuer has stated a perfectly relevant case. The learned Sheriff-substitute has refused a proof, because he thought he was within the rule of M'Grath v. Glasgow Coal Company,¹ which was a case where the action was dismissed really because the whole statement was so confused and unprecise that it was impossible for the defender to know what case he was going to meet. I am not saying a word against that judgment; I think it was perfectly right. But when I turn to the present case, I do not find any want of precision. The case made is an extremely simple one. It is that there was a failure of duty in the Collieries Company in leaving certain parts of a revolving wheel unguarded, and that the result of that failure in duty was that the deceased lad met his death by coming in contact with the unguarded part of the wheel.

Now it is also said that there is no proper specification, in the sense of discrimination between the case so far as laid upon common law and so far as laid upon the Employers Liability Act. In some cases, where the ground of action depends upon the Employers Liability Act, I can easily imagine that it would be necessary to give ample notice of this kind. I do not think that the matter ever arises upon the point of relevancy, in the strict sense of the word, because, as has often been pointed out, the Employers Liability Act does not really give a new ground of action; it leaves the grounds of action as it finds them, but takes away certain defences which were competent before the Act was passed. But still, in the other sense in which the word "irrelevancy" is used, viz., insufficient specification and want of fair notice, I can imagine cases in which it might be said that the notice was not sufficient; but here it does not seem to me that any notice is necessary to distinguish between the case so far as laid upon common law and so far as laid upon the Employers Liability Act, because the blunt averment that works and ways were in a defective condition is a good averment of liability both at common law and under the statute. The only difference between the two positions is that a defence which is a good defence to the one action is not a good

Nov. 25, 1911. defence to the other. At common law it is a good defence to say, of a portion of the works in which an accident has occurred, that it is not a portion of the works which the employer himself undertook to supervise, that the employer had remitted such supervision to a qualified person, and had not in any way interfered with or stopped that person in the procuring of such materials as were necessary for the performance of the work entrusted to his supervision. But under the Employers Liability Act that is not a sufficient defence in itself; the defender has got to show that the works and ways were in efficient condition.

Campbell v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

Ld. President.

Well, here I think there is a relevant case; but I understand that one of your Lordships has a difficulty upon the argument that the pursuer's own statement discloses a case of contributory negligence. Now, as to the possibility of such a position, if a pursuer in his account of the accident tells such a story that he shows that according to his view the proximate cause of the accident was his own negligence, I do not doubt that in such circumstances the case cannot go on. But when I look at the averments here, I cannot say that I think they disclose such a situation. I think the pursuer's averments quite clearly disclose this, that there may be proved against him a case of contributory negligence, but they do not seem to me to be tantamount to saying that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. Accordingly I think the interlocutor must be recalled and an issue granted.

LORD JOHNSTON.—As the case is presented upon the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, I entirely agree with all that your Lordship has said; and I agree that the pursuer has made a sufficiently relevant statement of fault on the part of the defenders. But I confess that my own impression is that at the same time condescendence 4 so clearly discloses, upon the statement of the pursuer himself, that his son was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the proximate cause of the accident, that I think he ought to be nonsuited on his own record, in respect that it would be improper to allow the case to go to proof upon an averment of fault, where there is an admission of contributory negligence which is an absolutely complete answer to that averment of fault. I cannot conceive that a miner who merely states that his lamp was extinguished, and that he continued to advance in the face of a known danger, does anything else but disclose upon the record the unqualified admission that his own negligence or rashness was the proximate cause of his death.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships that the pursuer here avers a relevant case at common law and under the Employers Liability Act.

As to the point that his averments disclose a case of contributory negligence, one is very reluctant to deal with that until the facts have been fully ascertained, for the reason that only then can the complexion of the case be known. All I say is that I do not think that condescendence 4 necessarily means that the pursuer's son was guilty of contributory negligence.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitted to him to proceed.

FREDERICK JOHNSTON & COMPANY, Defenders.—C. H. Brown—Burns.

Nov. 28, 1911.

Process—Diligence for recovery of writs—Slander contained in newspaper report—Paragraphs in previous issues inferring malice—Recovery of materials from which paragraphs and report were printed—Recovery of communications from newspaper correspondents and others.

In an action of damages against newspaper proprietors for a slander contained in a report in their newspaper of a political meeting, the pursuer, who averred malice and founded on letters and paragraphs reflecting on his conduct published in previous issues of the newspaper as indicating malice, moved for a diligence to recover—(1) the manuscript notes or reports from which these paragraphs were printed; (2) all communications relating to the subject-matter of the paragraphs (a) passing between the defenders and their local correspondents, or (b) addressed to the defenders by members of the public; (3) (a) all notes of the proceedings of the meeting in question made by the defenders' reporters or correspondents, (b) all written reports of the meeting supplied to the defenders; and (4) all correspondence between the defenders and their local correspondents referring to the publication of the matters complained of.

The Court, in consideration of the detailed averments of malice, granted the diligence.

On 22nd March 1911 the Rev. Allan Reid, minister of the parish of Slamannan, brought an action of damages for slander against Frederick Johnston & Company, publishers and proprietors of the Falkirk Herald. The slander complained of was contained in a report in the Falkirk Herald of 14th December 1910 of a political meeting held at Slamannan on 10th December 1910 in support of the parliamentary candidature of Dr Chapple.

The pursuer, besides setting forth the report of the meeting containing the alleged slander, averred:—(Cond. 2) "For some time the defenders have been actuated by feelings of malice towards the pursuer, and have taken frequent opportunity of showing active hostility to him. In order to gratify their malicious feelings, they have taken occasion to call in question his fulfilment of his duties as parish minister, and have readily opened the columns of the Falkirk Herald to correspondents and contributors who were willing to attack the pursuer. On 9th July 1910, under the heading 'Slamannan Notes,' reference was made in the Falkirk Herald to pursuer's remarks at a school demonstration. The said reference contained a wholly inaccurate and fictitious account of pursuer's remarks, and falsely stated that the said remarks had caused great indignation among parents, teachers, and scholars, and in said issue the suggestion was made that pursuer should improve his pastoral efficiency by holding more services. Again, on 1st October 1910, the defenders gave space in their columns to certain statements from their local correspondent at Slamannan containing reflections upon the conduct of religious matters on the part of the pursuer and his elders in connection with the Parish Church of Slamannan, in respect that some communion cards were alleged to have been posted instead of delivered by personal call of the members of the kirk-session. These observations were followed on 8th October by a letter from a correspondent on similar lines, falsely representing that pursuer was remiss in visiting his congregation. Subsequently, further letters appeared in the defenders' paper at various dates up to 3rd December 1910 from other correspondents, also containing reflections on the pursuer and his elders. The identity of one of these correspondents, who signed himself 'A Member,' became known to the pursuer, and, on being challenged as to the truth of his comments, this correspondent expressed his regret for the reflections contained in his letter, and wrote to the pursuer and the kirk-session apologising to them for the statements he had made. It was part of his undertaking to the pursuer and kirk-session that he should also write to the Falkirk Herald intimating that he had made an apology for making the statements which appeared in that journal, and acknowledging that he had made them on inadequate information. Said correspondent duly sent his apology to the defenders for publication, but the defenders, although they had opened their columns gratuitously to the said correspondent when he wrote a letter containing matter calculated to damage pursuer, and had also published letters from their local Slamannan contributor and others emphasising and adding to said damaging statements, declined to publish the retraction thereof except upon payment for its insertion as an ordinary advertisement. The pursuer believes and avers that in so doing the defenders were actuated by malice towards him."

Issues for jury trial were approved by the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie). These issues referred solely to the report of the meeting and not to any of the publications referred to in cond. 2.

On 28th November 1911, the pursuer moved in the Single Bills for a diligence for the recovery of documents in terms of a specification which contained the following articles:—

"1. (a) The manuscript notes or reports from which the paragraphs headed 'Slamannan' in the issue of the Falkirk Herald newspaper of 9th July 1910 were printed; and (b) all letters, memoranda, and other communications passing between the defenders, on the one hand, and Mr James Murphy, their correspondent in Slamannan, on the other hand, in the month of July 1910, having reference to the subject-matter of said paragraphs.

"3. (a) The manuscript notes or reports from which the paragraphs headed 'Slamannan' in the issue of the said newspaper of 1st October 1910 were printed; and (b) all letters, memoranda, and other communications passing between the defenders, on the one hand, and the said James Murphy, on the other hand, during the period from 25th November 1910 to 7th January 1911, having reference to the subject-matter of said paragraphs.

"4. All letters or other written communications addressed to the defenders or to the editor of their said newspaper, or to anyone on the defenders' behalf, (a) by any of their correspondents, or (b) by members of the public, having reference to the subject-matter of the paragraphs mentioned in the immediately preceding article, between 1st October 1910 and 7th January 1911.

"9. (a) All shorthand or other notes made by any reporters or correspondents of defenders' newspaper of the proceedings of a meeting held in Slamannan on 10th December 1910 in support of the said candidature of Dr Chapple; (b) all written reports of said meeting supplied to the defenders; and (c) all letters, memoranda, and other correspondence passing between the defenders or anyone on their behalf, on the one hand, and the correspondent or correspondents in Slamannan of their said newspaper, on the other hand, in the month Nov. 28, 1911. of December 1910, and having reference to the publication by the defenders of the matters complained of on record."

Reid v.
Johnston &
Co.

The defenders objected to these articles, and argued;—The defenders accepted responsibility for the articles appearing in their newspaper, and could not, therefore, be compelled to produce the materials from which the articles were printed.¹ Further, the communications between the defenders and Mr Murphy or their other local correspondents were confidential.² The documents sought for could not be used in evidence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that this is a request for a fairly sweeping diligence, but in the circumstances of the case I do not perceive any ground for refusing the diligence asked for. If this had been an action of damages for slander of the ordinary nature, there is a good deal in the specification that might be open to objection. But the pursuer's case here is that the statements in the report were put in by the defenders with malicious intent, and the pursuer has indicated that there are facts as to this which he can prove. In these circumstances I do not think that the diligence should be restricted. It may be a question whether some of the documents recovered can be used in evidence, but this must be left to the decision of the Judge who presides at the trial.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur. I think this diligence may be justified on the ground that there is a very detailed averment by the pursuer of malice on the part of the defenders. We might have come to a different conclusion if there had been no such averment.

THE COURT granted the diligence.

Under sec. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, a workman may take proceedings for recovery both of damages and of compensation, but he "shall not be entitled to recover both damages and compensation."

An injured workman claimed compensation from his employers in respect of an accident. His right to compensation was admitted, and payments were made for which he granted receipts which bore that he had "elected to take compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act." They further bore to be granted "under reservation of my

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN August 1909 Robert B. Wright, Dalmuir, brought an action against J. S. Lindsay, James M'Allan, Thomas Dickson, and William Gibb in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for payment of £100 in name of damages for injury which he alleged he had sustained through the fault of the defenders.

The pursuer averred that on 29th June 1909, while engaged as a night watchman in the employment of Messrs J. & H. Williamson, he was knocked down and injured by a motor car belonging to the defenders and driven by one of them, the defender Gibb, for whom the others were responsible, and that the accident was due to the negligent manner in which the car was being driven.

Thomas Dickson's curator bonis was sisted as a defender but did not lodge defences. The other defenders lodged defences in which, besides denying fault, they averred that the pursuer had applied for and received compensation from his employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and was therefore barred from recovering damages from the defenders.*

In answer the pursuer averred;—"Explained that any compensation paid to pursuer by his employers has been accepted under reservation of all claims competent to him against third parties."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Having reserved his claims against third parties, pursuer is entitled, in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to pursue the present action.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(8) The pursuer having accepted compensation from his employer, and having thus been fully compensated, the action against these defenders should be dismissed, with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led. The circumstances under which the pursuer received payment of compensation were thus narrated by the Sheriff (Millar):—"The facts are that his employers gave notice to the Railway Passenger Assurance Company, with which they were insured, of the accident, and that, as a result, the pursuer received from them, from 6th July to 16th November 1909, sums amounting in all to £11, 7s. 5d. The circumstances in which the payments were made are described by Robert Beattie, the manager of the insurance company. In his evidence Mr Beattie says that he recognised these payments as full compensation to pursuer in terms of the Act. They stood in the employer's place, and these payments were made by them on the footing that the pursuer was to recover from the party in fault, and that the pursuer reserved his right to common law action against that party. It was understood that under the Act the pursuer would have to pay them back if he recovered anything from the party in fault. The receipts granted by the pursuer were in these terms:—

'I, Robert Wright, having elected to take compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, hereby agree to accept the weekly sum of 11s. 4½d. in satisfaction of the compensation payable by Messrs J. & H. Williamson for the accident I met with when engaged in their employment on the 29th day of June 1909, under reservation of my claims against third parties.'

Nov. 30, 1911.
Wright v.
Lindsay.

On 19th May 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced an interlocutor in which he found that the accident to the pursuer was due to the negligent driving of the defender Gibb; but found further that after the accident the pursuer claimed and received compensation from his employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act under reservation of his claims against third parties, but that the reservation had no effect, and that the pursuer, having elected to take compensation, was now barred from recovering damages from third parties in respect of the accident. He therefore sustained the 8th plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 25th October 1910, adhered to the interlocutor appealed against.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie), on 16th November 1911. By agreement of parties the appeal was confined to the question of the legal effect of the receipt of compensation by the appellant.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 6 of the Act of 1906, differing in this respect from the corresponding section in the Act of 1897, empowered the workman to take two independent sets of proceedings, the policy of the Act being that he should not be put to his election until he knew the extent of his remedies, and the only limitation being that he could not "recover" both damages and compensation. The Act was intended to give immediate alimentary assistance to injured workmen, and not to protect third party delinquents. The only question, therefore, was whether the circumstances of this case amounted to "recovery" of compensation. "Recovery" implied a final choice by the workman, together with some act or agreement which made his choice irrevocable.¹ In the present case the money was taken under an express reservation of claims against third parties, and on the footing that it was to be returned if damages were recovered. In such circumstances it could not be said that the appellant had made a final election, or had irrevocably bound himself to accept compensation.²

Argued for the respondents;—It was in every case a question of circumstances whether the receipt of money amounted to acceptance of compensation.³ In the present case there were all the elements necessary to constitute "recovery" within the meaning of the Act. There was a claim by the workman,⁴ the right to compensation admitted by the employer, the payment of money on that footing, and the fact that the workman had elected to accept compensation expressly stated by him in the receipts he had granted. It would be difficult to figure a more complete case of compensation being "recovered." The reservation of his claims against third parties was of no effect, for once the compensation money was in his pocket the appellant might not choose to take any further proceedings, and there was no obligation on him to do so.

At advising on 30th November 1911,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case was injured by a motor car, and the motor driver has been held to be in fault. The pursuer's employers paid him certain sums as compensation, but this was done upon the express footing that the pursuer was to sue the motorman's master for damages, and if he was successful the sums given to him in the meantime were to be returned.

The defenders maintain that the pursuer having accepted payment from his employers, is excluded from his claim against them at common law. They base their plea upon the 6th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which is not the same as the corresponding clause in the older Act, but favours the injured workman in a greater degree. The section strikes only at the workman recovering both from his master and from the wrongdoer. Now, the question in the circumstances of this case is, whether the pursuer has so "recovered" compensation that he is barred from proceeding in his action. Looking to the arrangement made it appears to me that what the pursuer has received is not compensation recovered under the Act. It is of the nature of a sum advanced by the employers under conditions which exclude the idea of its being a final acceptance of compensation under the Act. The arrangement is in every sense reasonable and humane. The employer knows that if his servant cannot get damages from the alleged wrongdoer he must provide compensation. But as the litigation for damages is a long and protracted proceeding, he arranges with the workman,—"I will give you now what corresponds to what would be my liability so that you may be supported, but you must engage to return to me the whole sum I advance if you are successful in getting the fuller compensation from the wrongdoer." I am of opinion that payments made under such an arrangement are no bar to action at law. I am confirmed in that opinion by the English case of *Oliver*¹ quoted to us, in which payments by the master on receipts bearing to be "without prejudice" were held not to bar the workman's action against those in fault for the injury. I can see no reason why that decision should not be an authority to be respected, although not technically binding upon this Court. I would have come to a similar conclusion had there been no such case in the books, but I am glad to be confirmed in my view by the case quoted. The case of *Mulligan*² was a converse case to the present. Mulligan had recovered damages from the defender in an action, and it was held that he could not obtain compensation from his employers. Any other decision would have been manifestly unjust. I hold that where payments received from the employers are made under a bona fide agreement that the money is to be returned if damages are obtained from the wrongdoer, the case is not one to which the section of the Act applies. This is to my mind clearly a case to which it does not apply.

² 6 F. 126.

Nov. 30, 1911.
Wright v.
Lindsay.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I am therefore in favour of recalling the finding of the Sheriff-substitute which holds the pursuer barred from maintaining his claim of damages and sustains the 8th plea in law for the defenders.

As the proof was not before us, it will be necessary that there be further procedure before the case can be finally disposed of.

LORD SALVESSEN.—This case raises an important question under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which, as it has a general application, deserves careful consideration. The pursuer was injured by a collision with a motor car which belonged to the defenders. He was at the time employed as a night watchman with the firm of J. & H. Williamson. Both the Sheriffs have found that the injuries which the pursuer received were due to the fault of the person in charge of the motor car, for whom the defenders are responsible; and if the case had stopped there, the Sheriff-substitute would as a matter of course have assessed the damages to which he considered the pursuer entitled. The defenders, however, pleaded that the pursuer had already received compensation from his employers, and that his right to recover damages against the defenders is barred by section 6 of the Act. The only findings in fact with regard to this matter are as follows:—"Finds that after the accident the pursuer claimed and received compensation from his employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the period from 6th July 1909 to 16th November 1909, amounting to £11, 7s. 5d., and granted receipts therefor: Finds that this compensation was received by the pursuer under reservation of his claims against third parties, conform to the receipt No. 15/1 of process." The Sheriff has, however, supplemented these findings in his opinion by saying that the payments made by the employers' agent were so made "on the footing that the pursuer was to recover from the party in fault," and that "it was understood that under the Act the pursuer would have to pay them back if he recovered anything from the party in fault." These findings were not seriously challenged.

Assuming these to be the facts, the question is whether the pursuer's claim against the defenders is excluded. It would certainly be odd if it should be so, seeing that both the parties to the agreement which is said to operate as a bar understood and intended that the pursuer, notwithstanding the payments, should be at full liberty to proceed against the defenders at common law; and the defenders can show no good ground in equity why they should be absolved from their civil liability to the pursuer. Under the arrangement between the pursuer and his own employers the defenders are secured against being called upon to make any payment to the employers after they have settled the pursuer's claim as judicially ascertained; and counsel for the pursuer expressed his willingness to allow extract of any decree against the defenders to be superseded until he has produced in process a receipt from the employers showing that they had been repaid the amount advanced by them and a discharge of their claims against the

Nov. 30, 1911. defenders. Unless, therefore, the language of section 6 admits of no other construction than that put upon it by the Sheriffs, there seems no good ground in principle or in equity why the pursuer should be barred from recovering damages at common law to which ex hypothesi he is otherwise entitled.

Wright v. Lindsay.
Lord Salvesen.

The 6th section of the 1906 Act is expressed in different terms from the corresponding section of the earlier Act. The workman is now entitled to take proceedings both against the third party by whose negligence he has been injured and against his own employers under the Act. In this respect it is more favourable than the earlier Act, which gave the workman only an option to proceed either at law against the third party to recover damages or against his employers for compensation under the Act; but not against both. The only limitation now is that he shall not be entitled to recover both damages and compensation. The Sheriffs in deciding the case against the pursuer have put a very narrow meaning upon the word "recover." In their view it is enough that the pursuer has, as in a question with his employers, accepted payments of money from them as in satisfaction of compensation under the Act. I do not think I should have differed from them if the payments had not been made and accepted under reservation of the pursuer's right to proceed against third parties. But where a payment is made by an employer to his workman on the footing that he shall be entitled to recover damages at common law against third parties, and that the sums which the employer has disbursed are to be repaid out of any damages which he may so recover, I think the case is entirely different. The compensation so paid is in the nature of an advance by the employer for the maintenance of the pursuer pending proceedings to make good his claim; and is only accepted as in full of the workman's right under the Act against his employer in the event of his claim against the third party being unsuccessful. I cannot think that it was ever intended that the Act should make ineffectual an arrangement of this kind, eminently reasonable from the point of view of both workman and employer, and in the interests of both. The English case of Oliver,¹ although decided under the previous Act, is a distinct authority for the contrary proposition. There it was held that a claim against an employer by a workman under the Act and receipts signed by the workman "without prejudice" for payments made by the employer did not bar the workman from afterwards suing the actual wrongdoer for damages. The precise point that arose in Oliver's case¹ has not been the subject of decision in Scotland; but in the case of *Mulligan*² Lord M'Laren, as I read his opinion, expressed approval of the decision arrived at by the English Judges; and, at all events, it is plain that the decision in Mulligan's case² did not in the least impair its authority. The ground of the decision there was that, as the workman had recovered a sum of damages from the actual wrongdoer, he could not make a claim against his employers, as they would not then have the complete right of relief to which they were entitled under the statute. Here there is no prejudice suffered either by the defenders or by the pursuer's employers. In my view, therefore, the word "recover" falls to be construed as implying unconditional payment; and does not apply to a case where the money is paid conditionally and falls to Nov. 30, 1911. be repaid to the employer out of the damages that may eventually be awarded against the wrongdoer.

¹ [1903] 2 K. B. 639.

² 6 F. 126.

Wright v.
Lindsay.

As parties desired to have the opinion of the Court on this question of law the evidence has not been printed ; and we are, therefore, not in a position to dispose of the case as a whole. It will be open for the defenders to maintain that the findings in fact on which the Sheriffs have affirmed their liability are erroneous ; and it will also be necessary that the damages should either be assessed by us or agreed on by the parties. All that we are in a position to do is to recall the findings of the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer is barred from recovering damages from the defenders, and that part of his interlocutor in which he sustains their eighth plea in law. In place thereof we must repel this plea in law and continue the cause. Parties can then enrol the case for further procedure.

Lord Salvesen.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think the effect of the defenders' contention would really be to render nugatory the alteration which section 6 of the Act of 1906 made upon the corresponding section of the previous Act. For, while Mr Fraser admitted that the workman might take a double set of proceedings, he maintained that he could not go on with both. If that were so, the result would be to throw the workman at a later stage into the same position as, under the old Act, he was in at the beginning. He would be bound to elect his remedy before the whole question of liability was decided, which is just what section 6 of the 1906 Act was intended to prevent. If judgment in both sets of proceedings were given on the same day, he would naturally have to make his election then. But if liability is admitted by the employer and compensation received from him, the question is whether he is thereby barred from recovering damages from a third party. I think not. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not an express reservation of his rights is required. If it is, there is such a reservation in the present case.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutors [dated 19th May and 25th October 1910], in so far as they find that the pursuer is barred from pursuing this action, and in so far as they sustain the 8th plea in law for the defenders: Repel the said 8th plea in law, and continue the cause: Find the pursuer entitled to the expenses of the appeal, and remit," &c.

A woman, while walking on the foot-pavement of a public street in Aberdeen, in front of P. & W.'s property, placed her foot on a metal disc in the pavement covering an opening into a cellar, with the result that the disc tilted, and her leg was caught in the opening and injured. The tilting of the disc was due to the worn condition of the bevel in the flagstone of the pavement on which it rested.

The disc was the property of P. & W., and the opening which it covered led into their cellar. Under certain local Acts P. & W. were bound to keep the covering of the opening in repair, but the pavement was vested in the Town-Council, and could not be altered without their consent or other lawful authority.

ON 8th July 1910 Miss Ann Laing brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen which (as amended) was directed against Messrs Paull & Williamson, advocates, and the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Town-Council of Aberdeen. The claim of the pursuer was for damages in respect of injuries sustained by her on 2nd April 1910, "owing to defenders the said Paull & Williamson having recklessly and negligently failed to replace the metal disc, used for the purpose of covering an opening in the footway leading into the coal cellars belonging to defenders underneath the pavement on the east side of Union Row, in its proper position after taking in coals, whereby pursuer, having stepped on said metal disc (on the afternoon of the foresaid date), causing it to slip off, fell into said opening and sustained serious injuries; and also owing to the negligence of both defenders in having allowed said metal disc and groove, into which it is fitted, to become worn and defective and unsafe for the public using said pavement, and having failed to put and keep the said metal disc in proper order."*

* The Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. cciii.), enacts:—

Sec. 307. "All pavements, flagstones, . . . and other materials, laid

A proof was allowed and led in the Sheriff Court. The material facts proved are stated in the following findings in fact in the interlocutor pronounced by the Second Division:—“(1) That on the afternoon of Saturday, 2nd April 1910, the pursuer, when in the course of walking along the pavement on the east side of Union Row, Aberdeen, put her foot on an iron disc which formed the cover of a coal-shoot near the middle of the pavement; (2) that the iron disc in question gave way, and that the pursuer's foot and part of her leg went through into the space below, and she was thus thrown to the ground and sustained injuries to her limbs and an arm; (3) that the coal-shoot is used in connection with the cellar of the adjoining property belonging to the defenders Messrs Paull & Williamsons, and that the disc or covering thereof belongs in property to them; (4) that said disc is fitted into a groove in a granite stone, part of the pavement which is vested in the defenders the Town-Council of Aberdeen and under their management as the street authority; (5) that the accident to the pursuer was caused in consequence of the groove in the pavement having through long continued wear become unsafe as a support for the iron disc; (6) that the dangerous condition of the metal disc as part of the pavement of Union Row could have been ascertained by a reasonable inspection; and (7) that no such inspection was made at any time prior to the accident.”

On 13th February 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Young) found that it was not proved that the pursuer's accident was due to the fault of the defenders or either of them, and assolizied both defenders.

The pursuer appealed to the Second Division, and the appeal was heard on 9th and 10th November 1911.

or to be laid on the streets made or to be made within the limits of this Act . . . shall belong to and be the property of the Commissioners, and are hereby vested in them for the purposes of this Act.”

Sec. 323. “Every person who wilfully displaces, takes up, or makes any alteration in the pavement, flags, or other materials of any street under the management or control of the Commissioners, without their consent in writing, or without other lawful authority, shall be liable” to certain penalties.

Sec. 344. “When any opening is made in any pavement or footpath within the limits of this Act as an entrance into any vault or cellar, a door or covering shall be made by the occupier of such vault or cellar, of iron or such other materials and in such manner as the Commissioners direct, and such door or covering shall from time to time be kept in good repair by the occupier of such vault or cellar; and if such occupier do not within a reasonable time make such door or covering, or if he make any such door or covering contrary to the directions of the Commissioners, or if he do not keep the same, when properly made, in good repair, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.”

The Aberdeen Municipality Extension Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. cxli.), transfers the powers and authorities of the Commissioners under the above Act to the Town-Council, and by sec. 143 enacts that in the circumstances therein mentioned “the Town-Council may . . . cause footways with proper gutters or channels to be formed and laid out, . . . and the said gutters or channels and footways shall be constructed in such manner and form, and of such construction and breadth, . . . all as the Town-Council may direct, and the Town-Council may cause the carriage-way of such street . . . to be paved . . . and such street shall thereafter be maintained by the Town-Council.”

Laing v. Paull
& William-
sons.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant's accident was due to the fact either that the disc was not in its proper position over the opening, or that the disc was defective either owing to the absence of the weight which should have been attached to it, or because of the worn condition of the rim and of the socket into which it fitted. Both defenders were accordingly liable in damages. Paull & Williamsons would clearly be liable if the accident was due to the fact that the disc was out of place or that the weight was amissing. But they were also liable if the accident was due to the wearing of the rim, because (a) the shoot and disc were their property, and (b) the shoot was under their control and was used only by them.¹ By section 344 of the Act of 1862 the duty of keeping the disc in repair was laid on them as occupiers of the cellar, and they had failed in this duty. *Keeney v. Stewart*² was distinguishable on the ground that in that case the trap causing the accident did not belong to the defender. *Chapman v. Fylde Water-Works Company*³ was similar to Keeney v. Stewart.² In Paterson v. Kidd's Trustees,⁴ the decision proceeded on the fact that before the accident the floor, which was said to be defective, was inspected and pronounced safe by a competent man. The Town-Council were also liable to the appellant. The disc and its fitting formed part of the foot-pavement in the street; and, as such pavements were under the Acts of 1862 and 1871 vested in the Town-Council, they were responsible to the public for maintaining them in a safe condition.

Argued for the respondents Paull & Williamsons;—These respondents were liable only for injuries occasioned by their use of the shoot.⁵ If, for example, a member of the public was injured through the shoot being open while the respondents were having the cellar filled, or because the disc was not properly replaced after such use, an action might lie against these respondents. But except as users of the cellar they were not responsible to the public. No case of this kind, however, had been established by the appellant. It was not proved that the disc was out of its proper position; but even if this were so, it was not shown that the respondents were responsible for the displacement of the disc.⁶ Nor was it proved that the disc was defective. The fact that there was no weight attached to the disc had nothing to do with the accident. Even if the disc were defective, the respondents could be made liable only if it were also proved that they had been negligent in the matter; and as they had no control over the disc (except that they could remove it for the purpose of using the shoot) they could not be held to have been negligent. They were not responsible for the design of the disc (section 344 of the 1862 Act); the disc was the property of the Town-Council as being part of the pavement or material laid on the street (section 307 of the 1862 Act); these respondents were bound to repair it only when required by the Town-Council to do so (section 344 of the 1862 Act); and, if they did repair it without authority, they were liable in a penalty (section 323 of the 1862 Act). In *Chapman v. Fylde Water-Works Company*¹ it was held that as the repair of a stopcock in the pavement involved the breaking up of the pavement those parties only who could lawfully break up the pavement could be made liable for injuries caused by the stopcock. That decision was in point here. The pursuer's accident was due either to her own carelessness, in which case she could not recover damages, or to the fact that the groove in the stone on which the disc rested was worn so that the disc was allowed to tilt, in which case the Town-Council alone were responsible.

Argued for the respondents the Town-Council of Aberdeen;—Paull & Williamsons were alone liable to the pursuer. The accident was due to the disc not being in its proper position over the opening; or, otherwise, to the absence of the weight which should have been attached to the disc. If this were so, then these respondents were in no way liable. And, even if the disc was defective, that would not involve liability on the part of these respondents. The disc, and the stone supporting it—which was part of the apparatus for covering the shoot—were the property of Paull & Williamsons. The disc was not part of the pavement, for, if it were, the absurd result would follow that Paull & Williamsons would be liable in a fine every time they removed it (section 323 of the 1862 Act). They were also bound to repair it. Section 344 of the 1862 Act enacted that the occupier must cover any opening in the pavement in the manner directed by the Town-Council, but left the responsibility for keeping the covering in good repair on the occupier. The fact that a statutory obligation to repair was placed on the occupier implied that he had the power to execute repairs and to do what was necessary for that purpose. The opening which the disc covered was in the roof of Messrs Paull & Williamsons' cellar; and there was no ground for distinguishing between the occasions when the shoot was being used and the time when it was not in use. *Pickard v. Smith*² really turned on the question of liability for an independent contractor.³ Paull & Williamsons could at any time have removed the disc and stone for repair; and, if any accident occurred through the opening in the pavement thereby left, the Town-Council would be liable only on the ground that they had not prevented the public using the pavement. All that the Town-Council was bound to do was to take reasonable care that visible defects should be remedied. To all outward appearance the disc here fitted quite properly into the pavement. No ordinary examination of it would have revealed any defect, and it was out of the question to require the Town-Council to cause every such disc to be minutely inspected. Reference was also made to Wisely v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case sues the Town-Council of Aberdeen and the firm of Paull & Williamsons of that city, for damages because of an injury caused by an accident. It appears that since 1862 there has been in front of Paull & Williamsons' premises a shoot for coals,

Nov. 30, 1911. which, when not in use, is kept covered by a circular iron plate, and that Laing v. Paull & William- this plate has been there all the time with the consent of the other defensons. ders, the Town-Council, who own and keep up the pavement in which it is set. The mode of fitting of the plate is by the granite around the shoot Lord Justice- being bevelled off so as to have a sloping edge, and the plate, being cut to a Clerk. similar bevel, is intended to fit into the granite flag so as to lie flush with the surface of the pavement. The evidence makes it certain that in the long course of years there has been a wearing of the surfaces, so that the plate is no longer wedged into the opening so as to fit tightly, but that there is a certain amount of play causing the plate to be more or less loose in fit, the consequence of which is that, when pressure is brought to bear near the edge of the plate, there is a tendency to tip up and so cause the opening of the shoot to be exposed.

The pursuer alleges that when she was passing over the street, her foot, in stepping upon the plate, caused it to be displaced, and so exposed the opening of the shoot, and that her foot in consequence went down, and her leg was seriously injured. She accordingly maintains that she is entitled to compensation against the city of Aberdeen, in whom the surface, including the flag with the hole in it, is vested, and against Messrs Paull & Williamsons, who are the owners of the metal plate.

That the injury was caused by the pursuer's foot descending into the hole, is not, I think, doubtful.—[His Lordship then examined the evidence, and after stating that there was no evidence that the plate was out of place when the accident occurred, continued]—I am of opinion that the true inference from the evidence is that the accident was caused by the worn condition of the plate and its seating, it being conclusively established by experiment that when stepped on in a particular position it does tip up, so as for the moment to uncover the shoot.

The next question is, did this tipping of the plate result from fault, and if so, on whom does the fault lie? That it was caused by fault I cannot doubt. There was a duty on some person or authority to keep the pavement safe for foot-passengers, and that duty was not fulfilled. It was dangerous, and to have it in a dangerous state was fault. In my opinion, there was fault on the part of the defenders the Town-Council. This particular shoot with its plate undoubtedly required inspection by those responsible for the safety of the streets. More particularly did it require inspection seeing that the construction, with bevelled faces, was not the best construction. Mr Ironside, the engineer examined for Paull & Williamsons, says that a safer construction is to have an iron frame in the stone, and a cover to fit into the frame—that is, of course, with squared edges. He says “that is somewhat safer than the cover in question.” And speaking of this bevelled cover he says,—“Considering its age, I am not surprised to find that the granite is considerably worn round the edge.” And he adds that the iron of the plate is also worn a little, and says that there is a tendency for metal to slip off worn stones. And the assistant burgh surveyor, called for the Town-Council, says,—“We do not allow such discs now.” He says also, speaking of the bevelled edges,—“I would not say that that is so secure as a square check.” At another place he says,—“The new covers sit quite tight of themselves.” And this is confirmed by Mr Shaw, the streets and roads inspector. All this makes it plain that Nov. 30, 1911. there was a duty to inspect, particularly where the fitting was half a century old. The pattern is obsolete, and it tends to become insecure in its seat. Laing v. Paull & William-sons.

Now, it is admitted that no inspection was made. One of the most extraordinary reasons for this non-inspection was given by one of the defenders' witnesses, who said that inspection was impracticable because the number of these plates in Aberdeen was so great—some 300. The reasoning is curious. If one such plate, if neglected, may cause danger, it should be inspected to avert danger, but if there are 300 such possible causes of danger it cannot be expected that they can be inspected! One would have thought that the more numerous the points where danger might arise the more imperative is it that care should be taken. Lord Justice-Clerk.

Here none was taken, and I cannot hold otherwise than that the city, which owned the pavement, was bound to exercise reasonable care that such arrangements as they sanctioned for openings in the pavement when required should not be a source of danger to the public when closed, whether by faulty construction or by decay from age. They alone could interfere with the granite flags to keep the street safe, and I think they were bound to know whether their pavement as fitted with shoots was in such a condition as to constitute a danger, and were bound to have the cause of danger removed.

It remains to be considered whether Messrs Paull & Williamsons have a responsibility for the accident, they being the owners of the plate which was used to fill up the hole. The question is, had they control of it when it was set so as to complete the continuity of the surface of the footway? I am of opinion that they had not. The whole control of the street as such was in the Corporation, and the owners of the plate would not be liable merely as owners unless it could be proved that they had taken some action creating danger, by removing the plate for the purpose of using the shoot and leaving it unguarded, or by failing to replace the plate in its seat after use. For such fault in using their shoot they would be liable. In short, if they tampered with the street in the use of their shoot, they would have a liability until they had restored the street to the condition in which it was when the shoot was not in use. It was, of course, the duty of the house proprietors to provide and keep up the plate, and by section 344 of the Aberdeen Police Act the proprietor is taken bound to provide a covering to the coal-shoot "as the Commissioners direct," and to keep it "in good repair," and he is liable to a penalty if he does not do so. But this is his obligation to them. They must see that the street is safe for the public, and if it is not safe, must protect the public by a fence or by watching till it is made safe. They do not do their duty if they neglect to see to the condition of this part of the street as much as of any other part. Here the Corporation took no steps as regards the plate, and they do not allege that it was out of repair. The evidence shows that it was not out of repair, and was continued in use after the accident with the acquiescence of the Corporation officials, who knew that an accident had occurred; and that could only have been permitted if they did not consider that the plate was defective. It was the granite seat in their flagstone that was worn and caused any danger there might be—a danger not necessarily obvious to the citizen, but

Nov. 30, 1911. which the officials of the Corporation, acting for them, should have attended to. The proprietor could have no right to interfere with the flagstones.

Laing v. Paull
& William-sons.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I attach no importance to the fact that there was a ring on the bottom of the plate from which a chain and a weight might be hung. The evidence establishes clearly that when a weight was hung on to the plate it did not prevent in any degree the liability to tilt, which was caused by the worn condition of the seat.

I am therefore of opinion that fault cannot be found proved against Messrs Paull & Williamsons, there being no proof that they failed in anything which they were called on to do to make the street safe. If the plate was not notified to them by the Corporation officials to be defective, and if there is no ground for holding that after use it was not reset as usual, then I can see no ground for holding them liable.

The result is that the Corporation alone must be held liable, and that being so they must pay damages. I would move your Lordships accordingly, and suggest £50 as suitable damages in the circumstances.

LORD SALVESEN.—[After stating his opinion that the accident occurred through the disc tilting up owing to the worn condition of the granite seating in which it rested]—The mere occurrence of such an accident to a foot-passenger in a public street raises a presumption of fault against the person who has the control of the pavement, including this disc which forms part of it. The owners of the disc were admittedly Messrs Paull & Williamsons, and if they also had the possession and control of it they would be liable, on the principles explained in the case of Laurie v. Magistrates of Aberdeen,¹ for their failure to make it safe. If, on the other hand, the control of the whole pavement, including the disc, was vested in the Corporation of Aberdeen, no liability would attach to the owners on the ground of mere ownership, although there might be special grounds on which, even on such an assumption, they might be held liable. Thus, if the disc had been removed for the purpose of filling their cellar with coal, and no precautions had been taken to warn the public of the danger caused by the open hole, they would be clearly liable to a member of the public who inadvertently put his foot into it. Or again, if it could be shown that the accident arose through the disc having been improperly replaced, after such an operation, by someone acting on their behalf and with their authority, they could not escape liability for the consequences of his fault. In either of the cases figured, however, the possession and control of the disc would, for the time being, be in the owners, who were obviously entitled to remove the disc for the purpose of allowing coals to descend into their cellar. As I have already stated, however, I do not think that the accident arose in either of the ways figured.

The history of the disc appears to be as follows: It seems to have been put into the pavement sometime after 1862 (the precise date not being ascertained), and not to have been altered or repaired, in any way, since then. It may be assumed to have been put there with the consent and to the satisfaction of the Corporation, in terms of section 344 of the Aberdeen

Police and Water-Works Act, 1862. It is of an old-fashioned type, but if Nov. 30, 1911. kept in good repair, is not a source of danger. The disc itself consists of a circular piece of iron three-quarters of an inch thick, except at the circumference, where it is a quarter of an inch in thickness. It rests upon a ledge cut in the granite stone, by which it is supported. This ledge is bevelled, so that when the stone wears away, even to a relatively inconsiderable extent, the support which it gives is insufficient to prevent the disc being tilted by the heel of a passer-by pressing on the circumference. Had the groove been cut square, it would have required very much more extensive wearing away of the stone before the support would have been so lessened as to constitute a source of danger. [After stating his opinion that had there been a weight attached to the under side of the disc it would not have prevented it from tilting, his Lordship continued]—

The Corporation founded upon section 344 of the 1862 Act for the proposition that it was the duty of the owner to keep the disc or covering in good repair, and maintained that it was the breach of this duty that had resulted in the accident. There is no doubt that, as in a question with the Corporation, such liability is created by the section referred to, and the obligation can be enforced by a penalty not exceeding £5; but it is a different matter to say that the duty of keeping the covering in repair is a duty which the owner owes to the public. If it existed in a private road, leading to the owner's own premises, of course it would be his duty to see that there was no trap in the road into which any person legitimately using it might fall; but when it is situated in a public street, which it is the duty of a public authority to keep safe for the use of the public, I think the owner is entitled to rely on the public authority doing their duty and notifying him when its condition becomes unsafe. That the mere obligation to pay for the maintenance of the part of a street dedicated to public uses does not infer liability to members of the public who may be injured by reason of a defect is illustrated by the case of Christie.¹ There the frontager was liable to maintain the pavement opposite his property, and had actually been notified to do so by the public authority before the accident which gave rise to the action occurred; yet it was held that he was under no responsibility to a member of the public who was injured by reason of the defects in the pavement before the expiry of the time fixed for the completion of the repair. In the case before us the defect was really not in the disc or covering, but in the granite stone into which it was fitted; and that stone, which was part of the pavement vested in the Corporation, could not have been altered by the owner of the coal-cellar at his own hand. Thus he had not the control of an ordinary owner of property which is essential in order to make him responsible; and I am of opinion here that the defenders Paull & Williamsons are therefore not liable to the pursuer for the accident which occurred.

Are, then, the Corporation of Aberdeen so liable? It was admitted that if any of their inspectors or servants—such as police-constables—observed that part of the pavement of a street was in a dangerous condition, it would be the duty of such servants to report the matter to their superiors,

Nov. 30, 1911. and in the meantime, if necessary, to take steps to prevent a member of the public from being injured. It was contended, however, that they had no duty to inspect or to find out any defects except such as were apparent to the eye. In point of fact it is admitted that no inspection was ever made of the coverings of coal-cellars, although, for all practical purposes, these form part of the streets of Aberdeen. In my opinion, the Corporation have acted under a misconception as to their duty in this matter. There may be defects in connection with openings to cellars which are not visible, and yet are not latent in the sense that a proper inspection would disclose them. That was the nature of the defect in question. Had the cover been lifted, the worn state of the stone into which it fitted could easily have been detected by the eye; and the fact that it was no longer a tight fit, as it no doubt had been when first constructed, but had a certain amount of play, was sufficient to lead a skilled inspector to the conclusion that it might not be safe. There was apparently no difficulty in removing the cover from the street; but if it had been necessary to get access to the coal-cellar, in order to remove the cover with a view to seeing whether it was in a safe condition, I do not doubt that the Corporation would be entitled to demand that it should be so removed with a view to a convenient inspection. One of the defenders' witnesses suggested that, as there were 300 similar coverings in Aberdeen, it would be impracticable to make such an inspection. I cannot agree. A comparatively short space of time would enable an inspector to see whether these 300 covers were in a safe condition, and a similar inspection repeated at relatively long intervals would probably be sufficient; but even if an inspection of the kind would involve a great deal of trouble, I think the Corporation, through their servants, were bound to take that trouble. They are charged with the duty of seeing that the streets are not a source of danger to the citizens, and they must take such means, by inspection or otherwise, as are necessary to secure that end. The fault in the present case was small in degree, but it is none the less fault which infers legal liability. I am therefore of opinion, following the decision in the case of Laurie v. Magistrates of Aberdeen,¹ that the defenders the Corporation of Aberdeen are liable in damages to the pursuer, just as if the defect which caused her accident had existed in the pavement itself, the materials of which belonged to the Town-Council.

As regards the amount of damages, we must assess that as a jury would; and I think that looking to the fact that no pecuniary damage is proved, and that the pursuer practically recovered from her injuries within a month of the date when she received them, a sum of £50 is reasonable compensation to her for the pain and inconvenience to which she was subjected.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. At first, I was inclined to think that there might be liability here against Paull & Williamsons as well as against the Corporation. I agree with Mr Morison that when an occupier removes such a cover, the liability for accident caused thereby remains on him until the cover is properly shut. When it is shut, the liability is on the Corporation.

The question comes to be, When is the cover properly shut so as to Nov. 30, 1911. relieve the occupier of the liability? Here it is said it was not properly shut in two respects, first, that the cover was so worn that it did not fit; & William- and second, that the weight which was meant to be used along with the sons. cover was not in use at the time. It seems to me that these are both clear Lord Guthrie. defects, for which, in certain circumstances, the occupier might have been liable.

If the pursuer had proved that but for the worn condition of the cover the accident, even looking to the condition of the granite, would not have happened or might not have happened, I should have been disposed to think that there was such liability, although the liability primarily in regard to the streets—and the covers are part of the street—is on the Corporation. In that case, if the cover had been so worn as to have been obviously unsafe, there might have been liability on the occupier as well as on the Corporation; but it seems to me that the evidence of Mr Bennet Mitchell, the leading witness for the pursuer, shows that the cover was so slightly worn that it had nothing to do with the accident.

Again, if the absence of the weight had had anything to do with the accident, that would have been clearly a matter for which the occupier and not the Corporation, primarily at least, would have been responsible; but, as Lord Salvesen has shown, the evidence clearly indicates that the presence or absence of the weight had nothing to do with the accident.

Therefore, while I hold that there were two defects because of either of which, in certain circumstances, the occupier might have been found liable, it seems to me that neither of these defects contributed to the accident. Accordingly, I agree that the Corporation alone are liable.

Counsel for Paull & Williamsons moved for expenses both against the pursuer and against the Town-Council.

Counsel for the pursuer contended that the Town-Council alone should be found liable in expenses to Paull & Williamsons, and cited Craig v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.¹

Counsel for the Town-Council contended that as the pursuer had brought Paull & Williamsons into the process, she was liable for their expenses.² The action was originally directed against Paull & Williamsons only, and these defenders were brought in subsequently by amendment. They were not responsible for the appearance of Paull & Williamsons in the action.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor [of the Sheriff-substitute]: Find in fact [here followed the findings in fact quoted supra, p. 197]: Find in law (1) that it was the duty of the defenders the Town-Council of Aberdeen through their servants to have inspected the said coal-shoot and its cover from time to time with a view of ascertaining whether it was in a safe condition; and (2) that their failure to do so and to protect the pursuer as a member of the public from accident renders them liable in damages to her: Assess the damages at the sum of £50 ster-

Skerrington.

On 30th June 1909 Henry Moncrieff Steele, C.A., Glasgow, judicial factor on the trust-estate of Andrew Ramsay, who died in 1865, brought an action of multiplepinding to determine the rights of parties in a sum of £9000 forming part of the trust-estate.

Claims on the fund in medio were lodged (1) by the testamentary trustees of Miss Christina Ramsay Smith (who, as liferentrix, received the income of the £9000 until her death in 1908) in which the claimants maintained, inter alia, that the fund formed part of the residue of Mr Ramsay's estate, and that one-half thereof had vested a morte testatoris in Miss Ramsay Smith, who was entitled to one-half of the residue; (2) by the British Linen Bank, who maintained that one-half of the fund had vested a morte testatoris in John Crawford Hunter (who died in 1890, and who was entitled to the other half of the residue of Mr Ramsay's estate), and that the Bank was entitled to the same under a bond and disposition and assignation in security executed by Mr Hunter in 1878, whereby he conveyed to them his whole interest in the residue of Mr Ramsay's estate; and (3) by Mr Ramsay's next of kin, who maintained that the fund had fallen into intestacy.

On 22nd January 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced an interlocutor ranking and preferring the trustees of Miss Ramsay Smith and the British Linen Bank each to one-half of the fund in medio, and disposing of the question of expenses. This interlocutor, which contained no decree for payment, was not reclaimed against.

Thereafter the pursuer and real raiser (the judicial factor), lodged a claim "to be ranked and preferred on any amount to which the Bank may be entitled to the extent of the sum of £4051, 2s. 10d." He Nov. 30, 1911.

 averred that Mr Ramsay's testamentary trustees, who administered Ramsay's the estate prior to his (the judicial factor's) appointment, had lent Judicial money to Mr Hunter under two bonds and dispositions in security Factor v.
 dated 1874 and 1875 respectively, that the loans had not been fully British Linen repaid, and that the sum remaining due amounted to £4051, 2s. 10d., Bank.
 the sum claimed.

On 12th May 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) dismissed this claim as incompetent, and, the judicial factor having reclaimed, the Second Division, on 17th May 1911, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.*

On 6th June 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) appointed the pursuer and real raiser (the judicial factor) to lodge a condescendence of the fund in medio. The condescendence having been lodged, the British Linen Bank lodged objections thereto, and a record was made up on the condescendence and objections.

In the condescendence of the fund the pursuer and real raiser averred that after the granting of the bond and disposition in security to the British Linen Bank, John Crawford Hunter became insolvent and granted a trust-disposition in favour of creditors; that certain dividends were paid from his estate to Mr Ramsay's trustees; but that a sum still remained due under the bonds and dispositions in their favour. He also averred:—“(8) Except to the extent of the sum to which the trustees of the late Miss Christina Ramsay Smith may obtain decree of payment, and of any excess of the other half of the fund in medio over the total sum due by the said John Crawford Hunter and his estate to the judicial factor as brought out in the statement above mentioned, there is no fund in medio, the balance of that other half of the said residue of £9000 having been either entirely or almost entirely exhausted in compensating the sum due as aforesaid by the said John Crawford Hunter and his estate to the estate under the charge of the said judicial factor; or having to the extent of the said total sum due by the said John Crawford Hunter and his estate to the judicial factor ceased to be due and payable to the said John Crawford Hunter or those in his right on and after [the dates of his bonds and dispositions in favour of the trustees and of his trust-deed], in respect either of (1) the trustees of the late Andrew Ramsay, or the judicial factor on his estate, having right to retain said balance as against all sums due by the said John Crawford Hunter and his estate as aforesaid, or (2) having ceased to be due and demandable by the said John Crawford Hunter or those in his right, as from one or other of the last-mentioned dates in respect of those representing the estate of the said Andrew Ramsay being entitled to balance the accounts between the two estates according to the law regulating the balancing of accounts in bankruptcy.”

In their objections the British Linen Bank averred that the pursuer's claim of retention and compensation was a re-assertion of the claim which had already been held incompetent in respect that the competition was at an end, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The competition having been ended, and the fund in medio disposed of by a final interlocutor on the merits, the claim of compensation or retention against the fund in medio now put forward by the judicial factor is incompetent. (2) In respect that the objectors have been ranked and preferred by final decree of the Court to one-half of the fund in medio, the judicial factor is not entitled to set off against the share of the fund belonging to them debts due to the estate by John Crawford Hunter or his estate, nor to retain any part of the said half of the fund in medio as against all sums due by Hunter as aforesaid.

On 26th October 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the cause, finds that any pleas of compensation or retention, otherwise competent to the pursuer and real raiser in a question with the British Linen Bank, are still open to him, notwithstanding the interlocutor of 22nd January 1910: Continues the cause for further procedure, and, on the motion of said Bank, grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.—At an earlier stage of the present case the Second Division (affirming Lord Mackenzie) decided that after an interlocutor had become final disposing of the whole fund in medio, and ranking and preferring the claimants the British Linen Bank to one-half thereof, it was incompetent for the pursuer and real raiser to lodge a claim alleging that the trust-estate was a creditor of the Bank's cedent, Mr Hunter, and claiming to be ranked and preferred to the amount of the debt on any sum to which the Bank might be entitled (Ramsay's Judicial Factor v. British Linen Bank, 1911 S. C. 832). The pursuer now seeks to accomplish the same result by lodging a condescendence of the fund in medio, in which he claims that he has a right of compensation, or otherwise of retention, in respect of the debt which he alleges to be due to the trust-estate by the Bank's author. The interlocutor appointing a condescendence of the fund to be lodged was subsequent in date to the interlocutor of the Inner House already referred to. No argument was addressed to me, and all questions are reserved, as to the relevancy and validity of the alleged claims at the instance of the trust-estate against Hunter, and as to the validity of the rights of compensation or retention claimed by the pursuer. The only question argued was whether these rights, if otherwise well founded, were still open to the pursuer, or whether it was incompetent for the pursuer to insist upon them in the face of the final decree of ranking and preference. If the question is still open I see no objection to its being decided upon a discussion of the condescendence of the fund in medio, in the same way as if the pursuer had been only the nominal raiser of the action. See A. S., 11th July 1828, sec. 47; Bell's Com., vol. 2, p. 278, 7th edition.

"The interlocutor of ranking and preference did not contain any decree for payment, but the Court held that it was none the less a final decree completely disposing of the competition, and excluding all other parties except those who were ranked and preferred. But the Court did not decide that a decree of ranking and preference is to all effects and purposes the same as a decree for payment. If a litigant allows a decree for payment to go out against him, I should suppose that he cannot subsequently suspend the decree upon the ground that at its date he had a counter claim, upon which he might have founded a plea of compensation or retention. On principle, however, I see no reason why a merely declaratory decree finally establishing a claimant's right to a part of the fund in medio, and so constituting him a creditor of the fund-holder, should be held to preclude the latter from pleading compensation or retention. No question of compensation or retention could arise in the present case until it had been established that a particular claimant, viz., the Bank, was a creditor of the pursuer, or rather of the trust-estate. Accordingly, I am of opinion that it is still open to the pursuer to plead compensation or retention as against the successful claimant. Obviously, however, as a matter of fair play, notice of any such claims ought to be given at the earliest possible moment by the pursuer and real raiser of an action of multiplepinding, and no doubt such notice would Argued for the reclaimer;—It was incompetent for the pursuer and real raiser in his condescendence of the fund in medio to deduct any part of it on the ground of compensation or retention as against a particular claimant. It might be that the matter of compensation or retention could be competently raised later when an order for payment of the fund was sought, but it did not arise at this stage. The only lis here was as to the settlement of the fund—which was a perfectly distinct process from the competition for ranking¹—and it was usual to approve of the fund in medio before the claims were discussed. This was the course of procedure contemplated by the Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828.* Had the condescendence of the fund been given out with the summons, the pursuer could not have stated his present claim in the condescendence. Bell's statement² and the Act of Sederunt referred to claims against the whole fund. Such claims would not depend in any way on what party was preferred to the fund. Here the respondent's claim was against a part of the fund. It depended on the personality of the successful claimant. Had anyone but the Bank been preferred, the respondent could not have advanced this claim. If the respondent were right, it would follow that if there were, say, fifteen claimants, the pursuer might in the condescendence have to state fifteen claims of compensation or retention. The pursuer here was really trying by another process to establish the claim which the Court had formerly held to be incompetent.³

Ramsay's

Argued for the respondent;—It was competent for the respondent to state his present claim in the condescendence of the fund. It was, indeed, the proper mode of settling the matter, and in the case of a nominal raiser, who ex hypothesi did not come into the competition, it was the only method. Bell² and the cases⁴ supported the Lord Ordinary's decision. It was a mistake to say that the respondent's claim depended on the personality of the successful claimant. The loss on the investments fell on the whole estate, and the respondent have been given in the condescendence annexed to the summons if the point had not been overlooked. The pursuer's present position is quite different from that stated by him when he came into Court, and if expense has been caused by this change of front, it will probably fall upon the pursuer to make it good. I shall pronounce a finding that any pleas of compensation or retention, otherwise competent to the pursuer and real raiser in a question with the Bank, are still open to him, notwithstanding the interlocutor of 22nd January 1910, and I shall continue the case for further procedure."

Ramsay's Judicial Factor v.
British Linen
Bank.

At advising on 30th November 1911,—

LORD SALVESEN.—This reclaiming note raises an apparently novel point of procedure. The pursuer and real raiser of this action of multiplepinding has a claim against the late John Crawford Hunter, arising out of certain bonds granted by him in favour of the trust-estate which the pursuer represents—the security subjects conveyed under the bonds having proved insufficient to meet the principal and interest. Mr Hunter became bankrupt in 1887, and his estates were realised under a voluntary trust-disposition. He died in 1890.

The object of the action was to ascertain the persons in right of a sum of about £9000 which had been disposed in liferent to certain ladies who are now dead; and by interlocutor, which was allowed to become final, the Lord Ordinary ranked and preferred the British Linen Bank to one-half of the fund in medio as assignees of the late John Crawford Hunter under an assignation dated in 1878. The pursuer thereafter lodged a claim in respect of the unpaid portion of the bonds already referred to. In this claim he asked to be ranked and preferred on any amount to which the Bank had already been found entitled to the extent of £4051, 2s. 10d. This claim was dismissed as incompetent by the Lord Ordinary, and we affirmed his interlocutor. Had it been truly a riding claim it was admitted that it would not have been lodged too late, but as it was really a claim in competition with the Bank, who had already been ranked and preferred to one-half of the fund in medio, it was held that it could not be entertained. As at present advised I do not think the pursuer suffered any prejudice by this, for his claim was bad, being framed exactly as it would have been if John Hunter had himself been the successful claimant (in which case it would have been a proper rider), whereas the pursuer could not claim to ride upon the Bank's claim as the assignees of Hunter.

The pursuer thereafter put in a condescendence of the fund in medio, in which he proposed to deduct from the one-half share to which the Bank had been found entitled as assignees of John Crawford Hunter, the amount of Hunter's indebtedness to the trust-estate. The British Linen Bank lodged objections, in which they maintained that the claim of compensation or retention against the fund in medio put forward by the judicial factor was incompetent. The Lord Ordinary has sustained the competency, and I am of opinion that we ought to affirm his interlocutor.

The main argument by which the reclaiming note was supported was that, while the fund in medio might be subject to deduction in respect of sums due to the holder of the fund, the amount of the fund could not be greater or less according as it was decided that one or other of the competing claimants was entitled to it. There is, at first sight, much force in this argument; but in the end I have come to the conclusion that it is not sound. The simplest case would have been if John Crawford Hunter had still been alive and the whole fund in medio had been found to belong to him. In that case I cannot doubt that, in stating the fund in medio, the holder of the fund would have been entitled to deduct any sums which were due to him by John Crawford Hunter. In other words, the latter could not have demanded payment of his share of the estate in the pursuer's hands without meeting his indebtedness. On the other hand, had some other claimant been found entitled to the fund in medio, no claim of retention could have been made by the pursuer as against such claimant. The fact that the claim is made, not by Hunter, but by his assignees, does not seem to me to alter the right of the pursuer to deduct any sum due by Hunter to him. Nor does it make any difference that the claim of retention only affects one-half of the fund in medio. Professor Bell (Bell's Com. ii., p. 278) says that "in stating the amount of the fund, the pursuer is entitled to discuss any claim of retention or of compensation which may be competent to him," and no authority was quoted to the contrary. Counsel for the Bank practically conceded that whatever other answers they might have to the pursuer's claim, it might not be incompetent for him to state it later, before they obtained any decree for payment against him. If so, the point which they raise is one of procedure only, and not of substance, and it is more convenient that it should be ascertained now than at some later stage in the process. A record has been made up on the condescendence of the fund and objections; and the merits of the pursuer's claim can be properly determined on this record. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitting the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

v. Mathwin &

A charter-party stipulated that a vessel should load a cargo of coals in sixty running hours, time not to count in case of "delays through stoppages at collieries with which steamer is booked to load," or "any accidents or cause beyond control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading." A colliery company, who were supplying to the charterers a certain class of coal which was to form part of the cargo, having temporarily restricted the output of their pits for the purpose of economic working and thereby diminished the supply of that class of coal, failed to deliver coal alongside the vessel in sufficient quantities to allow loading to proceed continuously, and the consequent delay caused the vessel to exceed her stipulated loading time.

Held that the charterers were not relieved from a claim for demurrage by the clause of exception in the charter-party, in respect (1) that the restricted output of the coal in question was not a "stoppage at collieries” in the sense of the charter-party, and (2) that it did not “prevent or delay the loading” but delayed the provision of the cargo, and that the obligation on the charterers to provide a cargo was an absolute duty unless expressly excepted.

IN January 1910 the Owners of the s.s. “Arden,” of London, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against William Mathwin & Son, coal exporters there, in which the pursuers claimed the sum of £112, 8s. 1d. as demurrage due to them by the defenders for a period during which the “Arden” had been detained in loading a cargo beyond the time stipulated in a charter-party entered into between the parties on 22nd October 1909.

The charter-party stipulated that the “Arden” should proceed to Methil Dock and there load a cargo of coals from such colliery or collieries as the defenders, as agents for the freighters, should direct. “The freighters being allowed for loading the vessel 60 running hours, commencing from first high-water after arrival in roads, and notice given according to the customs of the port, but time, in any case, not to count between 2 P.M. Saturdays and 6 A.M. Mondays. Time not to count on any general holiday, colliery, national, local holiday or fête day, nor in case of pitmen or other hands striking work, or lock-outs, railway detention, or delays through stoppages at collieries with which steamer is booked to load, nor from riots, frost, or floods, or any accidents or cause beyond control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading, from date of this charter until the actual completion of loading (time occupied in the shipment of bunker coals not to count; any extra time required for the shipment of the cargo in consequence of its interruption from this cause, or from the vessel not being able to proceed with her loading during any portion of her lay-time, not to count. . . .)” “8. Demurrage.—Demurrage to be paid to the steamer at the rate of sixteen shillings and eightpence for every hour employed beyond the time allowed for loading and discharging, subject to the exceptions contained in this charter unless steamer already on demurrage.”

The pursuers averred that the “Arden” proceeded to Methil where her lay-time, in terms of the charter-party, began at 12.22 P.M. on 26th October 1909; that she proceeded with her loading and finished loading at 4.15 P.M. on 3rd November 1909; that the time thus occupied in loading was 195 hours 53 minutes; that the steamer would have been loaded within her lay-time had the cargo been ready; that deducting from the time occupied in loading the sixty hours stipulated for, and the time of one hour occupied in bunkering, all in terms of the charter-party, a balance remained of 134 hours 53 minutes, on which demurrage at the stipulated rate fell to be paid, amounting to the sum sued for.

The defenders averred in answer:—“Denied that the vessel was on demurrage for 134 hours 53 minutes. . . . Averred that owing to stoppage at the Cowdenbeath pits from which collieries they were booked to load, the charterers were unable to proceed with the loading at once, and this delay continued till Saturday 30th October 1909, which was a colliery holiday at Cowdenbeath pits. This consequently prevented or delayed the loading within the meaning of the exceptions. . . .”

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defenders, being excused from loading by reason of exceptions in the charter-party, and the steamer having been loaded within the time allowed, are entitled to Nov. 30, 1911. absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led. The facts established at the proof with regard to the actual delay in loading the ship are summarised in the first sixteen findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, infra. From the proof it also appeared that the cause of the delay in providing the cargo of coal (which was of a class known as "doubles," i.e., small coal sifted out from the larger coal) was that certain vessels which were to take cargoes of the larger coal were not forward, and that accordingly the collieries restricted their working meantime to avoid the trouble and expense of binging the larger coal until these vessels arrived.

On 29th November 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that by charter-party dated 22nd October 1909 the defenders chartered the pursuers' steamship 'Arden' to load at Methil a cargo of coal for Rotterdam; (2) that under the charter the loading time was 60 running hours commencing from first high-water after arriving in the roads and notice given according to the custom of the port; (3) that the exceptions in the charter-party included, inter alia, 'delays through stoppages at collieries with which steamer is booked to load,' and also included 'any accidents or cause beyond control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading'; (4) that the vessel arrived in Methil roads at noon on 26th October 1909; (5) that notice was duly given as required by the charter-party; (6) that the first high-water after the arrival in the roads and notice given was at 12.22 P.M. of the same day; (7) that on the arrival of the 'Arden' in the roads there were other ships with prior right to go into loading berth; (8) that according to the bye-laws regulating loading at Methil, steamers rank for loading in the order in which they are ready to take in cargo; (9) that the 'Arden' was a vessel taking a mixed cargo; (10) that according to the bye-laws she was not entitled to a berth until the whole of her cargo was available; (11) that the 'Arden' came into dock about noon of 27th October to await a loading berth; (12) that a loading berth was available for her at 10 P.M. on 27th October; (13) that she did not get a berth because her coal cargo was not forward; (14) that the 'Arden' was berthed on 29th October at 9.45 A.M.; (15) that the loading was finished on 3rd November at 4.15 P.M., and the vessel sailed that day about 5 P.M.; (16) that the loading of the 'Arden' was interrupted and she was removed from the berth several times because her coal cargo was not available; (17) that the delay in loading arose from causes beyond the charterers' control and falling within the exceptions of the charter-party; (18) that giving effect to the said exceptions no demurrage is due: Finds in law that in respect the detention of the vessel beyond the stipulated loading time was owing to causes falling within the charter-party exceptions the defenders are not liable in demurrage: Therefore assolzies the defenders and finds them entitled to expenses; allows," &c.

The pursuers appealed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Skerrington) on 7th November 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute had not given effect to the distinction in law between the obligation to provide a cargo and the obligation to load. The duty to provide a cargo was absolute, and it was failure to perform this duty which had

"Arden"
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Mathwin &
Son.

Nov. 30, 1911. caused the delay in this case. The charterers were not relieved of this obligation by the clause of exception which referred only to delays in loading.¹ Further, what had occurred was not a "stoppage at collieries" in the sense of the charter-party, it was a mere restriction of output; nor could the respondents claim relief under the latter part of the clause, as the words "any accidents or cause" must be construed as applying only to accidents or causes ejusdem generis with the preceding expressed exceptions, which the cause in question was not.²

"Arden"
Steamship

v. Mathwin &
Son.

Argued for the respondents;—What had occurred was a "stoppage at collieries" in the ordinary sense of the words, and the respondents were absolved from the consequences of this delay.³ Once it was established that there had been such a stoppage, the Court had no duty to inquire further into its cause.⁴ Alternatively, the occurrence was covered by the words of the general clause of exception which applied to "any cause" beyond the charterers' control. The absence of the word "other" excluded the application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis. The cases of Grant,⁵ Gardiner,⁶ and "Arden" *Steamship Company*⁷ did not apply. They only affirmed the proposition that the obligation to provide a cargo was prima facie absolute, but here this obligation was qualified by the terms of the charter-party.⁸

At advising on 30th November 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the defenders, William Mathwin & Son, coal exporters in Glasgow, by charter-party, dated 22nd October 1909, chartered a vessel to go to Burntisland or Methil, which two ports are run in conjunction, to take a cargo of coals. The clause of the charter with which we have to do is this: "The freighters being allowed for loading the vessel sixty running hours, commencing from first high-water after arrival in roads, and notice given according to the customs of the port, but time, in any case, not to count between 2 P.M. Saturdays and 6 A.M. Mondays. Time not to count on any general holiday, colliery, national, local holiday, or fête day, nor in case of pitmen or other hands striking work, or lockouts, railway detention, or delays through stoppages at collieries with which steamer is booked to load, nor from riots, frost, or floods, or any accidents or cause beyond control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading, from date of this charter until the actual completion of loading." And then there are some other allowances as to bunker coal, and so on.

Now, the ship arrived, and due intimation was made of her arrival, but she was kept waiting; she was in a berth, but she had to be taken out of the berth more than once, the cause of waiting being that the cargo was not ready.

Part of the cargo of coals that the ship was meant to take was what is Nov. 30, 1911. known as "doubles," and "doubles" is a small coal which is got by riddling "Arden" the coal, the larger coal being sold under another name. The reason that Steamship the cargo was not ready was that the set of eleven collieries, to which, Co., Limited, through an agent in Glasgow, the order by the charterers had been given for v. Mathwin & Son. a cargo, did not find it convenient to turn out at that moment quite enough Ld. President. "doubles" to complete the cargo of this vessel. They had taken the order, and if all things had gone in an ordinary way as suited them there would have been plenty of coal to supply the order; but some vessels which were intended to take the "round" (that is to say, the larger) coal did not arrive, and, accordingly, the collieries, for their own convenience, and in order to avoid binging, refused to bring up more coal till they could get the "round" coal away, and consequently they were unable to produce enough "doubles" to complete the cargo of the "Arden."

It is not disputed that there was delay over and above the sixty running hours allowed by the charter, and the present action is for demurrage. The Sheriff-substitute has assoilzied the defenders upon the ground that they were excused under the clause I have just read to your Lordships.

I do not agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute. Each of these cases must be taken upon its own clause, but I think it is amply settled that, prima facie, there is an absolute duty upon a charterer to provide a cargo, and if he fails in that duty he undoubtedly will have to pay demurrage. Doubtless the charter after all is a bargain, and the charter-party might be so framed as to give an excuse from this duty of providing a cargo. But if that is to be so, the excuse must be very clearly expressed in the charter, because, unless this is very clearly expressed, the duty is, as I have phrased it, an absolute duty.

Now, coming to the clause in question, the argument turned upon two points. First of all, it was said that the cause of delay here was a stoppage at the colliery. I do not think it was, because I think I am entitled to interpret "stoppage at collieries" according to what I conceive to be the ordinary meaning of the phrase when used colloquially or in an ordinary commercial document, and I do not think a colliery is said to be stopped when, for its own purposes, and only for a few hours at a time, it does not choose to put out a certain class of coal. The colliery had not stopped. Stoppage in the ordinary sense implies something that compels the owner of the colliery to suspend his operations, such as a general strike of the men who are working, or a breakdown of the machinery, or an inrush of water into the pit. All these things cause stoppage of a colliery, but I do not think a colliery is stopped when simply one or more of its pits are purposely kept idle because enough ships are not available to carry away one class of coal they produce.

The other portion of the clause which was founded on is "any accidents or cause beyond the control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading." Now, I think the whole of this expression is governed by the concluding words, "which may prevent or delay the loading." I think it is amply settled by authority that loading is one thing and providing a cargo is another, and an accident which may prevent a cargo coming forward is not to be construed as an accident which delays the loading,

Nov. 30, 1911. although, of course, unless the cargo is forward the loading cannot go on.
 "Arden"
 Steamship Co., Limited,
 v. Mathwin & Son.

Ld. President.

I think that distinction is most absolutely taken in the case of Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Company,¹ in a very clear judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) in this Court, and also in the case of Grant & Company v. Coverdale, Todd, & Company,² in the House of Lords. The latter was a case where it was a question of frost delaying the loading, and the frost froze up the canals by which coals were to arrive at the wharf; no coals came, and it was held that there was no delay in loading, the delay having been in the supplying of the cargo. I think the authorities are clear on this point, and therefore I do not think the charterers escape under this clause of the charter-party. It seems to me that here they took their risk. As matter of fact, they did not make any contract by which they could be certain that the coals would come within the time they wanted them. I am not keeping out of view the fact that the representative of the Fife Coal Company stated that if he had been asked for a guarantee he would not have given one. That is his affair, and the charterers' affair. It seems to me that the charterers were under an absolute obligation to provide a cargo, and that they were not relieved of that obligation by the exception in the charter-party with regard to loading. If they were to have the benefit of that exception it should have been clearly stated in the charter-party that non-providing of a cargo was to be in the same position as delay in loading.

Upon the whole matter, I think the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor must be recalled.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur in holding that the Sheriff-substitute is not well founded in his seventeenth finding in fact and in his consequent finding in law.

The undoubted rule of law is, as stated by Lord Blackburn, that "In the absence of something to qualify it, the undertaking of the merchant to furnish a cargo is absolute"—Postlethwaite v. Freeland.³ In the present case sixty hours were allowed for loading, but as cargo was not timeously furnished a much longer time was required. But there were qualifying words in the charter-party in question commencing with "Time not to count." Before examining these words and determining their effect, I think that it is necessary to advert to the fact that there are two possible occasions of delay in loading—first, the non-furnishing of cargo; and second, the tardiness of actual loading. The qualifying clause provides for both these occasions, but it must not be run together as if the whole of it applied to either or both. The first limb of the sentence is, "Time not to count on any general holiday, &c., nor in case of pitmen or other hands striking work, or lockouts, railway detention, or delays through stoppage at collieries with which steamer is booked to load." The different categories of delay have clearly a bearing on the charterer's obligation to furnish cargo, and excuse him for the consequent delay which may occur.

The second limb of the sentence is, "Nor from riots, frost, floods, or any accidents or cause beyond control of the charterers which may prevent the loading." These different categories of delay have equally clearly a bearing not on the furnishing, but on the loading of the cargo. I am not prepared to restrict "any accidents or cause" to such as are ejusdem generis with "riots, frost, or flood." But I agree that they must be accidents or causes beyond the control of the charterers, and they must be such as prevent the loading of a cargo, already furnished, proceeding in ordinary course.

² 9 App. Cas. 470.

³ (1880) 5 App. Cas. 599, at p. 620.

If this be a sound construction of the charter-party, the charterers cannot take benefit from the last part of the exception, for nothing happened to prevent or delay loading. Nor can they take benefit from the first part of the exception, unless they can bring their case under the head of stoppage at the colliery. But stoppage at the colliery must have its ordinary and natural meaning in the collocation in which it is found. There is stoppage of a colliery where accident occurs to pithead machinery, or in the underground workings, or from similar causes, but not where the owners resort for their own purposes to short time or other device temporarily to reduce their output. That is all that the charterers can point to here.

I think, therefore, that the charterers are responsible, not for delay in the loading, but for failure in furnishing a cargo. The case is very similar to *Gardiner's case*¹ and to the "Arden" Steamship Company v. Weir.²

The Lord President intimated that LORD SKERRINGTON, who was absent at advising, concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 29th November 1910: Of new find in fact in terms of the findings in fact Nos. (1) to (16) inclusive in said interlocutor: Find further in fact (17) that the delay in loading arose from causes for which the charterers are not excused under the charter-party; and (18) that the demurrage amounted to 134 hours 53 minutes: Find in law that, in respect that the detention of the vessel beyond the stipulated loading time was not excused by the terms of the charter-party, the defenders are liable in damages: Therefore decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £112, 8s. 1d.," &c.

houses in each tenement entered from this well. It also appeared that in each storey the division between the front and back houses was formed by the walls enclosing the well in the centre and by an unbroken wall common to the front and back houses on each side of the well.

Held that the proposed houses were "back-to-back houses" within the meaning of sec. 43 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, which prohibits the erection of such houses as dwellings for the working classes; and that warrant for their erection fell to be refused.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court, Edinburgh.

THE MURRAYFIELD REAL ESTATE COMPANY, LIMITED, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court of Edinburgh for warrant to erect four tenements, of three storeys each, of dwelling-houses at Piersfield on the west side of Piersfield Grove, Edinburgh, conform to plans produced.

Answers were lodged by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of Edinburgh in which they pleaded;—Warrant should be refused with expenses to the respondents in respect that (a) the warrant craved is for the erection of back-to-back houses in contravention of the provisions of section 43 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909,* and (b) that the petitioners have not made sufficient provision for light and ventilation for the proposed tenements.

In their statement of facts the Magistrates averred:—"The four tenements which the petitioners propose to erect on the west side of Piersfield Grove are to consist of three storeys each. The plans produced with this petition show that it is intended to have four houses on each flat—two houses to the front and two houses to the back. Each of the two houses to the front is divided from the adjacent house to the back by an unbroken and continuous centre wall, which prevents effective through ventilation. The houses on the two upper storeys all enter from the staircase which is to be constructed in the centre of each tenement. Their only ventilation is (1) from their respective windows to front or back as the case may be, and (2) from the said staircase, which, together with the passage at the foot thereof, is common to twelve separate residences, and is roofed over with glass and unventilated at the top. The houses, therefore, are what are known as back-to-back houses."

In answer to this statement the petitioners averred:—"Denied that said houses are known as back-to-back houses, or are similar in design and arrangement to houses which are so known. Quoad ultra admitted

* The Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), enacts:—Sec. 43. "Notwithstanding anything in any local Act or bye-law in force in any borough or district, it shall not be lawful to erect any back-to-back houses intended to be used as dwellings for the working classes, and any such house commenced to be erected after the passing of this Act shall be deemed to be unfit for human habitation for the purposes of the provisions of the Housing Acts. Provided that nothing in this section (a) shall prevent the erection or use of a house containing several tenements in which the tenements are placed back-to-back, if the medical officer of health for the district certifies that the several tenements are so constructed and arranged as to secure effective ventilation of all habitable rooms in every tenement; or (b) shall apply to houses abutting on any streets the plans whereof have been approved by the local authority before the first day of May nineteen hundred and nine, in any borough or district in which, at the passing of this Act, any local Act or bye-laws are in force permitting the erection of back-to-back houses."

under the explanation that the plans permit of the through ventilation of each house and also of the common passage and staircase. The petitioners are willing, if required, to amend said plans by the introduction of a ventilator at the top of the staircase."

v. Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

They also averred:—"The petitioners deny that the houses proposed to be erected by them are back-to-back houses in the meaning of the said Act. Such houses are invariably formed by the introduction in a tenement, consisting of two houses only, of a continuous longitudinal centre wall, the doorways of the respective houses not communicating with each other, and entering from different streets formed on either side of the tenement. The petitioners' plans show no such wall. The houses are all entered from one street by a common passage, which is carried through the tenement to the back-green, common to the tenants and occupiers, and, as regards the upper flats, by a common stair, which is lit from the roof."

The Magistrates also referred to section 49 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, as amended by section 80 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900,* and averred that the petitioners' plans did not make sufficient provision for the light and ventilation of the tenements, in respect that (a) the common stair was lighted only from the roof; and (b) that there was no provision for through ventilation of the houses in the tenements.

On 16th February 1911 the Dean of Guild repelled the plea in law for the Magistrates, and granted warrant in terms of the prayer of the petition.†

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 49 (as amended by the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cxxxiii.), sec. 80), enacts:—" . . . The Dean of Guild Court may decline to grant warrant for the erection of any house or building, or for the alteration of any existing house or building, until the said Court is satisfied that the plans provide suitably for strength of materials, stability, mode of access, light, ventilation, water-closets, and water supply, and other sanitary requirements, and are otherwise in conformity with the provisions of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts."

† "NOTE.— . . . In considering the question of the applicability of clause 43 of the 1909 Act, the first question which the Dean of Guild Court had to consider was whether the term 'back-to-back' houses was known either in Edinburgh or in Scotland as a description of a certain class of house. The unanimous answer of all the members of the Court was that it was an unknown term.

"The petitioners supplied to the Court some information as to the nature of back-to-back houses in England, and this information was corroborated by the Master of Works, who has had English experience.

"It appears that back-to-back houses in England are built in terraces, and the buildings have a solid party wall running parallel to two terraces, and the houses are built on each side of this party wall, one set of houses facing one terrace and the other set facing the other. In such houses the means of ventilation is from the front of the house except in the case of the houses at the end of the terraces where there is ventilation on the front and one side.

"The Court having thus been informed of what back-to-back houses in England are, they considered whether the houses in the present case were back-to-back houses in the English sense, and they came to the conclusion that they were not; because in the proposed houses there is ventilation not only from the front of the houses but also into the well of the staircase at the back of the houses, although there is no ventilation from open air to

v. Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

The Magistrates appealed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 2nd December 1911. No appearance was made for the petitioners at this hearing.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The houses for which warrant was sought were “back-to-back houses” within the meaning of sec. 43 of the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909. As the term “back-to-back” was not defined in the Act, it must be interpreted in the ordinary and popular sense; and in ordinary usage houses were said to be “back-to-back” if three sides of each house, as here, formed party-walls of the adjoining houses so that the house could be ventilated only from one side.¹ The object of sec. 43 was to prevent the erection of houses without sufficient provision for ventilation; and here the Dean of Guild in his note stated that in the proposed tenements proper ventilation could not be obtained. The provisos (a) and (b) in the section did not apply here. In point of fact the medical officer of health had refused to grant the certificate required by proviso (a), and there were no provisions in any local Acts or bye-laws which could bring the case under proviso (b). (2) In the circumstances the Dean of Guild was bound to refuse the warrant in view of the terms of the local Acts referred to by the appellants. It was true that the language of these Acts was permissive, and purported to confer a power only, but where a duty was coupled with a power, as here, a statutory provision was held to be obligatory.²

open air as there is in the case of houses running from the front to the back of a tenement. In these circumstances, the Court considered section 43 of the Housing Act of 1909 was inapplicable, and that they could not refuse warrant on the ground that the houses would be back-to-back.

“The Court then considered what was the principal objection intended to be struck at by the 43rd section of the Housing Act of 1909, and they were unanimously of opinion that it was defective ventilation. They further considered that the system of having four houses on each floor as proposed in the present plans is objectionable from the point of view of ventilation, because proper ventilation cannot be obtained merely by means of the well of a staircase like that in the plans before the Court.

“In these circumstances the Court had to consider whether they should exercise the powers conferred upon them by section 49 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, as amended by section 80 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900. If the power conferred by these sections had been conferred upon the Court recently the Court would have had no hesitation in rejecting the present plans; but, during the time these enactments have been in force, the Court have passed many similar plans to these in question, and have previously authorised similar buildings on the petition of the present petitioners in the same street, where the proposed buildings will be situated.

“In these circumstances, the Court considered that it was undesirable to exercise the power conferred upon the Court, and they therefore resolved that, subject to certain amendments of detail, the petitioners’ plans should not be rejected on the second ground pled by the respondents.

“At the same time the Court take this opportunity of intimating that in the case of future proposals possessing the features shown on the plans now under review but unattended with the specialty of the present case they reserve to themselves the right to refuse plans showing four houses to the flat. . . .”

² Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford, (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214; Nichols v. Baker, (1890) 44 Ch. D. 262.

LORD DUNDAS.—This is an application made by the Murrayfield Real Estate Company, Limited, to the Dean of Guild Court in Edinburgh for a warrant to erect certain buildings upon property which, I understand, admittedly belongs to themselves. They propose to erect four tenements on the west side of Piersfield Grove which are to consist of three storeys each, with four houses on each flat ; and we have before us the plans which show very clearly what the general nature of the proposed houses is to be. We see that there are to be two houses to the front and two to the back, and that the houses to the front are separated from the houses to the back by a centre wall in which there are only certain door openings which lead into a common well.

The petition was opposed in the Court below by the Corporation of Edinburgh upon grounds of public policy and public duty. The Dean of Guild repelled the objections of the Corporation, and the Corporation have appealed to us. No appearance has been made at the bar on behalf of the respondents. This is to be regretted, because we have not had the advantage of any argument by counsel in support of the view taken by the Dean of Guild in the Court below ; but we have had the case very fairly stated to us by counsel for the Corporation, and I think we are in a position to give judgment upon it.

It seems to me that the Dean of Guild has erred. The main ground of objection taken by the Corporation is that the houses proposed are back-to-back houses within the meaning of section 43 of the Housing and Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44). That section provides :—“Notwithstanding anything in any local Act or bye-law in force in any borough or district, it shall not be lawful to erect any back-to-back houses intended to be used as dwellings for the working classes ; and any such house commenced to be erected after the passing of this Act shall be deemed to be unfit for human habitation for the purposes of the provisions of the Housing Acts.” Then follow two provisos which I need not read, because it has been explained satisfactorily that neither of them applies to the present case. The first proviso excludes cases where the medical officer of health for the district certifies that the tenements will secure effective ventilation ; and we are told here that not only has no certificate been produced, but that a certificate has been refused. The other proviso deals with the case of there being any local Act or bye-laws in force permitting the erection of back-to-back houses ; and we are told that no such local Act or bye-laws here exist.

That brings one to consider what are back-to-back houses within the meaning of section 43. The phrase is not defined by the interpretation clause of the Act. We are informed by the Dean of Guild that the phrase is not known in the building trade in Scotland. The Dean of Guild seems to have considered, therefore, that it was something of a technical phrase, and that he must discover the meaning of it elsewhere. He obtained information with regard to the meaning or application of the phrase “back-to-back houses” in England, with the view, apparently, of discovering from English practice or experience what the technical or special import of the phrase was. He states in his note :—“It appears that back-to-back houses in England are built in terraces, and the buildings have a solid party wall

Dec. 2, 1911. running parallel to two terraces, and the houses are built on each side of this party wall, one set of houses facing one terrace and the other set facing the other." Then he says the houses here are not of the description known in England as back-to-back houses, and concludes that therefore they do not fall within the phrase "back-to-back houses" as used in the Act.

Lord Dundas. I cannot think that that is a satisfactory or exhaustive way of dealing with the matter. These houses may, I should think, be back-to-back houses within the meaning of the Act, although they do not correspond precisely to what are known in England as back-to-back houses. I do not think the phrase is a technical one; it appears to me rather to be used in the Act in a popular and general sense. I apprehend that if it had been intended to have a definite and restricted meaning, it would have been specially so defined by the Act. I do not propose to attempt any definition of what back-to-back houses may mean—an attempt which has not been made, probably wisely, by Parliament—but looking at the plans and considering the description of the houses given, it does seem to me clear enough that the front houses and the back houses do stand to one another in the relation of back-to-back houses.

Now, we have it from the Dean of Guild,—to whose practical knowledge and experience we should, of course, pay the greatest deference,—that his Court "considered what was the principal objection intended to be struck at by the 43rd section of the Housing Act of 1909, and they were unanimously of opinion that it was defective ventilation." That is matter of legal construction. But he goes on to say: "They further considered that the system of having four houses on each floor as proposed in the present plans is objectionable from the point of view of ventilation, because proper ventilation cannot be obtained merely by means of the well of a staircase like that in the plans before the Court." Now, it seems to me that is just the main objection which section 43 of the new Act had in view when it prohibited back-to-back houses. I therefore feel less difficulty in differing from the Dean of Guild's conclusion about the matter, because we have it from himself that the system of ventilation shown in the plan is objectionable; and I think, when one takes that objection and reads section 43 in the light of it, one must reasonably conclude, without attempting any general definition of the phrase, that the proposed buildings are back-to-back houses within the meaning of the section.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the further objection stated by the Town, which is founded upon their own Municipal Acts—section 49 of the Act of 1891 as amended by section 80 of the Act of 1900,—and I prefer to offer no opinion as to the manner in which that objection was dealt with in the Dean of Guild Court. I propose that we should recall the deliverance of the Dean of Guild and remit to him to refuse the warrant asked.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. There is no interpretation clause in the statute defining what are back-to-back tenements. I assume from the absence of such a clause that there is no technical meaning attached to the phrase; and, that being so, we must apply our own minds to the question whether the tenements for which a warrant is asked are, in an ordinary and reasonable sense of the term, back-to-back tenements. If they are, then we must, following the Act of Parliament, exercise our jurisdiction over the Dean of Guild Court to prevent it granting a lining for buildings which the Act of Parliament has, in the public interest, declared to be illegal. That is, to my mind, a quite sufficient ground of judgment in this case. I do not find it necessary to express an opinion in regard to the other matter to which your Lordship has referred.

Dec. 2, 1911.
Murrayfield

v. Magistrates
of Edinburgh.
Lord Salvesen.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the Dean of Guild states the question correctly when he says that it is whether these houses are back-to-back houses within the meaning of section 43 of the Act of 1909. It is quite clear from the first proviso that the object of the Act was to secure effective ventilation of the habitable rooms in every tenement. Back-to-back houses, if one may attempt a definition, are houses facing opposite ways and with one common back wall. I am not prepared to say that there might not be houses which would correspond to that definition but which still would not be back-to-back houses within the meaning of section 43. Mr Robertson suggested that you might have back-to-back houses with ventilating flues going from front to back, which would be perfectly sufficient for securing the effective ventilation of the habitable rooms in every tenement; and if the Dean of Guild were to be of opinion that houses constructed as proposed here, but providing for through ventilation by means of such flues, secured effective ventilation, and if this were certified by the medical officer of health, then it might be that such houses would fall under proviso (a) of the section, and not within the prohibition of back-to-back houses in the leading portion of the section. That is excluded here, because the medical officer of health has refused to certify the houses, and the Dean of Guild has found that they have no through ventilation at all, the attempt to provide any through ventilation by means of the well of the staircase being quite insufficient. I therefore concur in the judgment proposed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . Sustain the appeal, and recall the said interlocutor appealed against; sustain the first branch of the plea in law for the respondents; remit to the said Dean of Guild to refuse a lining to the petitioners for the erection of the proposed four tenements of three storeys each at Piersfield, all as shown on the plans lodged in process, and decern."

DEAS & Co., W.S.—SIR THOMAS HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 36. GEORGE WILLIAM SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Clure, K.C.—Normand.

Dec. 5, 1911. JAMES WALKER, Defender (Reclaimer).—G. Watt, K.C.—D. Anderson.
 Smith v. Walker. Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Failure to aver facts and circumstances supporting innuendo.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer founded on a sentence taken from a letter written by the defender, and innuendoeed it as charging him with a fraudulent attempt to obtain money. He maintained that he could prove facts and circumstances which would substantiate this innuendo, but in his record he did not state what these facts and circumstances were, nor did he quote any part of the letter except the single sentence complained of.

The Court refused an issue on the ground (1) that the sentence complained of was not prima facie slanderous, and (2) that the pursuer was not entitled to an opportunity of proving facts and circumstances which would give to that sentence a slanderous meaning without specifically averring them, and without producing the rest of the letter in which the sentence occurred.

1ST DIVISION. ON 17th August 1911 George William Smith, a turf commission-
 Lord Cullen. agent in Leeds, carrying on business under the name of George Drake, brought an action of damages for slander against James Walker, a licensed publican in Aberdeen.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 2) “On or about 2nd June 1911 the defender was introduced personally to the pursuer by Robert Evans, turf commission-agent, at Epsom races, where the pursuer was carrying on business under his trade name. The said introduction was for the purpose of enabling the defender to bet with the pursuer on credit, and the pursuer relying on the recommendation of the said Robert Evans, did enter into certain betting transactions on credit with the defender, as a result of which the defender became indebted to the pursuer to the amount of £95. The pursuer subsequently rendered to the defender an account for the said transactions, a copy of which is herewith produced and referred to.” (Cond. 3) “In a letter dated 12th June 1911, and addressed and sent to the said Robert Evans, the defender wrote, ‘As regards your friends Lee & Drake, neither of whom I have had the distinguished, I may say the very distinguished, pleasure of meeting, and as I always bet with the ready only on the racecourse, I think it rather out of place for them to send alleged accounts to me.’” (Cond. 4) “The said statements in the said letter, written and sent by the said James Walker to the said Robert Evans, were written of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, malicious, and calumnious. By said statements the said James Walker represented, and intended to represent, that the pursuer, though well knowing that no betting transactions had ever taken place between him and the defender, had attempted to obtain money by fraudulently presenting to the defender accounts showing a balance due by the defender on certain betting transactions. Further, the said statements represented and were intended to represent that the pursuer, having received full and final payment in ready money from the defender of all sums due to him in respect of any transactions between them, relying on the absence of any receipt, was endeavouring fraudulently to obtain a second payment from the defender in respect of the same transactions. The said statements were calculated to injure, and did injure, the pursuer in his professional reputation, and being published Dec. 5, 1911. to a third party, are defamatory according to the law of England."

The defender admitted that the letter complained of was written by him to Evans, but denied his alleged indebtedness to the pursuer, and averred in answer:—"The defender never had any transaction with the pursuer. He is not aware of ever having met him, and does not know him." Smith v.
Walker.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The defender not having slandered the pursuer is entitled to absolvitor.

On 15th November 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether on or about 12th June 1911, the defender did write and send to Robert Evans a letter containing the following words, viz.:—"As regards your friends Lee & Drake, neither of whom I have had the distinguished, I may say the very distinguished, pleasure of meeting, and as I always bet with the ready only on the racecourse, I think it rather out of place for them to send alleged accounts to me," and whether the whole or any part of the said words are of and concerning the pursuer, and were meant and intended to represent, and did falsely and calumniously and injuriously represent, that the pursuer was attempting to obtain money from the defender by presenting fraudulent accounts to him showing sums due by the defender on alleged betting transactions between the pursuer and the defender, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Ormidale) on 5th December 1911.

Argued for the reclamer;—Without putting an unreasonable and strained interpretation on the sentence of the letter complained of it could not be regarded as doing more than denying that the alleged accounts were due. Such a denial was not slanderous, and therefore the words complained of contained no issuable matter. The issue allowed in the case of *Blasquez v. Lothians Racing Club and Reid*¹ was distinguishable from the issue in the present case, because the issue here sought depended upon an innuendo which the words complained of would not bear.

Argued for the respondent;—The slanderous meaning which the words complained of bore had been distinctly stated, and it was not necessary that extrinsic facts should be averred from which that meaning was to be inferred.² The language of the letter was not unambiguously innocent, and it was a question for a jury to consider, in the light of facts and circumstances which would be proved, whether it bore the innuendo that the pursuer put upon it.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of George William Smith, a turf commission-agent, against James Walker, a licensed publican carrying on business in Aberdeen. The pursuer sets forth that he is a turf commission-agent—which, in common parlance, is a bookmaker—and that

Dec. 5, 1911. he carries on business under the name of George Drake. He then sets forth
Smith v. that on a certain date in June 1911 the defender was introduced personally Walker. to him by Robert Evans, another turf commission-agent, at the Epsom races, Ld. President. and he says that he entered into certain betting transactions on credit with the defender. The defender denies that betting transactions were entered into, but of course at this moment we must take it that the pursuer's statement is correct. Then in the next condescendence the pursuer says: "In a letter dated 12th June 1911, and addressed and sent to the said Robert Evans, the defender wrote"—he does not quote the whole letter, but he simply takes this quotation—"‘as regards your friends Lee & Drake, neither of whom I have had the distinguished, I may say the very distinguished, pleasure of meeting, and as I always bet with the ready only on the racecourse, I think it rather out of place for them to send alleged accounts to me.’" The letter is admitted to have been transmitted. Upon that the pursuer raises an action of damages for slander against the defender, and an issue has been granted by the Lord Ordinary which runs thus—[His Lordship quoted the issue].

I am of opinion that that issue ought not to be granted. The law upon this matter is, I think, perfectly well settled, and I might quote many cases in which it has been laid down, but I will take one in the House of Lords.
It is an English case, but in this matter there is no distinction between the law of England and the law of Scotland, and the words I take are those of Lord Selborne, the Lord Chancellor, in the case of the Capital and Counties Bank
v. Henty.¹ Lord Selborne says there: "In Sturt v. Blagg,² Wilde, C. J., said: 'It is the duty of the Judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by an innuendo: but, when the Judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has the meaning so ascribed to it.'" There the quotation ends, and Lord Selborne proceeds in his own words: "If the Judge, taking into account the manner and the occasion of the publication and all other facts which are properly in evidence, is not satisfied that the words are capable of the meaning ascribed to them, then it is not his duty to leave the question raised by the innuendo to the jury." And then he goes on, in a sentence I need not quote, to say that there must be something which, to a reasonable mind, would suggest the innuendo. It therefore always comes to be this, if the words are not slandrous in themselves, and an innuendo is suggested, does the Court think that the words are reasonably capable of sustaining that innuendo?

I am of opinion here that the words are not reasonably capable of sustaining the innuendo. I think when you say, "I am a person who always bets in ready money, and therefore it is absurd for anyone to send me accounts for an alleged debt," you show, of course, perfectly clearly that you repudiate the idea of owing anything; but you do not seem to me to say anything which can be reasonably construed into an averment that the attempt to say that you did owe something was a fraudulent attempt.

Now, I think that as the argument developed, Mr M'Clure was driven to admit that, if you take the mere words as they stand, that view is correct.

² (1847) 10 Q. B. (Adolphus & Ellis), 906, at p. 908.

But his argument was this. He said: "If I am allowed to prove all the surrounding circumstances of these people, I shall show that it was not unreasonable to take this meaning out of the words, and I cannot do this unless I have the opportunity of submitting the circumstances to a jury." I do not doubt that Mr M'Clure, so far, was perfectly right; that is to say, that you may, by bringing in extraneous facts and circumstances, give a point to words which without these extraneous facts and circumstances they would not bear, but which in the light of these extraneous facts and circumstances they may bear.

Dec. 5, 1911.
Smith v.
Walker.

Ld. President.

But then I think the facts and circumstances must be there. In other words, going back again to Lord Selborne, it is "taking into account the manner and the occasion of the publication and all other facts which are properly in evidence." I need not remind your Lordships that, of course, the English method of jury trial is different from ours. There is no issue. Demurrer in such cases is unknown. The case goes to trial, and the question that we are now trying is not tried, as here, upon a question of granting an issue, but is tried and concluded at the trial itself; and it resolves itself into a consideration by the presiding Judge whether he shall take away the case from the jury or not, that is to say, whether he shall say to the jury, "Well, now, gentlemen, consider if these words reasonably can bear the innuendo," or whether he shall say to the jury, "I tell you that, inasmuch as I am of opinion that the words will not reasonably bear the innuendo, there is nothing more for you to do except to return a verdict for the defendant." Now, applying that to our practice, we have got to do that at the stage of approving the issue. And, accordingly, if you translate Lord Selborne's words "taking into account the manner and the occasion of the publication and all other facts which are properly in evidence" into words which exactly fit our practice, you must substitute for the words "properly in evidence" the words "which are properly averred on record."

Now, when I come to the record, I find no averment of that sort; there is a mere naked averment. And I also find this—that even the whole letter is not put forward. It might have been possible to put a colour upon the words from the position that this sentence occupied in the letter. If I may use the expression—colloquial, perhaps, more than literary—if a thing is brought in by the head and the heels, it is of course very much easier to show that it has a sinister meaning than if it comes in its place in the context in the natural course of the letter. If I might be permitted to make a guess about this quotation, it looks like an answer to something said before, but that, of course, I cannot tell. If, however, there was colour to be got from the facts and circumstances, the pursuer ought to have set them forth. Instead of doing that, he takes out of the letter this little sentence, harmless in itself, and says: "If you will allow me to prove all I want to prove, I think I can show it has a sinister meaning." In my opinion he cannot be allowed to do that, and I think the innuendo cannot reasonably be taken out of the words as they stand.

My view, accordingly, is that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and that the action should be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the words

Dec. 5, 1911. Smith v. Walker.
 Lord Kinnear. complained of will not reasonably bear the meaning the pursuer puts upon them. He takes a single sentence out of a letter, and upon the words of that sentence he alleges that he has a good action for slander. The sentence taken by itself seems to me to come to no more than a rather more peremptory version of what the defender says in stating his position upon record, because the pursuer begins by alleging that he had a transaction with the defender as the result of which the defender became indebted to him to the amount of £95, and the answer is that the defender never had any transaction with the pursuer; he is not aware of ever having met him, he does not know him, and he denies that the account is due. Now, if there is ground for that defence, it is a perfectly relevant statement which a man is entitled to make when he is asked for money that he denies to be due.

I think it very possible that words, in themselves apparently innocent, may be shown to have a slanderous meaning when they are read with reference to the circumstances in which they were uttered or written, or with reference to the context in which they occur. But then, if the pursuer intends to make a case to justify an innuendo upon these grounds, he is bound relevantly to allege the circumstances which he says tend to show the meaning of the words complained of; and above all, he is bound to produce the whole document out of which he has chosen to pick a single sentence to form the subject of this complaint. I think there is no relevant averment here of any fact which would enable a jury to put a different meaning upon the words than the innocent meaning which they naturally bear; and, if the pursuer intended to make a complaint of slander from the use of language in one sentence of a letter, he was bound to give us the context in which it occurred as well as the particular sentence of which he complained. I therefore agree with your Lordship that there should be no issue.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the action.

GEORGE DALZIEL AND OTHERS (Mitchell Innes' Trustees), First Parties.—Macphail, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.
 ISABELLA MITCHELL INNES AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—
Blackburn, K.C.—Pitman.

Process—Special case—Competency—No real contention between the parties—Trust—Power to sell.

A special case, to which the parties were the trustees on a trust-estate and the beneficiaries interested in the estate, was brought to determine a question as to the trustees' power to sell certain heritable subjects, the trustees maintaining that they had no such power, the other parties maintaining that they had. All the parties, however, were agreed that a sale would be expedient.

The Court, following Galloway v. Campbell's Trustees, (1905) 7 F. 931, held that, although there was no real contention between the parties, the special case was competent; and answered the question.

ON 25th May 1911 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court on a question as to the power of the trustees of the late Thomas Shairp Mitchell Innes to sell the estate of Phantassie. Dec. 8, 1911.
Mitchell
Innes'
Trustees v.
Mitchell
Innes.

The first parties to the case were the trustees, and the second parties were all the beneficiaries interested in the trust-estate.

The case stated as follows:—"The first parties are satisfied that it would be in the best interests of the trust-estate to sell the estate of Phantassie, and the second parties are desirous that the first parties should do so. A question, however, has arisen as to whether the power of sale conferred by the trust-disposition and settlement extends to the estate of Phantassie, and the first parties are not prepared to sell without having the matter judicially determined; further, it is necessary to have this judicially determined in order to satisfy intending purchasers, and to enable the first parties to afford an unquestionable title to a purchaser. 1st Division.

"The first parties maintain that the general power of sale conferred on them by the trust-disposition and settlement does not extend to the estate of Phantassie, which is otherwise specifically dealt with throughout the deed. The second parties maintain that the power of sale conferred on the first parties extends to the whole trust-estate, including the estate of Phantassie, which was the only heritable estate left by the truster."

The question of law was:—"Are the first parties entitled, under the powers of sale conferred by the trust-disposition and settlement of the said Thomas Shairp Mitchell Innes, to sell the estate of Phantassie? or, otherwise, Are they entitled to do so with the consent of the beneficiaries?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 8th December 1911, when *Galloway v. Campbell's Trustees*¹ was referred to as an instance of similar circumstances in which the Court had answered such a question in a special case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case, had it not been for the decision in Galloway v. Campbell's Trustees,¹ I should have had great doubt whether the question stated here could be competently raised in a special case, because parties are agreed as to the expediency of the sale, and there is no proper contention between them. But *Galloway v. Campbell's Trustees*¹ is a direct precedent, and I am prepared to follow it. On the merits I have no doubt whatever that the trustees have power to sell.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, but should like to add that though I think we must follow *Galloway v. Campbell's Trustees*¹ in this case, I still think that the Court must always be cautious in entertaining cases of this kind where there is no real litigation because, if any conflict of interest should arise hereafter of which we know nothing at present, our answer to this question will not be res judicata, and yet may embarrass the decision of a real question of disputed right. If, therefore, it seemed probable that a purchaser might object to the title, I would be against entertaining the question now. But, looking at the whole case, I agree with your Lordship that that is hardly a practical difficulty, because if a purchaser, which is

Dec. 8, 1911. hardly probable, should take objection, it would still be open to him to bring the question before the Court.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the case in the affirmative of its first alternative.

Sheriff—Process—Defences—Documents challengeable ope exceptionis—“Deed or writing”—Decree of Court—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), First Schedule, Rule 50.

Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, enacts:—“When a deed or writing is founded on by any party in a cause, all objections thereto may be stated and maintained by way of exception, without the necessity of bringing a reduction thereof.”

Held that a decree of Court pronounced in foro was not a deed or writing in the sense of this rule, and could not be objected to ope exceptionis in a Sheriff Court action.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Furthcoming—Arrestee subject to the jurisdiction—Whether jurisdiction must be founded against common debtor—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 6, subsec. (g).

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, enacts, section 6:—“Any action competent in the Sheriff Court may be brought within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff . . . (g) where in an action of furthcoming or multiplepoinding the fund or subject in medio is situated within the jurisdiction; or the arrestee or holder of the fund is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court.”

Held, in construing this section, that an action of furthcoming may competently proceed in the Sheriff Court if the arrestee is subject to the jurisdiction, without the necessity of founding jurisdiction against the common debtor.

Observations as to the necessity of intimating to the common debtor that decree of furthcoming is being asked for.

1ST DIVISION. IN August 1910 an action of furthcoming was brought in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by Leggat Brothers, printers there, against George Gray, a music-hall performer, residing in London, and Moss' Empires, Limited, a company having a place of business in Glasgow. Gray, the common debtor, held certain shares in that company which had been arrested by the pursuers, and the pursuers now sought to make these available in satisfaction of a debt due to them by Gray.

Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

Defences were lodged by Gray, but Moss' Empires did not appear to defend the action.

The pursuers' averments, and the defender Gray's answers thereto, were as follows:—(Cond. 2) “The defender George Gray, by letter dated 1st December 1905, guaranteed to the pursuers a printing account by Richard Murray and Charles Mussett, sometime carrying on business as ‘Events Publishing Company’ in Glasgow.” (Cond. 3) “The defender George Gray, though called upon to make payment, under said guarantee, to the pursuers, failed to do so, and on 15th Dec. 9, 1911. June and 4th July [1910] the pursuers obtained a decree in foro in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against the said George ^{Leggat} Gray for the sum of £125 sterling of principal, with interest thereon ^{Brothers v.} Gray. from 19th January 1910, and £20, 0s. 11d. of expenses. The extract decree is herewith produced." (Ans. 2 and 3) "Believed to be true that the pursuers raised an action against the defender George Gray in this Court. At the time said action was raised, and during the dependence thereof, there was no jurisdiction to entertain it. No such action was served upon him, and he gave no instructions to any one to defend such an action. The said decree is inept, irregular, and illegal, and the said decree does not constitute any debt against this defender. It is referred to for its terms, beyond which no admission is made. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 4) "On the dependence of said action the pursuers, on 18th February 1910, used arrestments in the hands of the defenders Moss' Empires, Limited. The execution of said arrestment is herewith produced." (Ans. 4) "The execution of arrestment is referred to for its terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained that the said arrestments are inept, invalid, and illegal, in respect that they were used against a foreigner without jurisdiction having been constituted against him. Explained that the defender was not aware of said arrestment until the present action was raised, no notice of these or of any arrestments having been made to him." (Cond. 5) "Said arrestment attached, in the hands of Moss' Empires, Limited, 145 Preference Shares, as enumerated in the prayer of the petition, and 100 Ordinary Shares, as also enumerated in the prayer of the petition. The said shares belong to the defender George Gray, and are registered in his full name of George Herbert Gray." In answer to cond. 5 the defender denied that the shares alleged to have been arrested were his property, and averred that they belonged to the trustee under his marriage-contract.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No relevant defence. (4) The defender George Gray being indebted to the pursuers in the sums mentioned in the condescendence, and the said shares having been duly attached by arrestment, warrant to sell and apply the proceeds as craved, and authority to register, should be granted, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The action is irrelevant. (4) No jurisdiction in the action of constitution or in the action of furthcoming following upon it. (5) Said arrestments being inept, invalid, and illegal, in respect that they were used on the dependence of an action against a foreigner without jurisdiction having been constituted against him, the action should be dismissed. (6) Said arrestments being inept, invalid, and illegal, in respect of no service, either of the action of constitution or of warrant to arrest, the action should be dismissed.

On 16th November 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) repelled the first plea for the defender, and sustained the pursuer's first plea, and, without meanwhile pronouncing any operative decree, granted leave to appeal.*

* "NOTE.—Strictly speaking, as I have sustained pursuers' plea to the relevancy of the defence, I should remit to a stockbroker to sell the shares, but that would not be an appealable interlocutor, and it would be obviously useless to consider the competency or the relevancy of the defence if the

Dec. 9, 1911.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

The defender Gray appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division on 26th October 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—Even if the appellant had been rendered subject to the jurisdiction in the action of constitution by personal service while within the jurisdiction, and consequently the arrestments on the dependence of that action had been competently laid on, still they did not avail to found jurisdiction against the appellant in the present action of furthcoming, because a furthcoming was a new proceeding, and it was indispensable that the common debtor should be competently cited in such a process.¹ Section 6, subsection (g), of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, as was clear when it was read along with Rule 128 of the First Schedule, operated only to regulate proceedings as between one Sheriff Court and another, and did not alter the former law,² so as to render a foreigner subject to the jurisdiction.

shares have been sold. Both parties accordingly request that I should at present pronounce only upon the first plea stated for each party, and grant leave to appeal.

“I have no hesitation at all in repelling the defender’s first plea. The action is an action of furthcoming following upon a decree of this Court, the extract of which is No. 7/1 of process. If the decree is to stand, the validity of the execution of arrestment is not challenged. The only ground for the plea of incompetency is that jurisdiction was not founded in the action in which decree has been granted. In other words, the defender now wants to get behind the decree No. 7/1 of process. That he cannot competently do in this Court, either in the present process or any other. A decree of Court cannot be reduced by exception, for it is not a deed or writing in the sense of Rule 50 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907. A direct action of reduction not being competent in the Sheriff Court, the only notice which I could take here of the defender’s first and fourth pleas would be to sist this process to await the issue of an action in the Court of Session to reduce the decree No. 7/1 of process.

“The defender, however, does not ask the process to be sisted, but wants to challenge the decree in this Court, and that, in my opinion, is clearly incompetent.

“I have a little more hesitation in sustaining the pursuers’ first plea, because, however absurd it may appear to regard the letter of No. 10/1 of process as a marriage-settlement, it is quite possible that, according to the law of England, that document might be a foundation for the more formal deed, No. 9/1 of process, and the two together may, for all I know, constitute a marriage-settlement. But there is one aspect of the matter which seems to me to render it unnecessary to consider at all the effect of this document. Assuming for the moment that the antenuptial settlement, No. 9/1 of process, can be put into competition with a creditor’s diligence, and assuming—which is a large assumption—that the single word ‘shares’ includes the shares referred to in this action, which admittedly the common debtor did not acquire till years after the date of the settlement, it is agreed at the bar that the shares now in question never were transferred to the trustee under the marriage-settlement, and I think it is perfectly obvious that nothing short of a completed title on the part of the marriage-contract trustee can be pleaded in competition with a creditor’s diligence. I think that the defender’s averments, even taking the very best view of them, are not a relevant answer to the pursuers’ claim to have their ex facie valid arrestment, following upon an ex facie valid decree, allowed its usual operative effect.”

The case of *Burns v. Monro*¹ did not relate to proceedings in the Sheriff Court. If, however, the appellant was held to be subject to the jurisdiction, it would be necessary to remit to the Sheriff to allow proof as to whether the shares arrested were in fact his property. Dec. 9, 1911.
Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

Argued for the respondents ;—A decree of Court was not a “deed or writing” in the sense of Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Act of 1907, and the appellant’s objection on record to the decree founded upon could not be competently maintained in this process. In any event, jurisdiction had been competently established in the action of constitution by personal service within the jurisdiction. The case of *Wightman v. Wilson*² had been superseded, because it was not now necessary that the common debtor should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in which an action of furthcoming was raised.³ That case and the case of *Burn v. Purvis*⁴ had been reconsidered.⁵ Shares belonging to the defender having been validly arrested, no further arrestment was necessary to found the present action of furthcoming,⁶ and the arrestees being subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in Glasgow, the action had been competently brought in that Court.⁷

At advising on 9th December 1911,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of furthcoming, raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, in which Leggat Brothers, who are the holders of a decree against George Gray, seek to have certain shares made furthcoming which stand in his name, and which they have arrested in the hands of Moss’ Empires, Limited, a company admittedly subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in Glasgow, and having a place of business there. The decree which the pursuers aver is evidenced by an extract decree for payment obtained in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on 4th July 1910, in causa Leggat Brothers v. George Gray. The defender in that action, the common debtor, has appeared in this furthcoming, and pleads on three grounds that no decree should be granted.

His first ground is that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in Glasgow, and that the decree of 4th July 1910 is inept. The answer to that is that the extract decree, beyond which in this case we cannot go, shows on the face of it that it is a decree in foro, and I think it is quite clear that Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, does not apply. By that rule it is enacted :—“When a deed or writing is founded on by any party in a cause, all objections thereto may be stated and maintained by way of exception, without the necessity of bringing a reduction thereof.” I am clearly of opinion that a decree of Court is not a “deed or writing” in the sense of that rule, and so long as the decree is not reduced, it is beyond our competency to consider whether it was rightly granted or not.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

Ld. President.

The second objection is that no steps were taken by arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa in this action of furthcoming. The arrestments which are the foundation of the furthcoming were executed on the dependence of the action in which we have an extract decree in foro. Whatever may have been the law in the cases quoted, this point seems to me to be settled by the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, which enacts, section 6 :—"Any action competent in the Sheriff Court may be brought within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff . . . (g) where in an action of furthcoming or multiplepoinding the fund or subject in medio is situated within the jurisdiction ; or the arrestee or holder of the fund is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court." In this case the arrestees, Moss' Empires, Limited, are admittedly within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court at Glasgow. Accordingly, I think that the second objection is settled by the statute. I only add that, that being so, I do not make any pronouncement as to what mode of intimation would be necessary to give the common debtor a fair chance of being heard, especially in a case where the decree on which the arrestments are used was a decree in absence. That question is obviously of no moment in this case, because the common debtor has had sufficient intimation to make him appear, and therefore he cannot be heard to complain of want of notice. I only say this by way of precaution, because I think the Sheriff Courts Act makes it unnecessary to found jurisdiction against the common debtor, and, if the decree which the pursuers hold had been a decree in absence, it would have been necessary to see that the common debtor had got fair notice that his property was being taken in execution.

The only other matter is that of the supposed transference of the shares in question by an alleged marriage-contract. I think the Sheriff-substitute has satisfactorily dealt with that matter. Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I think the appeal should be refused.

LORD JOHNSTON'S opinion, which, in his Lordship's absence, was read by the Lord President, was as follows :—[After referring to a previous action between the same parties]—Having now discovered that there are shares in Moss' Empires registered in the common debtor's name, the pursuers have raised another action against him, this time in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, but without, so far as appears—and this, in the absence of any assertion by the pursuers to the contrary, I assume is the fact—arresting to found jurisdiction, and have obtained decree. This decree for £125, with £20, 0s. 11d. of expenses, is undoubtedly one in foro—though again this is not directly stated, nor are we told how the defender was cited. I say undoubtedly, for the extract does not bear that the decree was in absence, as I think it would if that had been the case, but more particularly because the expenses are not those of a Sheriff Court decree in absence. On the dependence of this action the pursuers have arrested certain shares, and raise this action to have the shares made furthcoming to satisfy their debt. It is not alleged that the common debtor had any domicile or was personally in Scotland when the furthcoming was brought. And he now pleads that it is incompetent. This he rests, I understand, on two grounds—first, that there was no jurisdiction in the action on dependence of which the arrestments were used. He further avers that he gave no authority for a defence to be lodged in his name. So long as the decree stands, being a decree in foro, neither of these objections to it can, I think, be listened to, even in the Sheriff Court (Act 1907, Rule 50), ope exceptionis and without reduction of the decree. In so deciding, I confine myself to the case before the Court of a decree in foro, and reserve my opinion as to how this case would have been decided had the decree here been one in absence, in case any distinction can be drawn. Second, the common debtor maintains that the furthcoming itself was not preceded by arrestment to found jurisdiction. This plea is, I think, directly met by the decision in Burns v. Monro.¹ Given that a good decree has been pronounced against a defender, and for the purposes of the present judgment this must be assumed, nothing more is wanted to make effectual the diligence done on it than that the arrestee should be subject to the jurisdiction, the common debtor being merely called for his interest. The authority of Wightman v. Wilson,² which at first sight would seem to support the common debtor's contention, has been displaced by the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, section 6.

I am therefore for adhering on this branch of the case.

But the common debtor maintains further that there was nothing to attach. Here also I agree with the Sheriff, and for the reasons given by him.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitted to him to proceed.

Lease—Outgoing—Valuation of sheep stock—Arbitration—Basis of valuation.

Williamson v. Stewart.

A lease of a farm provided that the tenant should, at the end of the lease, leave the sheep stock on the farm to the proprietor or incoming tenant at a valuation to be fixed by arbitration. In a case stated under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, with regard to the basis of valuation to be adopted by the arbiter, held that it is the duty of the arbiter to value the sheep upon the basis of their value to an occupant of the farm in view of the arbiter's estimate of the return to be realised by such occupant from them, in accordance with the course of prudent management, in lambs, wool, and price when ultimately sold; and not upon the basis either (1) of market value only, or (2) of the cost and loss which would be involved in the re-stocking of the farm with a like stock if the present sheep stock were removed. Held further that the arbiter is entitled to take into account both current market prices and the special qualities of the sheep, both in themselves and in their relation to the ground, which in his opinion will tend either to enhance or to diminish the return to be realised from them by an occupant of the farm.

Observations, per curiam, on the valuing of the stock as part of the farm as a going business, and on the consideration to be given to acclimatisation.

Williamson v.
Stewart.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perthshire.

On 27th March 1908 a case was stated to the Sheriff of Perthshire under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, by Peter M'Intyre, arbiter in a reference under that Act between Colonel Williamson of Lawers and John Stewart, formerly a tenant of Colonel Williamson of the farm of Fordie, to fix the value of the sheep stock left upon that farm to the proprietor, in terms of a lease between the parties which had terminated at Whitsunday 1909, when the tenant removed from the farm.

Shortly before the removal of Stewart from the farm a litigation was entered into between the parties as to the procedure to be followed with regard to the valuation. As the result of this litigation the House of Lords decided, on 29th April 1910 (affirming the judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session)¹ that the value of the sheep stock fell to be determined by a single arbiter in accordance with the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908. Thereafter the present arbitration was instituted.

The farm of Fordie was let by Colonel Williamson to Stewart by a lease dated 24th May and 19th June 1869, by which the tenant bound himself, inter alia, "To take over and pay for the whole stock of sheep on the farm according to the valuation of neutral men to be mutually chosen, with power to name an oversman, and at the expiry of this lease to leave the sheep stock to the proprietor or incoming tenant, according to the valuation of neutral men mutually chosen, with power to name an oversman, but the proprietor or incoming tenant shall not be bound to take a larger amount of stock than the tenant has been in the usual practice of keeping on the farm during this lease." In terms of this provision, Stewart took over the whole stock of sheep on the farm at his entry according to the valuation of two neutral men and an oversman, and the valuation, as was admitted by the parties, was made according to "use and wont."

On the expiry of this lease in 1884 the parties entered into a new lease, to terminate in 1894, which contained no provision for the taking over of the sheep stock at its beginning, Stewart being the tenant in possession owning the stock. The provision of this lease regarding the sheep stock at the tenant's waygoing was in similar terms to that in the previous lease, being as follows:—"And the said John Stewart hereby binds and obliges himself at the expiry of this lease to leave the sheep stock on the farm to the proprietors or incoming tenant, according to the valuation of men mutually chosen, with power to name an oversman, but the proprietors or incoming tenant shall not be bound to take a larger amount of stock than the tenant has been in the usual practice of keeping on the farm during this lease."

After the expiry of this lease in 1894, and until Whitsunday 1904, Stewart possessed the farm from year to year by tacit relocation. His tenancy was continued for a further period of five years from that date under a missive-letter which provided that the conditions of tenancy should be the same as those contained in the formal lease which expired in 1894.

The arbiter was appointed in September 1910 and met the parties' agents, when certain questions arose, and on 27th September 1910 the Dec. 9, 1911.

landlord applied to the Sheriff of Perthshire (Johnston), in terms of Rule IX. of the Second Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, for a direction to the arbiter to state a case on certain questions of law. Williamson v. Stewart.

By interlocutor, dated 22nd October 1911, the Sheriff directed the arbiter to state a case, and in obedience to that order the present case was stated.

The contentions of the parties and the questions raised were set forth in the case in these terms:—

“The contentions of the said Colonel David Robertson Williamson are as follows:—

“(1) That on a sound construction of the lease, the said sheep stock falls to be valued at market value, i.e., the price or exchangeable value which it would bring if exposed for sale unconditionally to the test of competition in the open market. And, in any event, that no alleged practice or custom having the force of law with regard to the basis of valuation to be adopted, can be read into the lease to the effect of adding anything to the price to be ascertained as aforesaid.

“(2) That if the valuation is not restricted to market value, as above contended for, then the basis on which the valuation is to proceed is to allow only such sum in excess of market value as an incoming tenant would be prepared to give if he were buying the same stock in the market to bring it back to the farm.

“(3) That the portion of the sheep stock, which in the ordinary course of management of the farm fell to be sold in the market in the autumn of 1909, should, in any event, be separately valued at market value only.

“The contentions of the said John Stewart are as follows:—

“(1) [This contention was abandoned.]

“(2) That the contract of submission is perfect and intelligible and was settled and acted on by the parties as being so, and the said Colonel Williamson is under personal exception against repudiating the distinctness of his own contract, and the construction he gave to it when he accepted Mr Stewart's performance of the antecedent obligation as to taking over the sheep stock at Mr Stewart's entry to the farm.

“(3) That the arbiter is the sole judge of the various elements of value that fall to be considered in executing the reference; and “(4) That the word ‘valuation’ is used in its plain, ordinary, and popular acceptance, and there can be no reasonable doubt of the meaning of the submission. Its popular meaning accords with the practice or usage of sheep farming in the district, including Colonel Williamson's estate and throughout the Highlands of Scotland—a practice which is so long established, uniform, and notorious that judicial cognisance has been taken of it, and both of the parties here contracted with it in view, namely, that the arbiter, who is chosen for his technical knowledge and local knowledge, shall apply these in determining the value upon a consideration of all the elements which in his judgment go to constitute, enhance, or diminish the value at a specified time of the sheep stock of a particular farm to the tenant of that farm. The quarrel of Colonel Williamson is with the arbiter's mode of ascertaining the quantum of value—a matter which the parties have committed entirely to the arbiter, and into which Courts of law have no jurisdiction to inquire. In leases of sheep farms throughout Scotland the words 'to value' or 'valuation' have been used and understood as contended for by Mr Stewart, and qualification or limitation of the elements of value when intended is wont to be expressed in the submission. Examples of the different clauses are given in the Juridical Styles, (1907) vol. 1, at pages 434 and 449. Here the word 'valuation' was used without qualification, and the limited construction, for which Colonel Williamson contends, is inadmissible. Colonel Williamson, in his first contention, seeks to insert a limitation by adjecting 'market' to 'value.' On the other contentions he seeks to qualify the obligation in other illegitimate ways. It is enough that the lease provides that the sheep stock of the farm are to be left there, and that the value to be determined is the value to the proprietor or incoming tenant of that farm. As to the element of 'acclimatisation,' the stipulation that the sheep should go with the land was made in the interests of both parties, because (1) the land cannot be profitably used except for sheep farming; (2) the process of acclimatising a stock is long and costly, for, even under the most favourable conditions, some years must pass before the death-rate and birth-rate respectively will attain normal proportions in a new stock; and (3) at Whitsunday, which was here (as usual) the term of entry and outgoing, removal of the stock from the farm is impracticable, because the ewes are then in low condition after lambing, and lambs are only from six weeks to a few days old—indeed, removal of hill sheep to a public or auction market at Whitsunday is almost unknown. In stipulating that the land and stock should be held together as a going concern, the parties necessarily intended that, at the changes of tenancy contemplated under the contract, the stock should be valued as part of a going concern. The provisions for valuation of the stock at Mr Stewart's entry and outgoing were identical, and he claims that as it was valued at his entry, so it should be valued at his outgoing.

" Observations by arbiter.—The arbiter only desires to add, for the information of the Court and of his own knowledge, that generally the valuations of sheep stock as between an outgoing tenant and the proprietor, or an ingoing tenant, in Perthshire and many other parts of Scotland, where the stock is bound to the farm (i.e., by a clause such as that in the lease in question), have, according to a recognised and well-established custom, been invariably conducted on the principle, which is termed 'use and wont,' of putting an acclimatised or hefting value upon the regular sheep stock beyond the value which they would have if removed from and sold off the land, because they have a higher value to the proprietor or incoming tenant who is to continue to hold them on the farm. The reason for such higher value being placed on the stock is that sheep bred and retained on the land are known to settle, live, and thrive much better than strange sheep brought on to the same ground. The result is that such sheep are less liable to a heavy death-rate, while at same time they are less expensive to herd, as they seldom stray from their own ground.

" The questions of law submitted for the opinion of the Court are:—(1) Is the arbiter sole judge of the principle of valuation and of the various elements of value that fall to be considered by him in executing the reference? (2) Or otherwise, upon what principle of valuation, on a sound construction of the lease, is the arbiter bound to proceed in making his valuation of said sheep stock and executing the reference?"

On 25th May 1911 the Sheriff (Johnston) pronounced an inter-locutor in which he found in law, in answer to the questions stated by the arbiter :—“(1) The judgment of the arbiter upon these matters is subject to the finding of the Court upon any matter which the Court holds to be matter of law; (2) it is the duty of the arbiter to value the sheep upon the basis of their value to an occupant of the farm in view of the arbiter's estimate of the return to be realised by such occupant from them in accordance with the course of prudent management in lambs, wool, and price when ultimately sold, and not upon the basis either (1) of market value only, or (2) of the cost and loss which would be involved in the re-stocking of the farm with a like stock if the present sheep stock were removed: The arbiter is entitled to take into account both current market prices and the special qualities of the sheep, both in themselves and in their relation to the ground, which in his opinion will tend either to enhance or to diminish the said return to be realised from them by an occupant of the farm.”*

Dec. 9, 1911.

Williamson v.
Stewart.

* “NOTE.—[In the course of his note the Sheriff said]—Accordingly, for the reasons stated, I reject as the basis of valuation (1) the current price only of sheep in the market; (2) the loss to the landlord if the farm were left without sheep; (3) a bargain between the tenant and the landlord postulated as both free, but faced the former with the dread of getting no more than market value if the landlord does not buy, and the latter of suffering the heavy loss of re-stocking the holding if the tenant does not sell to him.

“I shall now explain what I conceive to be the true principle which I have given effect to in my finding.

“In my opinion, in an agricultural valuation such as the present, the principle supported both by law and by general practice is that where the article to be delivered over is of more value to the incoming tenant than to anybody else, the basis of valuation is the return which the article will yield to him as occupant. This is not necessarily the same as the cost of replacing the article if it were taken away, and is not therefore to be measured by the loss which would be sustained if it were removed and not handed over.

“Speaking of a turnip crop, in the case of Scott v. Ritchie (7 S. L. R. 135), Lord President Inglis said, ‘The waygoing tenant is to be paid for the turnips by the landlord or incoming tenant. Now what would he have got if he had been able to eat them off himself? According to the oversman's opinion two-thirds of the value of the turnips go to flesh and bone of the stock fed upon them and one-third to the land from the dung made by the stock. The tenant is just as much entitled to receive the third he would have got as dung as the two-thirds that he would have got as flesh and bone.’

“Now here the sheep stock upon the farm considered as a stock to remain upon the farm represents so much wool, so much progeny, and eventually so many cast ewes, or it may be so much mutton. These are what the sheep would have yielded to the outgoing tenant if he had been able to remain and realise them. To adapt the words of Lord President Inglis, they are ‘what he would have got for them if he had been able to use them on the holding himself.’ These, too, represent what these sheep will yield on realisation to the occupant who takes them over. It is right that the arbiter should have regard to the market price of sheep as being the market or collective estimate of the value and prospects for the time being of such stock. It is right, too, that he should take into account the acclimatisation of the stock. If the stock is an acclimatised one, it may well be that these sheep will be healthier on the holding, and that accord-

Williamson v.
Stewart.

The landlord appealed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 6th July 1911. In the course of the argument (which is sufficiently set forth in the contentions of the parties quoted supra) the undernoted cases were referred to.¹

At advising on 9th December 1911, the opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—The question of what is a proper valuation in the circumstances before us is a question of mixed law and fact.

There is a certain difficulty in distinguishing the law from the fact when as yet the valuation has not been made, but it is obviously so expedient that the arbiter should be assisted, that I think we are bound to make the attempt.

It is probably the easiest method to begin by considering the extreme ingly there will be fewer deaths, more and better lambs, and eventually more and better cast ewes or mutton, all as the ultimate return to the purchaser for these sheep against the price which he pays for them and his outlays in maintaining them. But, on the other hand, the tenant being under covenant to leave the stock, as the landlord is to take it, it appears to me that it would be illegitimate for the arbiter to proceed upon the footing of what would be the position of matters if the ground were left bare and the landlord or incoming tenant were obliged to stock it with strange sheep or to turn it to some other purpose. The suggestion that, because a farm is unhealthy for strange sheep and great loss would be caused if the present stock were removed, therefore the sheep are to be valued on the basis of such loss seems to me to be as illegitimate as would be the suggestion that because a farm being far from a market and at the end of a rough five-mile road, the manure, straw, turnips could not be replaced except at great cost, therefore the manure, straw, and turnips which the tenant is bound to leave are to be valued on the basis of such cost.

“I shall endeavour to make the matter plain by an illustration, and, of course, I take round and random figures. I postulate a farm unhealthy to strange sheep but stocked with well acclimatised sheep which the tenant is bound to deliver over. Now in these circumstances if an arbiter were to say, ‘If this farm had to be re-stocked with strange sheep many would die, many would get into poor condition, the fleeces would be lighter, many would abort, a number would stray—the loss would be equivalent to half the whole stock. Therefore whilst the price of the present stock if sold in the market is 30s. per head, the value to the incoming tenant of the stock which the outgoing tenant is bound to deliver over is 60s. per head, although that is an amount which the incoming tenant can never ultimately realise from these sheep,’—that, in my view, would be an unsound principle. But, on the other hand, if the arbiter were to say, ‘The price of these sheep if sold now in the market is 30s. per head. But no occupant would sell them in the market, for, as sheep to be retained upon the farm, being acclimatised, they would do much better than in the hands of some stranger purchaser, they represent an eventual return to the occupier in produce and ultimate sale, the present value of which is 40s. per head, and that must be their price as between the outgoing and the incoming tenant,’—that, in my contention on either side. For the landlord it was argued that the valuation must proceed on market value and market value alone. Dec. 9, 1911.

For the tenant it was contended that the valuation should be made according to "use and wont," which was explained to mean the adding of a percentage to market value to represent acclimatisation value. Williamson v. Stewart.
Ld. President.

We do not think either of these views is, as stated, correct.

To begin with, we think a good deal of confusion is caused by the term "market value." The subject here is a sheep stock—in particular a ewe stock—to be handed over at Whitsunday. Now, in one sense there is no such thing as a market value for such a stock. It is not the custom to sell a ewe stock in a mart as a whole in one lot, or to sell individual lambs which are too young to be removed from their mothers, or ewes which are not in condition. If, therefore, the stock was simply taken off the ground at Whitsunday, and, so to speak, forcibly conveyed to a mart and there sold, it is obvious that it would yield very little. It would be like "scrapping" machinery, or selling a business at a break-up value.

On the other hand, there is a market value which has an obvious bearing on the question. When the lambs become old enough they will be partly sold, and when a ewe is cast it will be parted with for value. The breeding ewe has also a value. The prices that are, so to speak, reigning in the market must affect the arbiter's view of the value of each component item of the stock. The value is the value of each item in a going business, not a break-up value.

We agree with the Sheriff in thinking that the determining consideration is what can be made out of the stock, viewing the stock and farm as a going business. For it must always be kept in view that the question of the farm is inextricably mixed up with the question of the value of the stock. If the farm cost the tenant nothing, he could, so to speak, "afford" to give more for the stock. But he has to pay rent—and even the landlord, opinion, would be the sound principle which it would be the duty of the arbiter to follow.

"In estimating the value of sheep on the basis of the return to be got for them, regard must, of course, be had to outgoings, including the annual value or rent of the farm. In my opinion, this annual value or rent of the farm for this purpose is the annual value or rent of such a farm let as a farm with a continuous sheep stock—the rent which the late tenant would presumably have paid had there been a renewal on fair terms of the lease. This coincides with the Lord President's suggested test of value above referred to. What would the tenant have got for them had he remained in the holding?"

"In this connection I may point out that the principle of exchangeable value as defined by Lord M'Laren, viz.:—the price which the subject would bring when exposed to the test of competition, coincides with the principle of valuation which I have indicated, although to make the test directly applicable it is necessary to figure particular circumstances different from the present. The arbiter may regard the matter in this way. 'If this farm were in the hands of the proprietor as a farm with this stock upon it, and there were several offerers for it at the rent which I, the arbiter, consider the ordinary rent of such a farm, year in, year out, when carrying this stock, and if, in these circumstances, the proprietor were to invite the offerers to tender for the sheep stock, what price would he get in such a competition?' . . ."

Dec. 9, 1911. if it is he that is taking over the stock, must be here considered as if he was a hypothetical tenant. Accordingly the arbiter must consider the farm as he finds it, and fixing in his own mind a fair rent for the farm as a first expense, must then go on to consider what the incoming man can afford to pay for the stock as it exists, in view of what prices he will eventually get in the market when the component parts of the stock as a going stock will be sold from time to time.

Williamson v.
Stewart.

Ld. President.

This view does allow for a value in which has been included acclimatisation. But it is quite different from what has been termed "use and wont," a term, in our view, quite inappropriate to such a matter. The idea of adding a fixed percentage, the figure of which is arrived at because others have done it in other arbitrations, is, we consider, really to disregard the matter in hand; and it is this habit which has led to what everyone knows has been a great injustice in such valuations. For it leaves altogether out of sight the crucial question, viz., whether after he has paid a rent the incoming man can at such prices make the farm pay as a going concern.

On the whole matter we think the Sheriff has come to a right conclusion, but we have thought it better to express our judgment in our own words.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Cullen.

IN a note of suspension and interdict at the instance of Robert Thomson, miner, against the Bent Colliery Company, Limited, the complainer craved suspension of a warrant for ejecting him from subjects at 23 Raith Place, Bothwell Haugh, Bothwell, occupied by him.

The complainer averred that, on 23rd November 1910, the respondents, who were the proprietors of the subjects, presented in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Hamilton, a petition craving that a warrant should be granted by the Court for removing and ejecting the complainer from these subjects. (Stat. 5) "The complainer appeared before the Sheriff-substitute upon 29th November 1910, and craved leave to lodge answers in writing, conform to the provisions of section 38 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, and the Rules for regulating procedure contained in the First Schedule Dec. 12, 1911.

annexed to the Act.* The complainer further offered to find caution Thomson v.
for violent profits. The Sheriff-substitute refused this application Bent Colliery and directed the case to be tried without answers in writing. In so Co., Limited.
refusing the complainer's application, the Sheriff-substitute acted oppressively and in direct disregard of the statutory forms. . . ." (Stat. 6) "On 6th December 1910 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced decree as follows:—'At Hamilton, the sixth day of December nineteen hundred and ten years, the Sheriff grants warrant for ejecting the said Robert Thomson, defender, and others mentioned in the complaint from the subjects therein specified.'"

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The complainer having at the calling of said petition craved leave to lodge written answers and offered caution for violent profits, the Sheriff-substitute was not entitled to conduct the proceedings in the manner regulated by the Small-Debt Acts, and the said decree is accordingly null and of no effect, or alternatively is subject to review in common form.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The averments of the complainer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the crave of the note, which should be refused. (2) In the circumstances condescended upon, the note is incompetent and should be refused. (3)
The proceedings complained of being regular and in accordance with statute, the note ought to be refused.

On 13th June 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) refused the note.†

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts, with reference to actions for summary removing:—

Rule 119. "Such causes shall be conducted and disposed of in the summary manner in which proceedings are conducted under the Small-Debt Acts and shall not be subject to review."

Rule 121. "The Sheriff may order written answers or adjourn the hearing of such causes, but where defences cannot be instantly verified, the Sheriff shall ordain the defender to find caution for violent profits, unless the Sheriff shall dispense with caution, which he may do if he sees fit."

Rule 122. "Where a defender has given in answers, and caution for violent profits has been found or has been dispensed with, such cases shall, † "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the respondents' plea to the com-and caution for violent profits has been found or dispensed with, such cases shall, as nearly as may be thereafter, be conducted according to the procedure in ordinary actions of removing, and shall be subject to review

Argued for the reclamer;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding, as he did in the result at which he had arrived, that where caution was offered and written answers were tendered the Sheriff had a discretion to refuse the answers and so to deprive a defender of all right of appeal. In these circumstances, under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1838,¹ section 13, the Sheriff was bound to receive the answers; and the practice under that Act had been to receive answers when tendered.² Rules 119, 121, and 122 of the 1907 Act did not expressly deprive a defender of his established right to put in answers, and, in dubio, the new Act should be construed as being intended to continue the existing practice.

Argued for the respondents;—The Act of 1907 instituted a change in the procedure in actions of removing. Rule 119 of the First Schedule to that Act was imperative in its terms, and the only exceptions to the procedure under that Rule were those provided by Rules 121 and 122 which were permissive in their terms, and left the receiving of written answers entirely to the discretion of the Sheriff. The provisions of the Sheriff Court Act of 1838 with reference to summary removings could not be appealed to, for that Act had been repealed by the Act of 1907, and the practice under the former Act could not affect the construction of the latter, which was clear in its terms.

The following opinion was delivered by

THE LORD PROBATIONER (WILLIAM HUNTER, K.C.).—In this case the complainer and reclamer seeks to suspend a warrant ejecting him from premises occupied by him of which the respondents are proprietors. The ground, as I understand it, upon which he seeks to do so is that he offered to give in written defences, which were not received, and he maintains that on that account he is entitled to have the warrant of eviction suspended.

The procedure in summary applications for removal is now determined by the provisions of the Act of 1907, and solely by these provisions, the provisions which appeared in the earlier Act of 1838 being entirely repealed; and I would only say with reference to these earlier provisions, that, at all events in one or two respects, they are substantially different from the subsequent provisions. That is especially the case so far as the matter of caution is concerned. But it seems to me that the Rules of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, particularly Rules 119, 121, and 122, provide completely for the disposal of these summary applications in the Sheriff Court. The ordinary rule is Rule 119, which provides that the applications are to be dealt with summarily, and that what the Sheriff determines is not to be subject to review. Rule 121 provides: "The Sheriff may order written did not order answers, and the cause therefore was not taken out of Rule 119 but remained a summary one not subject to review.

"I shall accordingly dismiss the note."

answers or adjourn the hearing of such causes, but where defences cannot be instantly verified, the Sheriff shall ordain the defender to find caution for violent profits, unless the Sheriff shall dispense with caution, which he may do if he sees fit." By Rule 122, a right, a limited right, of review is given. That rule comes into application, as the Lord Ordinary has held, only where certain condition are satisfied. They are two: (1) that the defender has given in answers; and (2) that caution has been found or has been dispensed with. In this case caution, although offered, was not found, and was not dispensed with. In point of fact the Sheriff, in exercise of the discretion conferred upon him under the previous rule, considered that this was not a case for written answers at all. Under these circumstances I think that the complainer is not entitled to the redress which he seeks. I am therefore of opinion that the Court should refuse the reclaiming note.

 Thomson v.
 Bent Colliery

 Lord
 Probationer.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the opinion that was delivered by the Lord Probationer. I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right and that it should be sustained, and I think he has with very great succinctness given the true reasons for the judgment. I shall only say one word more. The argument that Mr Moncrieff addressed to us really turned upon this—that, in dubio, we ought to construe the Rules of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907 in the light of what he says was the practice under the Sheriff Courts Act of 1838. Now, I think it is at least a doubtful question whether one is entitled, upon a question of the construction of the statute which undoubtedly rules the matter, to consider what was the practice under a repealed statute where the words used were not identical. Apart from usage there is another reason which I think excludes the construction which the complainer desires, and it is this. It is directed, in both statutes, that these removings shall be conducted as small-debt processes. Now under the Small-Debt Acts there is no right in a defender to insist on written pleadings. In a Small-Debt Court it is only with the permission of the Sheriff that written pleadings can come in. Accordingly you begin, so to speak, with an entire absence of written pleadings, and you come to Rules 121 and 122 of the First Schedule to the 1907 Act, and the construction of these is clearly as the Lord Ordinary has found.

Accordingly, on the whole matter, I propose that we should refuse the reclaiming note.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship, and only add that I cannot think that there is any sufficient ground for construing a repealing statute by usage which may have followed upon the statute which has been repealed. It has been held that the ambiguous provisions of a statute may be construed with reference to usage which has followed on the statute itself, but even in that case the usage, as is explained in the well-known case of The Clyde Navigation Trustees,¹ is only an aid to interpretation, more or less valuable according to the circumstances, and cannot absolve the Court from the duty of determining the true construction of the statute for itself when it comes into controversy. But so far as I know it has never

Dec. 12, 1911. yet been held that usage which has followed upon one Act can construe a more recent Act which, for aught we can tell, repeals it just because of the practice that may have followed upon it. Upon the construction of the statute itself I entirely agree with your Lordship.

Ballantyne &
Co. v. Paton
& Hendry.

R. B. BALLANTYNE & COMPANY, Pursuers (Appellants).—
Murray, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

PATON & HENDRY, Defenders (Respondents).—*Sandeman, K.C.—

Ship—Charter-party—Construction—Discharge of cargo—Liability for damage to ship through negligent discharge.

A charter-party provided :—"Cargo to be loaded, stowed, and discharged free of expense to steamer, with use of steamer's winch and winchmen if required."

Held that this clause had not the effect of transferring the duty of discharging the cargo from the shipowner, on whom it rests at common law, to the charterer, so as to render the latter responsible for damage received by the ship in the course of discharge.

Reparation—Ship—Damage to ship in course of discharge—Liability of charterers—Negligence of stevedores engaged and paid, but not controlled, by charterers.

In an action brought by the owners against the charterers of a ship for damages in respect of injury received by the ship during the discharge of the cargo, the pursuers averred that the defenders were liable, in respect that they had employed and paid the stevedores and the owners of a crane engaged in the discharge, by whose negligence the injury was caused.

Held that, as it was not averred that the defenders had undertaken the control of the discharge of the cargo, the pursuers had failed to set forth a relevant case; and action dismissed.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 27th September 1910 R. B. Ballantyne & Company, Glasgow, owners of the steamship "Bessie Barr," brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Paton & Hendry, Glasgow, who had chartered the vessel to carry a cargo of stones from Portland to Glasgow. The pursuers' claim was for damages in respect of injuries caused to the vessel during discharge at Glasgow while under charter to the defenders.

The charter-party, which was dated 30th March 1909, contained the following clause:—" (12) Cargo to be loaded, stowed, and discharged free of expense to steamer, with use of steamer's winch and winchmen if required."

The pursuers referred to the charter-party, and averred ;—"It was provided therein that the cargo was to be loaded, stowed, and discharged by the charterers, and free of expense to the steamer." In answer the defenders stated :—"By the said charter-party it is provided that the loading, stowing, and discharging is to be done by the Dec. 13, 1911. pursuers, but free of expense to the steamer."

The pursuers also averred;—(Cond. 2) "On 12th April 1909, in ^{Ballantyne & Co. v. Paton} course of the discharge, and while a large stone was in course of ^{& Hendry.} being taken out of the hold, and after being raised in the hold it was allowed by those discharging the ship to swing about and finally catch under the combings of the hold, whereby the chain of the crane or sling-chain by which the stone was being hoisted up, broke, and the stone was precipitated some distance on to the floor of the ship. Damage was done to the sheathing, ceiling, and floor of the hold, and to two ladders therein." (Cond. 3) "The defenders, in carrying out the terms of the charter-party by themselves or others for whom they are responsible, employed and paid the stevedores and owners of the crane engaged in the discharge of the vessel, and they are liable for the fault of persons employed in doing such work." (Cond. 4)

"Said accident was due to the fault and/or negligence of those discharging the said vessel, for whom the defenders are responsible under said charter-party, in not taking precautions to see that the said stone when in course of being hoisted was kept clear of the combings, and further, that the hoisting was carried out cautiously, so that, if there was risk of the stone catching on the combings, same should have been released and hoisting stopped before the chain had been broken."

The pursuers' remaining averments referred to the damage suffered.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having undertaken by the terms of said charter of pursuers' vessel to discharge the cargo carried, and same having been done in such negligent manner as to cause the loss and damage claimed by the pursuers, decree should be granted therefor, with interest and expenses as craved. (2) The defenders' statements are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) The pursuers not having sustained any loss and damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor with expenses.

On 11th November 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) sustained the defenders' first plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuers having appealed, the Sheriff (Millar), on 15th February 1911, adhered.†

* "NOTE.— . . . There is, I think, no doubt about the general maritime law, that the work of loading and discharging falls within the ship's duty, unless there is some special contract to the contrary. All the operations connected with the loading and discharging are ship's operations, whether these are actually conducted (as in theory, perhaps, these operations always are) by the ship's crew, and with the ship's appliances; or (as in practice they generally are) conducted by stevedores, with the aid of appliances outside the ship. The mere fact that some other person is to relieve the ship of the expense connected with the discharge of some duty of the ship, does not affect the legal situation at all (M'Iver & Co., Limited, v. Tate Steamers, Limited, [1903] 1 K. B. 362). . . ."

† "NOTE.—The ordinary rule of law is that the shipowner is bound to deliver the goods from the side of his ship. In the charter-party which has been produced the parties have embodied this rule into the written contract. In Article 4 it is said 'cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside free of expense.' Article 12 seems rather to be a method of settling the charges which were to be paid by the charterers to the shipowners, and does not affect this condition. Accordingly, I

Co. v. Paton
& Hendry.

The pursuers then appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 13th December 1911. During the course of the hearing the pursuers were allowed to amend their record by deleting from cond. 4 the words "under said charter-party," and by substituting, in their first plea in law, for the words "by the terms of said charter of pursuers' vessel" the words "as condescended on."

Argued for the appellants;—(1) At common law the duty of discharging a vessel admittedly lay on the owners of the vessel. But in this case the provision in clause 12 of the charter-party transferred the duty to the charterers. This was necessarily the effect of the clause, for otherwise the words "with use of steamer's winch" would have no intelligible meaning. It would be absurd for the owners, if the duty of discharging was on them, to contract for the use of their own winch. The words meant that the charterers were to discharge the vessel, and, for that purpose, were to be entitled to use the steamer's winch. (2) Apart from the provisions of the charter-party, the defenders here were liable for the damage done to the ship. It was averred on record that they had in fact undertaken to discharge the vessel, and had employed and paid the stevedores and others engaged in its discharge. The defenders had the control, therefore, of those employees, and were liable for their negligence.¹

Argued for the respondents;—(1) At common law the duty of discharging a vessel lay on the owners; and no contract involving an alteration of that liability could be found in clause 12 of the charter-party.² That clause dealt solely with expenses. It provided that while the appellants (in accordance with the established practice) were to be responsible for the discharge of the vessel, they were to be repaid their expenses by the respondents, with the exception that the latter were not to be charged for the use of the steamer's winch or winchmen. (2) There was no relevant case against the respondents apart from the charter-party. Employment and payment of the stevedores, &c., did not necessarily infer control of them, and it was control that involved liability.³

LORD GUTHRIE.—The case was presented by the appellants under two heads. The first view was founded on the terms of clause 12 of the charter-party, and they argued alternatively that, whatever the charter-party provided, the charterers did in fact undertake the discharge of the vessel, and employed and paid the stevedores, thus becoming responsible for the damage which is alleged to have been caused to the ship by the falling of a stone as it was being taken out of the hold.

It was conceded by Mr Murray that under the record as originally framed agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute in his interpretation of the contract. . . ."

the alternative case was neither averred nor pled so as to entitle the pursuers to inquiry, and he accordingly proposed to amend by deleting from the first plea in law for the pursuers the words "as condescended on," and by substituting for the words "by the terms of said charter of pursuers' vessel." I do not think that this part of the case is relevantly averred even on the record as so amended. There is no averment that the charterers undertook the control of the discharge of the cargo. Even if they employed and paid the stevedores, this will not by itself infer liability for damage in carrying out the discharge—(*Blaikie v. Stenbridge*¹; *Harris v. Best, Ryley, & Co.*²).

The remaining question arises on clause 12 of the charter-party, with which alone the Sheriffs have dealt. That clause is in the following terms: "Cargo to be loaded, stowed, and discharged free of expense to steamer, with use of steamer's winch and winchmen if required." The pursuers allege that by that clause "it was provided that the cargo was to be loaded, stowed, and discharged by the charterers." On the other hand, the defenders aver that "by the said charter-party it is provided that the loading, stowing, and discharging is to be done by the pursuers" (the owners). The Sheriffs have not sustained either view, but agreeing in result with the defenders' contention, have held that the clause in question did not vary what they have held to be the common law rule placing the duty on the owners. Now, it was admitted by the appellants that the Sheriffs were right in their view of the common law rule. It is therefore for the appellants to show that in this charter-party the duty of discharging cargo was transferred to the charterers.

It is common ground that if the clause had stopped at the words "free of expense to steamer," the duty of discharge would have rested as at common law, but it was said that the concluding words, "with use of steamer's winch and winchmen if required," can only mean that the charterers were to discharge the vessel, because if that duty rested on the ship, there could be no case in which a requisition could be intelligibly made for the use of the steamer's own winch and winchmen. It seems to me that the respondents only need to suggest a reasonable interpretation of this clause which would be consistent with the common law duty, because if the common law is to be altered by the terms of the charter-party, that must be done by a clause which admits of no other reasonable interpretation. The respondents suggest that the clause was inserted to prevent the owners, if their winch and winchmen were used, claiming payment for them, in addition to being relieved of all other expense of discharging. This is an intelligible explanation of the clause, and is consistent with the maintenance of the owners' common law duty. I therefore think that the view which the Sheriffs have taken is sound. The result will be that the interlocutors of the Sheriffs will be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree, and I think the point is a very short one. It is plain, and indeed was not really disputed, that on the record, as originally framed, the case turned entirely on clause 12 of the charter-party. I concur

² 7 Aspinal, 272, 274.

Dec. 13, 1911. in thinking that, on the case thus intended to be presented, the Sheriff is right, and that the clause in question makes no alteration on the common law rule that the duty of discharging rests on the ship and not on the charterers.

Ballantyne & Co. v. Paton & Hendry.

Lord Dundas. As regards the amendment proposed and allowed at the bar, I cannot see that it makes the matter any better. I do not think that a record framed to meet one case can be so easily adapted to the requirements of another, as by the simple deletion of four words in the condescendence, and of a few more in one of the pleas in law, with the effect of making the pleadings more vague than they were. This case, which the appellants endeavour to make independently of the charter-partly, would have needed very careful and specific averments, and as these have not been made, that case must fail. I cannot avoid the impression that, if the facts had truly admitted of such averments being made, they would have been tendered.

THOMAS M'LAUGHLIN, Appellant.—Lippe—Duffes.

Dec. 15, 1911. THE WEMYSS COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Strain.

M'Laughlin v. Wemyss Coal Co., Limited. Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—Appeal by stated case—Procedure—Appellant allowed to lodge a condescendence—Expenses.

In an appeal by stated case from the decision of an arbitrator dismissing an application for compensation in respect that the workman had failed relevantly to aver the happening of an accident, the Court permitted the workman to submit a condescendence of the specific facts on which he relied, and thereafter allowed it to be received, and remitted to the arbitrator to proceed; but, in a question as to the taxation of the parties' accounts, refused to allow the appellant (who had been awarded the expenses of the appeal), the expenses of preparing and lodging the condescendence.

Expenses—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—Stated case.

In a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the Court found the appellant entitled to the "expenses of the appeal." Upon a note of objections to the report of the Auditor, who had disallowed the expenses of obtaining the stated case from the Sheriff, the Court allowed a modified fee of three guineas for these expenses, and observed that in future a modified fee of three guineas and a half would be allowed.

M'Govern v. Cooper & Co., (1901) 4 F. 249, and London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown, (1905) 7 F. 488, commented on, and observed that there is no distinction between an award of "expenses of the appeal" and an award of "expenses of the stated case."

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Fife and Kinross. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Cupar, in which Thomas M'Laughlin, stone breaker, sought compensation from the Wemyss Coal Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Armour-Hannay) dismissed the application as Dec. 15, 1911. irrelevant, and at the request of the workman stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The claimant applied for an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, against the respondents, and averred that he was a stone breaker in respondents' employment, and his average weekly earnings were twenty-eight shillings per week. That he 'on or about 7th February 1911, at an old building at and used in connection with Denbeath Coal Mine, Fifeshire, was, by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, injured by a septic abscess developing on the palm of his right hand, due to the absorption of septic matter through blisters and cracks on his hand and fingers from bricks taken from said building, which he was breaking into small pieces, and which in the course of his employment he was continually handling, whereby he was totally incapacitated for work.'

M'Laughlin v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

"The respondents resisted the claim on the ground that any incapacity from which the claimant might suffer was not due to an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. They maintained that the claimant had not relevantly averred that he sustained an injury by accident in the course of his employment with the respondents. The respondents averred that the claimant's weekly earnings did not exceed seventeen shillings.

"After hearing the agents for the parties I dismissed the application, in respect that the claimant had not relevantly averred that his incapacity was due to an accident in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and found the claimant liable in Four pounds and four shillings of modified expenses. On a consideration of the claimant's averments, I took the view that the claimant's incapacity was not due to unlooked-for mishap or accident, but was the ordinary and necessary consequence of continuous work lasting for some time—it was stated that the claimant had been engaged for some four days at the work in question. On the claimant's own showing his incapacity was due not to 'one unexpected happening,' such as a scratch, cut, or prick, but to his working for some time—say four days—at a kind of work quite likely to cause a septic abscess to develop if he were not careful."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Has the claimant relevantly averred that his incapacity was due to an 'accident' in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 28th October 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—An application for compensation should not be disposed of on relevancy without inquiry.¹ The Sheriff-substitute had improperly regarded the initial writ, which was in the form prescribed by the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907,² as containing averments in support of the claim for compensation. The applicant did not need to set forth in the initial writ the facts on which he relied. These facts would fall to be ascertained by inquiry, and, on inquiry here, the case would be found to be one of personal injury by accident.³

Argued for the respondents;—The appellant had set forth no

M’Laughlin v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

The opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Johnston) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—The opinion of the Court is that before the case is disposed of the appellant should have an opportunity of submitting the condescendence he would ask the Sheriff-substitute to receive if the case were sent back to him. If the condescendence is found to be irrelevant the appeal will be refused.

The appellant having submitted a condescendence, the Court on 18th November 1911 pronounced an interlocutor allowing it to be received.

The case was further heard (before the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) on 24th November 1911. At the close of the argument the Lord President stated that there must be inquiry, as it could not be held that the appellant’s averments were necessarily irrelevant; and accordingly on 25th November 1911 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Find it unnecessary to answer the question of law as stated: Recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and remit the cause to him to proceed as accords: Find the appellant entitled to the expenses of the appeal, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax, and to report.”

In his report on the appellant’s account of expenses the Auditor allowed a sum of £9, 10s. 8d., being charges in connection with the preparation of the condescendence submitted to the Court, and disallowed a sum of £3, 14s. 2d. charged in connection with obtaining the stated case from the Sheriff prior to its presentation to the Court of Session. In this latter sum was included £1, 10s., being dues of the stated case paid to the Sheriff-clerk.

The appellant objected to the Auditor’s report, in respect that he had disallowed the charges in connection with obtaining the stated case; and the respondents objected to the report in respect that the Auditor had allowed the charges in connection with the preparation of the condescendence.

Parties were heard on their objections before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 15th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The appellant had been found entitled to the expenses of the appeal, and as the expenses of obtaining a stated case were a necessary part of the appeal,⁴ he was entitled to recover these expenses.¹ The case of M'Govern v. Cooper & Company,² Dec. 15, 1911. which the Auditor believed excluded the allowance of such expenses, was not an authority to that effect, for there the expenses had been incurred by the respondent, not by the appellant; and they were disallowed on the ground that they were unnecessary and unreasonable. M'Laughlin v. Wemyss Coal Co., Limited. (2) The Auditor had rightly allowed the charges in connection with the preparation of the condescendence, these having been incurred in course of the proceedings in a successful appeal, to the expenses of which the Court had found the appellant entitled.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) In the case of *M'Govern v. Cooper & Company*² the arguments addressed to the Court were directed to the question as to when an appeal began, and it must be held to have been decided in that case that it did not begin until the stated case was presented in the Court of Session. Accordingly, expenses incurred prior to the case being presented in Court were not expenses of the appeal, and had been rightly disallowed. In the case of London and Edinburgh Shipping Company v. Brown,³ in which such expenses had been allowed, the respondents were found entitled not to "the expenses of the appeal," but to the "expenses of the stated case." (2) The expenses of preparing a condescendence were not expenses of an appeal but of an arbitration, and if a successful party was entitled to these they fell to be dealt with by the Sheriff and allowed on the Sheriff Court scale. The receiving of a condescendence was not a matter that fell within the powers of the Court of Appeal as they were defined in the Act,⁴ but within those of the Sheriff.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two questions in this case, and in order to make the matter clear it is perhaps as well that I should remind your Lordships of what exactly has happened in the case.

It is a claim for compensation by one Thomas M'Laughlin against the Wemyss Coal Company, Limited. He applied for an award of compensation in respect that, on or about a certain date, while working on an old building, he was injured by a septic abscess developing on the palm of his hand. Now, the Sheriff, acting as arbitrator, found that his statement, as made in his initial writ, was so jejune and inexploratory that it did not constitute a relevant claim at all, and, accordingly, he so held, and dismissed the application. Thereupon the claimant asked for a case to be stated, and a case was stated, which at much greater length set forth the facts that I have just stated. The case was heard before your Lordships, and the claimant urged that, if he was only allowed to develop more particularly the general indication of claim which he had given in his initial writ, he was confident that he could show a relevant case. Well, your Lordships after that discussion came to the conclusion that it was difficult to judge of that without seeing what precisely he could say if he was allowed to do it. We accordingly allowed him to lodge a condescendence, with a view to seeing whether, when the condescendence was lodged, it did set forth a Dec. 15, 1911. relevant case or not. He did so, and your Lordships allowed the condescendence to be received, and remitted the case to the Sheriff for further procedure.

M'Laughlin v. Wemyss Coal Co., Limited.

Ld. President. Now, in one sense perhaps, that last interlocutor was not strictly in accord with the terms of the provisions upon this matter, but, at the same time, I think it was an interlocutor which your Lordships were well entitled to pronounce, and which you would always repeat. Probably the strict interlocutor would be to remit the case to the Sheriff with the declaration that he should allow a condescendence, and to tell him further that if the condescendence that was proffered was the same condescendence that was proffered to us, he would be bound to entertain it and find that it disclosed a relevant case. I think it would be rather straining matters to find that we have got to go per ambages to such a result, and it is much more simple to allow the condescendence to be received here and remit the record already made. It is precisely analogous to what has been done again and again in appeals from the Sheriff Courts, and sometimes in reclaiming notes from Lords Ordinary.

Now, your Lordships allowed the appellant the expenses of the appeal, and although there was an argument upon the question whether the respondents should fairly be subjected to the expenses of the double appearance that had been rendered necessary, your Lordships did not hold that any distinction should be made upon that matter, and therefore I have no doubt that the interlocutor covers the double appearance. But the objection that has now been taken on behalf of the respondents is as to one portion of the expenses, viz., the expenses in connection with the preparation of the condescendence which your Lordships allowed to be received. There is no question, of course, as to the item, but the outcome of the objection is this. This condescendence was framed here under the auspices of both junior and senior counsel. I do not wonder that that was done, because obviously it required, to say the least of it, a good deal of skill to construct a relevant case, and I do not wonder that two builders were thought necessary; but the result of it is that this part of the account comes to £9, 10s. 8d. Well, now, why had that condescendence to be built in the Court of Session? Obviously because it had not been built already in the Sheriff Court. It is quite true, as we are told, that the Sheriff had not allowed a condescendence to be lodged, but the initial mistake was that relevancy was not sufficiently disclosed in the initial writ. After all, the initial writ is meant to begin the proceeding, and there is no reason why you should not put a perfectly relevant claim in the initial writ. If the initial writ had contained a claim to the same effect as this condescendence, then we are bound to suppose that the case would have been held to be relevant from the beginning. Therefore I do not think the respondents ought to pay the expenses of framing the condescendence, and all the more for this reason, that the appellant has got without objection the fees for both his counsel for both appearances in this Court. There is the original fee on the first discussion of the case for both senior and junior counsel, and there is the other fee, the continuing fee, which was rendered necessary by parties being brought together again. So that on this matter I think that the appellant is quite well off, and that the respondents should not be asked to pay the expenses of this condescendence the very necessity of which came from the feeble- Dec. 15, 1911.

ness of the initial writ. It is a very special case, and I do not think it will occur again, and I do not wonder for one moment at the Auditor doing as M'Laughlin v.
he did. But I do not think that it would be just to allow that item. Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

Well, the other objection, which is of a more general character, is this. Ld. President.
The actual interlocutor runs thus:—"Find the appellant entitled to the expenses of the appeal." Now, the Auditor, having had his attention called to a certain case of M'Govern v. Cooper & Co.,¹ as commented on in a case of the London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown,² felt himself bound to disallow the expenses of getting a stated case prepared. There are certain necessary expenses in connection with that. Notably there is the necessity of paying £1, 10s. under the table of fees to the Sheriff-clerk when he hands the appellant the stated case. The history of the matter seems to be that in M'Govern's case¹ the respondent, who had been found entitled to expenses, had charged in his account of expenses for a series of attendances at the Sheriff-clerk's office, which represented a sort of anxiety on his part to see that the stated case was being properly drawn, and the Court held, and, I think, quite rightly held, that it was never intended that the respondent's agent should be continually running to the Sheriff-clerk's office—I think there were thirteen items in that case—and charge that against the opposite party. And your Lordships will notice that in that case he was not there to get the special case. That was the business, naturally, of the appellant. Accordingly, the Court disallowed the expenses. The question came up again, and was discussed in the case of London and Edinburgh Shipping Company v. Brown.² Certain expenses in connection with the adjustment of the case were objected to, and their Lordships' attention having been drawn to M'Govern's case,¹ their view was that the expenses should be allowed to a modified extent, and they drew a distinction between the interlocutor in the case before them, which ran "the expenses of the stated case," and the interlocutor in the case of M'Govern,¹ which ran "the expenses of the appeal," and upon that distinction they discriminated between the cases. If I may say so with respect, I think that was a well-meant intention of saving the decision of the other Division, and that really there is no distinction between the two forms of interlocutor. I cannot imagine how there could be, because after all the only way of appeal is by stated case, and whether you call it "expenses of the appeal" or "expenses of the stated case" or "expenses of the stated case on appeal," all these expressions seem to me to come to the same thing. Nay more, I cannot imagine a case in which it would be proper to give the appellant the expenses of the appeal (necessarily, of course, on the hypothesis that he had been successful), and yet to disallow the actual outlay which he had to make, in the shape of a fee to the Sheriff-clerk, in order to get the case stated on which he was successful. I cannot imagine a set of circumstances in which that could be right. Of course if I thought I was going against the judgment of the Second Division I would not have pronounced this judgment without consulting them; but I am perfectly certain that I am not going against

Dec. 15, 1911. the real meaning of the Second Division, because in the subsequent case of M'Laughlin v. Dempster v. Baird & Company, Limited,¹ Lord Stormonth-Darling, in delivering the judgment of the Court, says,—“We shall adopt the practice in *Brown's case*² to the extent of modifying the fee to be allowed to the appellant at three guineas, which includes the £1 paid to the Sheriff-clerk.” That is the rule which I propose your Lordships should follow here, and I think it is much the best plan to have a modified fee, and that, I understand, is actually the practice of the Auditor. Therefore, I think we should follow the practice in *Brown's case*² and sustain the objections so far, and instead of giving an unfixed amount give a fee of three guineas, which will include the £1, 10s. paid to the Sheriff-clerk. I have consulted the Auditor, and in cases in the future in respect of the increased fees under the 1907 Act, the fee to be allowed will be three guineas and a half. That I take to be the proper practice when a particular interlocutor bears to be, as I say, for the “expenses of the stated case,” or the “expenses of the appeal,” or the “expenses of the stated case on appeal.”

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having considered the note of objections for the appellant . . . to the Auditor's report on the appellant's account of expenses . . . along with the note of objections for the respondents to said report . . . (First) Sustain said objections for the appellant to the extent of allowing £3, 3s. of the sum of £3, 14s. 2d. taxed off by the Auditor, as set forth in said objections: (Second) Sustain said objections for the respondents, and disallow the sum of £9, 10s. 8d. allowed by the Auditor, as set forth in said objections.”

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule (9)—Recording of memorandum—Written agreement between parties—Terms of memorandum differing from terms of agreement.

Where an agreement in writing has been entered into between an employer and a workman with regard to compensation, it is the duty of the Sheriff (if objection is taken) to refuse to record a memorandum which is not in the precise terms of the written agreement. It is not part of his duty to construe the written agreement and then to determine whether the memorandum gives effect to it as so construed.

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN an application in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow for the recording of a memorandum of agreement under paragraph (9) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) refused to record it, and at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

² 7 F. 488.

The case set forth :—

Dec. 16, 1911.

" The following facts were admitted :—

" 1. The appellant, whilst in the respondents' employment as a seaman, on board their s.s. 'Hibernian,' on 7th March 1911, sustained injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and he was thereby totally incapacitated from following his occupation.

M'Lean v.
Allan Line
Steamship
Co., Limited.

" 2. The amount of compensation payable to appellant under the Workmen's Compensation Act was agreed upon at 13s. 9d. per week, and that is still being paid.

" 3. On 17th August the appellant signed a stamped document in the following terms :—First Payment.—'Received this 17th day of August 1911 from the Shipping Federation, Limited, on behalf of the owners of the s.s. "Hibernian," the sum of Two pounds one shilling and threepence, being weekly compensation at the rate of 13s. 9d. per week from 25/7/11 to 15/8/11 inclusive, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which Act I elect to claim for personal injury, by accident, sustained by me on or about the 7th day of March 1911. This weekly payment is to be continued during my total disablement resulting from the accident, in accordance with the provisions of the above-mentioned Act; the amount of any payment due during partial disablement to be settled hereafter. (Signed) ANGUS M'LEAN, Seaman, 110 Houston Street, Glasgow. (Witness) J. A. Ditchburn. Stamp sixpence.'

" 4. On 21st August 1911 the appellant lodged with the Sheriff-clerk a memorandum to be recorded in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, in the following terms :—'The claimant claimed compensation from the respondents in respect of personal injuries sustained by him on 7th March 1911, while in the employment of the respondents, and on board s.s. "Hibernian," at Greenock, the claimant having sustained dislocation of the right shoulder, and having been totally incapacitated from following his occupation from said date in consequence. The question in dispute, which was as to the amount of compensation payable to the claimant, was determined by agreement. The agreement was made on the sixteenth day of August 1911, and was, as follows, viz. :—That the respondents should pay compensation to the claimant from the date of the accident, at the rate of thirteen shillings and ninepence sterling per week, to continue during the claimant's incapacity for work, or until such time as the same shall be ended, diminished, or redeemed, in accordance with the provisions of the said Act.'

" 5. The Sheriff-clerk, in terms of Section XI. (1) of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, on said 21st August 1911 sent a copy of said memorandum of agreement in a registered letter to the respondents, containing a request that he might be informed on or before 28th August 1911 whether the memorandum and agreement set forth therein were genuine or were objected to. On 23rd August 1911, The Shipping Federation, Limited, on behalf of the respondents, sent to the said Sheriff-clerk a letter objecting to said memorandum being recorded, on the ground that it did not accurately set forth the agreement made with the appellant. The Sheriff-clerk thereupon intimated to the appellant that the recording of the memorandum had been objected to, and that the same would not be recorded without a special warrant from the Sheriff. In terms of Section XII. of said Act of Sederunt, the memorandum thereupon fell to be dealt with as if it were an application to the Sheriff for settlement by arbitration Dec. 16, 1911. of the questions raised by the objection to the recording of the memorandum. On 11th October 1911, after having heard parties' procurators, I found that on the 17th August 1911, the document above referred to had been signed by the appellant, Angus M'Lean, and that that document constituted a formal agreement between the appellant and the respondents, expressed in terms different to those set forth in the memorandum sought to be recorded. I therefore found that said application to record a memorandum of agreement was unnecessary and incompetent, and I dismissed the application, and found no expenses due to or by either party."

M'Lean v.
Allan Line
Steamship
Co., Limited.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Did the fact that on 17th August 1911 the appellant had signed the said document, render his application to record an alleged agreement of 16th August in different terms incompetent?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 16th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The document signed on 17th August did not render incompetent the recording of this memorandum because (except for an error, which the appellant was prepared to correct, as to the date from which compensation was payable) the only difference between the two documents was a mere difference of expression. The closing sentence of the memorandum (which was the only part objected to) really set forth the correct interpretation of the agreement. Further, if the memorandum was recorded in its present form the respondents would suffer no prejudice, for if total incapacity ceased the remedy of suspension was not open to them,—their only remedy was an application for review,¹ and in such an application it would make no difference whether the memorandum was in its present form or in the precise terms of the agreement. If, however, the Court were to hold that the recording of the memorandum in its present form was incompetent, the appellant desired to record a memorandum in the actual terms of the agreement.

Argued for the respondents;—The agreement between the parties here having been reduced to writing, the Sheriff was right in refusing to record a memorandum which differed in its terms from the written agreement.² The difference here was material for (apart from the error in date) the memorandum bore that compensation was agreed to be paid till it was "ended, diminished, or redeemed," under the Act, whereas the written agreement was only for payment during "total disablement." The effect of recording the memorandum in its present terms would be that, if total disablement ceased, the respondents would have to continue paying until they had got an order in a process of review ending or diminishing the compensation, and even though that order dated back to the time of presenting the application, it was obvious that the sums paid meanwhile would be unrecoverable. Whereas, if the memorandum were recorded in the actual terms of the agreement, the respondents, as soon as total disablement ceased, could stop paying, and if charged for payment, could suspend the charge.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—This stated case conceals in an extraordinary manner Dec. 16, 1911. the real point which was argued before your Lordships, but as the matter is now clearly before the Court, I do not think that it is necessary to send the case back.

M'Lean v.
Allan Line
Steamship
Co., Limited.

The matter arises in this way. The appellant, who is a seaman, met with an accident on board the ship "Hibernian," belonging to the respondents. He does not seem to have been paid compensation at first because, I suppose, he was on board the ship and got his wages and nothing more was necessary. But on 17th August 1911—that is to say, about five months after the accident—he signed an agreement. [His Lordship then recited the terms of the agreement and the terms of the proposed memorandum, and continued]—Now, that memorandum the Sheriff refused to record, and the present appeal is as to whether he was bound to record it. In the discussion before your Lordships the appellant admitted that the words in the memorandum "from the date of the accident" were a slip, and he is quite willing to alter them by putting in "from 25th July 1911"; and if that were the only matter the respondents would not, as I understand, object.

But the real point of discussion between them lies in the words that are put in the agreement as to payment to be continued during total disablement. I ought to say, first of all, that although the so-called agreement is a document unilateral in its terms, it is not disputed by the respondents that it constitutes an agreement, that is to say that it was accepted by them as such. Now, the real dispute is upon the words that occur after the provision as to payment during total disablement, namely, the words "the amount of any payment due during partial disablement to be settled hereafter." In the document as signed the words are as I have read them, whereas in the memorandum as proposed to be recorded those words are replaced by the words "or until such time as the same shall be ended, diminished, or redeemed, in accordance with the provisions of the said Act." The appellant maintains that those words in the memorandum are simply a more accurate and proper way of expressing what the words in the written agreement bore. The respondents, on the other hand, say, No; and in particular they maintain that it will make an important practical difference to them, because they say that the result of recording the memorandum as proposed will be that if the seaman partially recovers, they will be bound to pay if charged until they can get the payment reviewed in a process of review, and that, albeit that eventually decree in that process of review will draw back to the term of presenting the petition, yet nevertheless they may find themselves in this unpleasant position, that during the time the case has taken to decide they have had to pay the full sum, and that sum they will never get back; whereas if the agreement was recorded in the precise terms in which it was written they could not be charged to pay during the period after they had alleged that total incapacity had ceased—or rather, to put it more accurately, that if a charge were presented against them they would be able to suspend it—and therefore would not be in the position of having to pay money that they eventually would not be able to get back.

Now, I do not think, although we have had a discussion on the question, that we need decide at present whether the one set of words is exactly the same as the other or is not. The only thing we can decide to-day is, What

Dec. 16, 1911. is the Sheriff's duty when a memorandum is produced to him for the purpose of being recorded, and the genuineness of it is disputed? With regard to this matter, the Sheriff is not really acting as arbitrator at all; he is acting in a semi-ministerial capacity. I say a semi-ministerial capacity, because he has to decide upon the matter of genuineness if that is controverted, and he has to exercise a judicial function in deciding that. But I think it would never do if we said that, in the case of written agreements, on a memorandum being tendered it was open to the Sheriff, who is really only acting here for the Sheriff-clerk, to consider, as a question of construction, whether the thing to be recorded was or was not the same as the thing which had originally been signed. In other words, I think it comes to this, that where an agreement which has been come to between the parties is admittedly in writing, the Sheriff must record that agreement as it stands and nothing else. It is otherwise if the agreement has been come to verbally and is then disputed: the Sheriff has in that case to decide on a proof what the true verbal agreement was. But where the agreement is professedly in writing, I think his duty begins and ends in recording that agreement and that agreement only.

M'Lean v.
Allan Line
Steamship
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

Accordingly, in this case I think the Sheriff rightly refused to record the memorandum as proffered. Therefore I think that in order to avoid further procedure, as it is stated at the Bar that the appellant is now content to have the agreement recorded in the exact words in which it was signed, we should find that the Sheriff-substitute was right in refusing to record the memorandum proffered, and remit the case to him to proceed with the recording of the memorandum in the words of the document signed upon 17th August 1911.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree with your Lordship. I think that the Sheriff-clerk, under the direction of the Sheriff, has an administrative duty imposed upon him to record a memorandum of an agreement actually made between the workman and the employers, and if there be a question as to the genuineness of that agreement his functions are confined to the determination of that particular point, subject to certain other questions for which the statute provides. But the question of the true legal construction and effect of an agreement proposed to him is not one of the questions he is authorised to decide. He has no jurisdiction to decide that, but only to say whether he is satisfied that it is, in point of fact, an agreement between the parties.

Now, the agreement which he was asked to record is in certain terms, and its genuineness depends upon the conformity of these terms with a written document in the shape of a receipt signed by the workman and accepted by the employers which purports to set forth what the parties have agreed upon, and which accordingly is produced as the basis on which the application is made. Either party is quite entitled to say that, in so far as it departs from the express terms of this document, the agreement proposed is not what he has consented to. It either expresses what both parties have agreed to, or it does not; and unless the objection to its terms is merely frivolous it seems to me perfectly obvious that one party can have no right to insist, against the opposition of the other, on the registration of a document which undeniably varies from the actual terms agreed upon. Dec. 18, 1911. The variation may or may not be material. But the parties are at variance as to the true meaning and effect of certain words of the document, and I do not think that the Sheriff-clerk or Sheriff has power to determine that question or to do anything but the exact ministerial act which the Sheriff-clerk is appointed to perform.

M'Lean v.
Allan Line
Steamship
Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

I agree with your Lordship, therefore, that the appellant is not entitled to have the memorandum which he proposes recorded, because it is not the exact agreement which was made between the parties.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. I do not think it was part of the duty of the Sheriff in this case first of all to construe the written document, and then, after arriving at an opinion as to the true meaning of that document according to his view, to record a memorandum of agreement giving effect to that construction. I think his duty, and his only duty, was to record the memorandum of agreement in the terms which were actually agreed to by the parties.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

“Find that the Sheriff-substitute was right in refusing to record the memorandum of agreement lodged in the application by the appellant: Find it unnecessary to answer the question of law as stated in the case: Further, in respect that appellant now states at the Bar that he desires to have the printed agreement signed by him on 17th August 1911 recorded as an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator appealed against, and remit to him to proceed as accords . . .”

Expenses—Taxation as between party and party—Trust—Expenses of trustees. M'Gregor's Trustees v. Kimbell.

A special case, which was presented to determine questions regarding the disposal of a particular portion of a trust-estate and to which the trustees were parties, stated that it had been agreed that “the taxed expenses of the several parties” should be paid out of the fund in dispute. The Court, in disposing of the case, found “the whole parties to the special case entitled to their expenses as the same may be taxed by the Auditor,” out of the fund in dispute.

Held that under this finding the trustees' account of expenses fell to be taxed as between party and party, and not as between agent and client.

2D DIVISION.

On 14th July 1910 David Edward and another (James M'Gregor's testamentary trustees) (first parties), Mrs Alice Jeffs or M'Gregor or Kimbell, the testator's widow (second party), and others presented a special case for the determination of questions regarding the disposal of surplus accumulations of the income of the trust-estate, which were in the hands of the first parties and which were claimed by the second party and by others.

The case stated:—"It has been agreed that the taxed expenses of the several parties to this case shall be paid out of the surplus accumulated funds referred to, so far as still in the hands of the first parties, subject to the sanction of the Court."

On 14th July 1911 the Court pronounced an interlocutor which, after disposing of the questions in the case, contained this finding:—"Find the whole parties to the special case entitled to their expenses as the same may be taxed by the Auditor—to whom remit—out of the surplus accumulated funds in the hands of the first parties."¹

The Auditor having taxed the trustees' account of expenses as between agent and client, Mrs Kimbell lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in which she maintained that the trustees' account should be taxed as between party and party.

Parties were heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 19th December 1911.

Argued for the objector;—An interlocutor awarding expenses without qualification gave expenses as between party and party, and they could be taxed on no other scale.² This rule applied even when, by making a timeous motion, one of the parties might have obtained expenses as between agent and client.³ In the present case the agreement between the parties was that only judicial expenses should be taken out of the fund in dispute. This entailed no hardship on the trustees, as it did not affect their right to charge their extrajudicial expenses against the general trust-estate.

Argued for the respondents;—No weight should be given to the objector's contention that the trustees might recover their extrajudicial expenses from the general trust-estate, for that would lead to the inequitable result of charging a share of the expenses of this litigation against parties who had no interest in the matter in dispute. The law was that trustees who became justifiably involved in litigation in the course of their administration of the trust-estate were absolutely entitled to be kept indemnes, and if they obtained an award of expenses, these must be taxed as between agent and client, for no other scale was applicable,⁴ and an express finding that they were to be taxed on this scale was not required.⁵

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The last observation alone, by counsel for the respondents, requires to be dealt with, namely, that where trustees appear as trustees, and there is a remit to the Auditor to tax the account incurred by them, the taxation must in general be as between agent and client. That may be perfectly right in the ordinary case, because it is not disputed that trustees are entitled to be indemnified against expense incurred in the administration of the estate under their charge. But we have here a peculiar case dealing with a particular fund in the hands of the trustees.

⁵ Davidson's Trustee v. Simmons, (1896) 23 R. 1117.

The interlocutor, which proceeds on an agreement by the parties to the Dec. 19, 1911. special case, finds all the parties "entitled to their expenses as the same may be taxed by the Auditor—to whom remit—out of the surplus accumulated funds in the hands of the first parties." In these circumstances it very plainly appears that Mr Jameson's client would be subjected to absolute injustice if the first parties are to get their expenses as between agent and client out of the accumulated funds in question, for that would involve payment of a very large sum out of the half of the funds to which Mr Jameson's client has been found entitled. On the whole matter, therefore, I think that the first parties' account should be again remitted to the Auditor with instructions to tax it as between party and party.

M'Gregor's
Trustees v.
Kimbell.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree. I think the finding as to expenses, which the Court pronounced, and which proceeded on the agreement as to expenses by the parties to the special case, must be construed as a direction to the Auditor to tax the accounts of the parties, including that of the trustees, as between party and party. I am not disposed to say anything which will prevent the trustees from recovering their extrajudicial expenses out of the rest of the estate under their charge. That question, however, is not before us now.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. The trustees are among the parties to the special case, and are, therefore, parties to the agreement as to expenses. Had they chosen, they might have refused to enter into the agreement, with the result that their whole expenses, judicial and extrajudicial, would have been charged against the general trust-estate. But there was nothing to prevent them agreeing to charge their judicial expenses against the accumulated funds and their extrajudicial expenses against the general trust-estate; and I think that is the effect of the agreement as to expenses to which they were parties.

THE COURT sustained the objections, remitted the account to the Auditor to tax as between party and party, and found the objector entitled to the expenses of the discussion on the objections, modified to £2, 2s.

he had to run quickly from place to place ; and that in so doing he slipped, fell from the deck (which was unfenced), and was killed. He further averred that the footing on the deck was uncertain from the nature of the materials of which it was constructed, and that on the occasion in question it had been rendered slippery by a recent shower of rain ; that a reasonable and usual precaution for the safety of workmen was to erect a temporary fence at a place of this kind ; and that the defenders and their foreman had known of the danger to which the workmen were exposed and had negligently failed to take this precaution.

The Court dismissed the action as laid at common law as irrelevant, holding that the pursuer's record disclosed no failure of duty on the part of the employers, inasmuch as the danger averred was not a permanent danger but was one emerging in the course of the work, which fell to be dealt with by the foreman and knowledge of which could not be imputed to the employers ; but allowed an issue under the Employers Liability Act, in respect of the averment that the temporary fencing of such a place was a usual precaution which had been negligently omitted by the foreman.

Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN September 1911 Thomas M'Millan, a rigger at Whiteinch, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against Barclay, Curle, & Company, Limited, shipbuilders there, in which he claimed damages at common law, and alternatively under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in respect of the death of his son, Thomas M'Millan junior, who was killed while in the employment of the defenders.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 2) “ On or about the 5th day of July 1911, and for some time previous thereto, the said deceased Thomas M'Millan junior was in the employment of the defenders at the construction of a vessel in their shipbuilding yard at Whiteinch. He was engaged as a rivet boy, and on the said 5th July he was working in that capacity on the promenade deck of said vessel. The said deck was composed of teak, and the seams thereof were filled in with pitch, and it was the duty of the deceased to watch the riveters who were engaged on the boat deck about eight feet above, and to pick up and throw over the side of the vessel by means of two small sticks used like tongs the red-hot parings of the rivets thrown down by them upon the promenade deck. These red-hot parings were thrown down over the deck in all directions, and it was necessary for the deceased in performing his work to keep a sharp look-out on the riveters to see that none of the parings fell upon himself, and to watch where they did fall. He had to run quickly from place to place as they fell and pick them up before they set fire to the pitch on the deck or marked the teak wood. While so employed he worked under the orders and supervision of John Graham, a foreman in defenders' employment, whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour.” (Cond. 3) “ About 11 o'clock A.M. on said 5th July 1911 the pursuer was engaged at the said work ; when running to pick up a red-hot paring he slipped on the deck of said vessel and, falling over the side thereof, a distance of 55 feet or thereby, was instantaneously killed. The said deck was in a slippery condition. The pitch had become hard, and rendered footing uncertain, and the teak wood had become slippery in consequence of a rainfall that morning. Teak wood when wet always becomes slippery and uncertain to walk on. At the place where the deceased fell over there was no fencing of any kind at the edge of the deck, and nothing to prevent one who slipped on the deck from going over the side." (Cond. 4) "The death of the said deceased Thomas M'Millan junior was due to the fault and negligence of the defenders. It was their duty to take all usual, reasonable, and necessary precautions for the safety of the workmen in their employment. They knew or ought to have known that the hard pitch at the seams of the said deck made the footing uncertain, and that teak wood when wet is especially liable to become slippery. They ought, when they employed a boy like the deceased to work on the said deck, at work which necessitated his running quickly from one part of the deck to another, while taking care to avoid falling particles of red-hot rivets, to have taken precautions against his falling over the side of the deck through a stumble or slip thereon. This precaution was rendered more necessary on account of the height of the said deck from the ground. Such precautions could easily have been taken at the time the said accident happened. The stanchions, through which the rails of the said promenade deck were to be put, were in position, and ropes could easily have been fastened to them in such a way as to prevent any accident. Such a precaution is a reasonable one to take, and is usually taken in similar circumstances. The defenders, however, failed to take that or any other precaution, and left a space of several feet at the edge of the said deck without any fencing or other protection, and the accident to the deceased resulted from this failure. After the accident they erected a wooden fence at the said place." (Cond. 5) "Alternatively, the said accident was due to the fault of the defenders' superintendent, the said John Graham, for whom the defenders are responsible, in respect that he failed in the duty of superintendence entrusted to him. He was in charge of the work on the day and at the time in question, and it was his duty to take all necessary and reasonable precautions for the safety of the pursuer's said son. He ought to have erected a fence or railing along the side of said ship at the part thereof where the pursuer's said son was working. The said John Graham knew that pursuer's said son was employed on said promenade deck, and that the said teak wood deck became specially slippery after a shower of rain such as had fallen that morning, and he also knew that the side of said ship at the part thereof where the pursuer's said son was working was unfenced and unprotected. He knew, or ought to have known, that the state of the deck constituted a great danger to anyone engaged as the deceased was, in running quickly from one part to another. He could easily have erected a fence by means of a rope fastened to the iron stanchion which was in position along the edge of the deck. He failed, however, to take this or any other precautions for the safety of pursuer's said son, and this failure caused the said accident."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

The Sheriff-substitute (Craigie) allowed a proof and, on the requisition of the pursuer, the case was remitted to the Court of Session.

The pursuer having proposed issues in the ordinary form on the alternative conclusions, the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 20th December 1911, when the defenders objected to issues being allowed.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer had stated no relevant

(1) As regards the case at common law, he must aver either that the defenders had not employed a competent staff, or that they had not provided their foreman with sufficient materials, or that the system was defective. It was only on the latter ground that liability could be suggested in the present case, and the averments did not disclose a defective system. To make this complaint relevant there should be an averment that it was necessary to erect a temporary fencing from the moment that workmen were first employed on the unfinished deck.¹ It was clear from the averments that the immediate cause of the accident was the slippery condition of the deck resulting from the recent shower of rain. This was a casual danger arising in the course of the work, which fell to be dealt with as it arose, and knowledge of which could not be attributed to the employers. (2) As regards the case under the Act, the mere averment of a duty on the part of the defenders and their servants to fence was not in itself sufficient to found liability; the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances inferring a danger. A workman was not entitled to expect to find on an unfinished ship the measure of protection that would be provided on a finished vessel.² The averments only disclosed a case such as had been proved in the case of Burns v. D. & W. Henderson,³ where the Court found that there was no liability. If it was proper to allow the deck to be unfenced before the rain came on, the latter occurrence did not alter the legal aspect of the question.

Argued for the pursuer;—(The Court intimated that they required argument only on the question of liability at common law.) The pursuer had relevantly averred neglect by the defenders to take the reasonable and necessary precaution of fencing what was a dangerous place. The danger averred was not temporary or accidental, it was one, as the defenders well knew, to which men working on the deck of a vessel which had no bulwark must necessarily be exposed.⁴ That danger must always exist where ships were being built, and the fact that it had been aggravated by the shower of rain did not affect the defenders' liability.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is clear that there is here no relevant averment of liability at common law. There is no averment of a defective system, there is no averment that the defenders failed to employ a competent foreman, or that they stinted their foreman in proper materials required for the performance of his duties. All that is said is that the boy, running about the deck which was wet and slippery and not sufficiently protected by a bulwark, slipped and fell over the edge. It is said that nothing had been erected in the nature of a temporary fencing. If it was the want of a fence that caused the accident, that was not a defective system; it was a matter which was under the control of the head workman. It is quite true that the employer is bound to provide for the safety of his workmen and, if the employer fails to provide some piece of machinery or structure which is necessary to protect them against what is a permanent danger, then he is liable because he is held to have known of that danger. But he cannot be supposed to know of what may be called a casual danger emerging in the course of the work, such as that to which the boy in the present case was exposed. All he can do to protect his men against such a danger is to provide a competent foreman. There is no averment that the employer in the present case failed to provide a competent foreman, and therefore there is no fault averred at common law.

M'Millan v. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited.
 Ld. President.

On the other hand, I think a relevant case has been stated under the Employers Liability Act, because it is said that the employers' foreman, John Graham, knew of the danger, should have erected a temporary fence to protect the workmen, and failed to do so. The pursuer may be able to prove, as he avers, that there is a general custom to fence a place of this kind. On that point it would not be proper for the Court to say anything. Unless the pursuer is able to prove that there is such a general custom and that the failure to put up a temporary fence at this place was negligence, he will fail in his action. But he may be able to prove this, in which event he will be entitled to succeed.

I therefore think we should allow the issue under the Employers Liability Act.

LORD DUNDAS and LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the action as laid at common law, and allowed an issue under the Employers Liability Act.

Fraud—Facility and circumvention—Testament—Reduction—Sufficiency of averments of impetration.

In an action for the reduction of certain testamentary writings, executed during the latter years of a testator who died at the age of ninety-three, by which the children of a deceased daughter were excluded in favour of the testator's surviving children, the pursuer (an excluded grandchild) averred that the testator during the latter years of his life was in a weak and facile condition, and that one of his surviving daughters, B, taking advantage of that condition, induced him to make the testamentary dispositions complained of. The pursuer further averred that B lived alone with the testator during the latter years of his life, and undertook the management of his affairs, of which he himself was mentally and physically incapable; that during this period she obtained sums of money from him by threats, and more than once appropriated moneys without his leave for her own use; and that she prevented him from seeing his grandchildren. The pursuer, however, did not aver any specific facts regarding the impetration of the deeds, and the defenders objected that there was nothing in the pursuer's averments which could relevantly connect B with the alleged impetration.

Held that the bare averment of impetration when read along with the averments as to the surrounding facts and circumstances disclosed a relevant case of fraud and circumvention against B; and issues allowed.

1st DIVISION. ON 24th July 1911 Amelia Taylor Horsburgh brought an action against the testamentary trustees of her late grandfather, John Thomson, and against his three surviving children, concluding for reduction of certain testamentary writings of the deceased.

The testator died at the age of ninety-three on 30th March 1911, survived by his son, John Thomson, and by two daughters, Mrs Isabella Thomson or Campbell (Bella) and Mrs Jane Thomson or Watson (Jeanie), the defenders. He was predeceased by a daughter, Mrs Jessie Thomson or Horsburgh, the pursuer's mother, who died on 14th May 1900.

By his last will and testament, dated 25th January 1896, the testator provided that the liferent of his estate should be given to his wife (who was then alive, but who predeceased him on 21st October 1899), and that on her death the estate, with certain exceptions, should be divided into "four equal parts, 1st to John, 2 Jessie, 3rd Bella, 4 Jeanie, in the event of any of them dying their share to be divided to their children." The words printed in italics bore to be deleted.

Reduction was sought (1) of the deletion of the words "in the event of any of them dying their share to be divided to their children," occurring in the clause above quoted, and of a marginal addition thereto in these terms:—"I withdraw this. JOHN THOMSON"; and (2) of two codicils, dated 19th January 1901 and 1st October 1907 respectively, and a third codicil (undated) which was in these terms:—"Bella is get (sic) the ground in the Western Cemetery."

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that the defender Mrs Campbell, after her husband's death in 1900, made her permanent home with the testator, and that from that date the only occupants of his house in Dundee were himself, Mrs Campbell, and a maid.

She further averred:—(Cond. 3) " . . . In the year 1899, shortly before Mrs Thomson's death, and when Mrs Horsburgh was also seriously ill and little hopes entertained of her ultimate recovery, Mr Thomson sent for her to come into Dundee to see him. Mrs Horsburgh went to the house at 11 Nethergate, Dundee, as desired, and saw her parents. Her father, Mr Thomson, on that occasion acquainted her with the terms of the said will and testament of 1896, and requested her not to worry about money matters as he had made it all right for her children. . . ." (Cond. 4) "After Mrs Horsburgh's death her husband and her children continued on friendly terms with Mr John Thomson. Mr Horsburgh, who was nominated an executor in the will and testament of 1896, called for him once a fortnight, as had been his custom for years, and the pursuer and her brothers and sisters also paid him visits at frequent intervals. It soon became noticeable to them, however, that there was a change in Mrs Campbell's attitude towards them, and this became still more apparent after Mr Horsburgh's death in 1905. When the pursuer or any of her brothers or sisters called they were not shown as formerly into their grandfather's presence, but were put into an ante room to await Mrs Campbell. They had great difficulty in seeing their grandfather at all, and on their expressing a wish to do so were always put off by some excuse made by Mrs Campbell, who excluded them from seeing their grandfather. Their grandfather, who formerly sat in a front room, was kept by Mrs Campbell in a small back room, and during the last four or five years prior to his death the pursuer was only able to see him on two occasions, although she called very frequently to ask for him. It was evident to the pursuer and her brothers and sisters that Mrs Campbell did not want them to call at their grandfather's home, and that Mrs Campbell was endeavouring to estrange the affection in which their grandfather had held them and to cause him to forget them altogether. Neither Mrs Campbell nor Mrs Watson took any interest in the pursuer or her brothers or sisters." (Cond. 5) "The late Mr John Thomson was, at his wife's death, over eighty years of age, and thereafter changed very rapidly in his mental capacity. He became taciturn and reserved, and could only keep up a conversation with difficulty. About or shortly after this time his memory began to be defective, and he could not grasp the meaning of things. His mental condition became gradually worse, owing to advancing age and senile decay, and before Mr Horsburgh's death in 1905 it was obvious that he was quite unable to attend to any business affairs. From 1905 onwards the symptoms became worse, he was quite unable to read, and he could not distinguish the different coins of the realm, he had frequent attacks of heart seizure, but when he recovered he could not recollect that he had been ill. He was dazed and stupid. He was unable to talk with intelligence on any subject, and he took no interest in his own affairs. The enfeebled physical and mental condition of the said John Thomson was well known to the defenders, who both verbally and in writing expressed the opinion that he was no longer capable of managing his own affairs. He had no friends, having outlived his contemporaries, and he spent the last four or five years of his life sitting gazing into the fire in the back room. The pursuer believes and avers that from the year 1900 until the date of his death the said John Thomson was mentally incapable of disposing of his estate, or of giving intelligent directions for its disposal, and that the deeds sought to be reduced are thus not the deeds of the deceased, and that he was not mentally capable of making the deletion in question, *which was as aftermentioned made on or about 1st October 1907. Even assuming that deceased was mentally capable of executing the said deeds and making said deletion, which is denied, he was at the dates in question weak and facile in mind, and easily imposed upon, and the defender Mrs Campbell, as before and aftermentioned, taking advantage of his said weakness and facility, procured the said documents from him to his lesion. Denied that the said John Thomson wrote said codicil after legal advice from his law-agents. The defenders are called upon to name the law-agent alleged to have been consulted. Denied that the said deletion was prior in date to any extent to said codicil of 1st October 1907." (Cond. 6) "After Mrs Thomson's death Mrs Campbell obtained a great influence over the said John Thomson. She assumed the management of his affairs, and intromitted with the rents of his property.

Horsburgh v.
Thomson's
Trustees.

She demanded various sums at different times as remuneration for additional trouble in nursing him during his frequent heart attacks and obtained these sums by threatening to go away and leave him to strangers. He was pliable in her hands, and was unable to resist any suggestion she made, and she prevented him seeing his other relatives, or at any rate the pursuer and her brothers and sisters. On several occasions Mrs Campbell applied for her own use, without her father's knowledge, sums of money belonging to him. Mrs Watson, who was aware of Mrs Campbell's actings, was given a portion of these monies to ensure her silence. The deceased, in his younger days, was particularly careful of money, indeed miserly, but for years before his death, and in particular at and prior to the date of the deeds sought to be reduced, he was quite unable to look after money or appreciate its value. Mrs Campbell in particular taking advantage of the said John Thomson's facility, got into her possession the money which the said John Thomson had deposited with the Dundee Savings Bank or other Dundee bank, and applied it for her own purposes. She also, without his knowledge or consent, collected and applied to her own use a sum of money due to him by the tenants of his Melville House property. The said John Thomson, during the last five or six years of his life, owing to old age, weakness, and facility, was in a condition to be influenced by anyone who desired to take advantage of his facility, and the pursuer avers that Mrs Campbell, taking advantage of the deceased's weakness and facility, on or about 1st October 1907, induced him to delete from his last will and testament the said clause in favour of the children of any predeceasing parent, and to execute the said pretended withdrawal, and the said pretended codicil in favour of the defenders Mrs Campbell, Mrs Watson, and Mr John Thomson, when he was in such a condition physically and mentally as not to be able to resist Mrs Campbell's influence and the pressure which she brought to bear on the deceased to make the foresaid deletion and to execute the deeds under reduction. The said Mrs Watson and Mrs Campbell are and have been on terms of great intimacy for some years, although formerly they were otherwise, and it is averred that they decided to have the pursuer and her brothers and sisters disinherited, being influenced through greed and a desire to hurt the pursuer and her brothers and sisters, towards whom they had conceived an ill-will. The pursuer further avers that the pretended codicil of 19th January 1901, and the pretended codicil dealing with the ground in the Western Cemetery, were similarly procured by the said Mrs Campbell at a time when the said John Thomson was incapable of appreciating their import and effect, or executing them, and in any event when he was weak and facile and easily imposed upon and circumvented by Mrs Campbell. In these circumstances the deletion and withdrawal in said last will and testament, and the said three pretended codicils, all under reduction, were impetrated from the deceased by the defender Mrs Campbell by fraud or circumvention when he was weak and facile, and this action has accordingly been rendered necessary."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said pretended deletion and withdrawal in said last will and testament and the said three pretended codicils not being the deeds of the deceased John Thomson, decree of reduction should be pronounced as craved. (2) The said pretended deletion and withdrawal, and the said three pretended codicils having been impetrated from the deceased John Thomson by the defender

Mrs Campbell by fraud or circumvention, when the said deceased was weak and facile and easily imposed on, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as craved.

Dec. 20, 1911.

Horsburgh v.
Thomson's
Trustees.

Separate defences were lodged for Mrs Campbell and for the other defenders. In her defences Mrs Campbell pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's averments of facility and circumvention are irrelevant and wanting in specification, and ought not to be remitted to probation.

On 7th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) repelled, inter alia, the plea for Mrs Campbell above quoted, and approved of issues for the trial of the cause. By this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary allowed six issues, the first three of which were as to whether the writings in question were not the deeds of the testator, and the last three were whether they had been obtained by fraud and circumvention.*

* "OPINION.—In my judgment the averments contained in cond. 5 are clearly relevant to infer that the deceased Mr Thomson was not of sound disposing mind at the dates of the writings which are sought to be reduced.

"With regard to the questions raised by issues 4, 5, and 6 [being those upon the plea of facility, fraud, and circumvention], it was not disputed by defenders' counsel that weakness and facility were relevantly averred, and I think it must be taken from all that is said about her and her relations to her father that the defender Mrs Campbell had very great influence with and over her father. That fact of itself does not raise any presumption against the fair dealing of Mrs Campbell. It was only natural that she should have such influence and that he should repose very great confidence in her, and it was quite proper, if not necessary in the circumstances, that she should take into her own hands the entire management of the household affairs. But it is averred—I give the substance of the averment—that she abused the confidence of her father and that she appropriated to her own use, more than once, sums of money which she had no right to take, and that she bribed her sister to hold her tongue with regard to these delinquencies. The averments may be absolutely untrue, but I am bound at this stage of the proceedings to assume the contrary, and the incidents referred to must be taken as instructing at once the inability of the deceased to protect himself against his daughter, and of the readiness of the daughter, when she had a purpose to serve, to take advantage of her father's weakened state of health.

"It was maintained, however, by the defenders that there was nothing said on record to connect any instance of Mrs Campbell's alleged abuse of her father's trust in her with the impetration of the writings sought to be reduced. There is much force in this contention, and it is, I think, literally correct, but at the same time I should, in my opinion, be reading the record too strictly if I were to give effect to it. The averments of impetration in cond. 5 and cond. 6, though expressed in general terms, are just the accustomed averments made in cases like the present, and they must not be dissociated from the setting in which they are found. Regarding and reading them in the light of the other averments in the record, I am bound on the authority of the cases cited at the Bar—inter alia, Rooney, 22 R. 761; Williams v. Philip, 15 S. L. T. 396—to hold that there is sufficient matter to found an issue of facility and circumvention. There is an averment of motive, and the statements as to what Mr Thomson said to the pursuer's mother about not worrying about money matters as he had provided for her children, and the denial by Mrs Campbell to his grandchildren of access to their grandfather's room, go some way to meet what seems to me otherwise a well-founded argument of the defenders on the terms of the writings themselves.

"As regards the absence of any specific averment of the arts and wiles

Horsburgh v.
Thomson's
Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 20th December 1911.

Argued for the reclaimers ;—The reclaimers challenged the allowance of the issues of fraud and circumvention on the ground that there were no averments on record which were relevant to connect Mrs Campbell with the impetration of the writings in question. The averment in article 6 was in words of style only, and was lacking in specification. If the pursuer did not aver facts and circumstances regarding the manner and occasion of the alleged impetration, she must, at least, aver undue influence acquired and an unnatural deed resulting.¹ The test in such a case was whether the deed was such that only persuasion working on a facile mind could have brought it about. No undue influence was to be deduced from the fact that this widowed daughter lived with and took entire charge of her aged father during his declining years—a relationship that was natural and normal. In the circumstances the averments did not show an undue favouring of Mrs Campbell (whose own issue would have been excluded had she predeceased), much less that the testator's provisions were unnatural. It was not unnatural for a grandparent to exclude grandchildren for the benefit of his own children. Apart from the bald averment of impetration what was said against Mrs Campbell amounted, at the highest, to this, that she had abused the position in which she was placed by her father to the extent of not allowing his grandchildren to see him. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary² were distinguishable. In both of these there were specific averments of the circumstances of the impetration that were wanting here.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon to reply.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary is right, indeed I think the whole of the reclaimers' argument was only made possible by the confusion of two questions, the question of what is a relevant averment and the question of what the pursuer must prove in order to succeed in the action.

I do not know what the pursuer could have averred beyond saying that the testator was in a weak and facile state of mind. She must prove that before she goes any further, and if she does not prove that her case goes. Having proved that, she must proceed to show that some particular person impetrated the deed. She has stated that this was done by Mrs practised by the defender, the case of Clunie, 17 D. 15, warrants the view that precise details of the mode of circumvention are not required. Much must of course depend on the circumstances of each particular case. Here it may be noted that the writings are all holograph of the deceased, and the assistance of an agent was not therefore required for their execution, and the locus of the impetration was the deceased's room from which he was unable to move. On the whole matter it seems to me that it would not be safe to dispose of the question of facility and circumvention without inquiry, and I see no reason for not following the usual course and sending the case to a jury. I shall therefore approve of the issues proposed by the pursuer."

 great point has been made by the defenders that anyone could make such a statement. That is quite true, but such a statement would only carry a pursuer the length of a proof and no further. Horsburgh v. Thomson's Trustees.

After all, I do not think that it can be said, in fairness to the pursuer, Ld. President. that her averments are so bald as they were argued to be, because you cannot dissociate the statement in cond. 6 from what I may call its setting as set forth in cond. 5. I wish to say very little on this point, and I am far from saying that that setting would necessarily lead to a conclusion that is inimical to the defenders. It is just one of those settings which it is for a jury to consider, and to say whether it does or does not give rise to the imputed suspicions.

I think this is a case that may perfectly well be tried under the recognised issues that have been allowed here.

Swan's Trustees v. Swan.

Succession—Vesting—Payment at the age of twenty-five after expiry of life-rent—Declaration referring vesting to "period of payment"—Accretion—Children "then surviving" and their issue—Issue of predeceasing children.

A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to divide his estate into shares and to hold the shares for his children, and their respective spouses, in life-rent, and for their respective children in fee. It was declared that the shares of any of his children dying without leaving issue should accrete "to my other children then surviving in life-rent and to their respective issue in fee"; that the shares should not be paid to any of the heirs until they attained the age of twenty-five; and that the fee should not vest until "the period of payment" arrived.

Held (1) that no right in a share of the estate, whether original or accreting, vested in a grandchild until he attained the age of twenty-five and the life-rents of his parents terminated; and (2) that under the clause of accretion the share of one of the testator's children who died without issue passed to the other children alive at her death in life-rent, and to their issue in fee, to the exclusion of the issue of children then dead.

By this trust-disposition and settlement he conferred upon his wife the liferent of his whole estate, and provided as follows:—"I direct my trustees to divide the residue of my estate, heritable and moveable, into seven [which was changed by the codicil to 'eight'] equal shares, and (first) to invest and hold one share thereof for the liferent use allenary of my son Robert Swan, and thereafter for the liferent use allenary of any wife he may marry, but that so long only as she remains his widow, and to his children equally share and share alike in fee; (second)—[Here followed six purposes in which a share was conferred on each of his other children (except his son Matthew) and their respective spouses in liferent, and on their issue in fee, in the same terms as in the above purpose. By the codicil a share in the same terms was given to Matthew, his wife, and his children.]—and I hereby provide and declare that in the event of any of my said sons and daughters who are beneficiaries under these presents dying without leaving lawful issue, the fee of their shares shall fall and accresce to my other children then surviving in liferent, and to their respective issue in fee, providing and declaring also that the fee of my estates shall not be paid to any of the fiars until they attain the age of twenty-five years, but my trustees may apply the annual income arising from any fiar's share after the liferents thereof are satisfied for the maintenance and education of any such fiar until they arrive at that age; and further, providing and declaring that the fee of my estates shall not vest in any of my beneficiaries until the period of payment has arrived."

The testator was survived by his wife, who died in 1910. He had the following eight children:—

Maggie (Mrs Robert M'Kechnie)	}	who both predeceased the testator, leaving issue;
Jeanie (Mrs Begg)
Agnes (Mrs John M'Kechnie),		who survived the testator, but died before 1909, leaving issue;
Jessie, who also survived the testator and died unmarried in 1909; and
Robert,	}	who were all alive at the date of this case, and had issue.
Mary (Mrs Young)
John,
Matthew,

Maggie's husband predeceased Jessie; the husbands of Jeanie and Agnes were alive at the date of the case.

Questions having arisen as to the construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court. The first parties to the case were the testamentary trustees; the second parties were the testator's children who survived his daughter Jessie (Robert, Mary, John, and Matthew), their children, and the grandchildren of Mary; the third parties were the surviving husbands and descendants of the three deceased daughters Maggie, Jeanie, and Agnes; the fourth parties were the heirs of the testator's daughter Jessie; the fifth parties were the whole children and grandchildren, who were under the age of twenty-five, of the testator's children; the sixth parties were the surviving children of the testator's children Robert, Mary, John, and Matthew, and the children of deceased children of Mary; the seventh parties were the issue of the testator's deceased children Dec. 21, 1911.

Agnes and Jeanie; the eighth parties were the immediate issue of the testator's children Robert, Mary, John, and Matthew, as at Jessie's death, and the children of such immediate issue as predeceased Jessie; and the ninth parties were David Begg, the husband of the testator's deceased daughter Jeanie, and his two children. Swan's Trustees v. Swan.

It was stated in the case that David Begg was willing to discharge the liferent of any share falling to him in liferent and to his children in fee in favour of these children, who were all over twenty-five years of age.

The second parties maintained that the share of residue destined to Jessie Swan in liferent accresced to the immediate children of the testator who survived her in liferent and to their issue in fee, to the exclusion of the surviving issue of children who predeceased her. The third parties maintained that as Jessie Swan never was a beneficiary under the trust-disposition and settlement, in respect that she predeceased the period when any bequest in her favour took effect, the provision as to accretion was inapplicable to her share, and that the whole residue fell to be divided into seven shares, or alternatively that the said Jessie Swan's share had not been disposed of, and fell to be distributed as intestate succession of the testator.

The first parties maintained that on a sound construction of the testamentary writings no beneficiary thereunder took a vested interest in any share of the estate, whether original or accrescing, until all liferents affecting such share had expired, and until such beneficiary attained the age of twenty-five. The fifth parties maintained that vesting was not postponed until the beneficiaries respectively attained the age of twenty-five. The sixth parties maintained that vesting of the respective shares was not postponed until the death of liferenters of the said shares, who were children of the testator. The seventh parties maintained that vesting of their respective shares was not postponed until the expiry of the liferents of their fathers, who were husbands of the testator's deceased daughters. The eighth parties maintained that the vesting clause in the trust-disposition and settlement did not apply to accrescing shares. The ninth parties maintained that, as Mrs Begg was dead and her children were over twenty-five years of age, their shares had vested, and that, on their father discharging his liferent, the first parties were bound to pay to the children the fee of the share falling to them. The first parties maintained that these shares had not vested; that vesting could not be accelerated by discharging the liferent; and that they were not therefore entitled to make this payment.

The questions of law in the case were, inter alia, as follows:—“(1) Does the whole residue fall to be divided into seven shares, to be held and applied in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicil? or, (2) Does the share of the residue, originally destined for Miss Jessie Swan in liferent, fall to be divided amongst the immediate children of the testator who were in life at Jessie Swan's death in liferent and their issue in fee, so as to exclude the surviving issue of any child of the testator who predeceased the said Jessie Swan? or, (3) Does said share fall to be distributed as intestate succession of the testator? (4) Is vesting in the issue of the testator's children postponed until (a) they respectively attain the age of twenty-five years; (b) the death of their respective parents, who are liferenters and who are children of the testator; (c) the death of all

Dec. 21, 1911. Swan's Trustees v. Swan. liferenters of their respective shares, whether children of the testator or not, or until which of said events? (9) Does the answer to the previous question apply to accrescing as well as to original shares? (10) Are the issue of the testator's deceased child, Jeanie Swan or Begg, in respect that they have attained the age of twenty-five years, entitled to immediate payment of their shares in the event of their father discharging his liferent?"

The case having been sent to the Short Roll, a note was thereafter presented to the Lord Justice-Clerk by the first parties stating that Jeanie M'Intyre Begg (one of the parties of the third, fourth, seventh, and ninth parts) was insane and confined in an asylum. The note further stated that she had not been cognosced and had no curator bonis, and craved his Lordship to appoint a curator ad litem to her. The Court appointed Mr Boase, advocate, to be curator ad litem to her.

The curator ad litem thereafter lodged a minute in which he drew the attention of the Court to the fact that, so far as he could ascertain, a curator ad litem had never been appointed to an insane party to a special case. He referred to the undernoted cases.¹

The case was heard before the Second Division on 6th December 1911.

At the hearing counsel for the first, third, fifth, seventh, and ninth parties submitted, with regard to the point raised by the curator ad litem, that it was not necessary that a curator bonis should be appointed. The curator ad litem was an officer of Court, and would sufficiently protect the interests of the party. In the circumstances of the present case a curator bonis could not appropriately be appointed. Apart from her interest in her grandfather's estate, Jeanie Begg had no property; and it depended on the issue of this case whether she would have any property which would fall to be administered for her. The proper guardian of her interest, therefore, was a curator ad litem and not a curator bonis. *Park v. Park*² was really overruled by Ross v. Tennant's Trustees.³ Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees,⁴ Scott v. Scott,⁵ and *Rossie v. Rossie*⁶ were also referred to.

The Court (without pronouncing any interlocutor) intimated that, while it was proper that this point should be brought to their notice, they did not consider it to be necessary that a curator bonis should be appointed; and allowed the case to proceed.

The curator ad litem then lodged a minute approving of, and adopting, the special case.

Argued for the first parties;—(On questions 8-10)—Vesting was suspended in the case of each fiar until the liferents attaching to the share of the estate in which he was interested had expired and until also he attained the age of twenty-five. This was the clear effect of the declaration as to vesting in the settlement. In that clause "vest" meant vest in point of interest, and could not be construed as referring to possession of the share, and, as there was nothing in the Dec. 21, 1911. frame of the settlement inconsistent with the declaration, there was no ground for refusing effect to it. Accordingly the declaration was ^{Swan's} Trustees v. decisive against vesting before the time at which payment could be ^{Swan.} made.¹ There was nothing to limit the application of the declaration to the original shares, and, therefore, it applied to accreting shares as well. If vesting was suspended, there could be no acceleration of payment, and, accordingly, the tenth question must be answered in the negative.

Argued for the third, fifth, seventh, and ninth parties;—(On questions 8-10)—Apart from the declaration in the concluding clause of the bequest, there was nothing to postpone vesting. There was no destination-over or survivorship clause, and no trust purpose which necessitated postponement of vesting. But the declaration was said to suspend vesting. As to this, it was to be observed that the declaration provided that vesting was not to take place till the "period of payment"; and as the words constituting the bequests bore no reference to payment, and the only portion of the settlement which mentioned payment was the clause providing that the shares were not to be paid until the beneficiaries attained the age of twenty-five, it followed that the "period of payment" must be construed as meaning the time at which a beneficiary reached that age. It was highly improbable that the testator intended that vesting should be suspended during the lifetime not only of his child, but of that child's spouse.² In *M'Ewan's Trustees v. Macdonald's Trustees*³ the decision was based on the special terms of the will there before the Court. Question 8 (a) should be answered in the affirmative; question 9 did not affect these beneficiaries; and the answer to question 10 depended on the answer to question 8. (On question 2)—This question should be answered in the negative. On a sound construction of the accretion clause the words "then surviving" applied only to the testator's children as liferenters. The accreting share was to be liferented by the surviving children; but the fee was to go to the issue of "my other children," i.e., the issue of the whole of the testator's children. To hold that under the clause the issue of predeceasing children were excluded would be to attribute to the testator a capricious and unnatural intention.

Argued for the second, fourth, sixth, and eighth parties;—(On question 2)—The natural construction of the accretion clause was that the surviving children were to enjoy liferents, and the issue of these surviving children were to take the fee.⁴ There was no ground for construing "surviving" as meaning "other." Question 2, therefore, should be answered in the affirmative.

The interpretation of these two writings does not present any serious difficulty, but some of the ten questions above referred to are so framed that I have found it a little difficult to answer them.

Swan's
Trustees v.
Swan.

Lord
Skerrington.

The material facts and dates are as follows :—The testator died on 23rd November 1890. His widow, upon whom he conferred a universal liferent, died on 2nd May 1910. He had eight children, two of whom (daughters) predeceased him leaving issue. Of the six remaining children four are still alive ; one (a daughter) predeceased her mother, leaving issue, while another daughter, Jessie, died unmarried and intestate in 1909—thus also predeceasing her mother. The scheme of the will is as follows :—[His Lordship referred to certain provisions with regard to heritable properties.] By the last purpose he directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, into seven (by the codicil, eight) equal shares, and to invest and hold one share for the liferent use allenary of each child, and thereafter of such child's husband or wife, and for his or her children in fee.

The first query in the special case falls to be answered in the negative. The second query refers to the share of residue which the trustees were directed to invest and hold for the liferent use allenary of the testator's daughter Jessie and her children in fee. Seeing that Jessie died unmarried the direction applies that the fee of her share "shall fall and accresce to my other children then surviving in liferent and to their respective issue in fee." The question to be determined is whether this clause makes it a condition that no grandchild of the testator shall take any interest in the fee of Jessie's share unless the parent of such grandchild (being a child of the testator) was alive at the date of Jessie's death. Such a provision may be capricious and unreasonable, but I see no doubt as to the meaning of the words used by the testator. It is, of course, possible to read the expression "their respective issue" as meaning the issue of the testator's "other children," whether these latter were or were not alive at the time of Jessie's death. A Court of construction is not, however, entitled to reject the plain and primary meaning of a testator's words merely in order to avoid a result which may appear to be capricious and unreasonable. The answer to any such contention is to be found in the opinion of Lord Kinnear in Ward v. Lang,¹ a case which, though very similar to the present one, was not cited at the debate. The House of Lords case of *Richardson and Others v. Macdougall and Others*² was cited at the debate, and supports the view that the clause should be construed according to its literal and grammatical meaning. I am therefore of opinion that the second query should be answered in the affirmative.—[His Lordship then dealt with certain questions arising on the special terms of the settlement, with which this report is not concerned.]

The eighth query raises the question as to the date when the bequests contained in the will vest in the testator's grandchildren. The testator declared, towards the end of his will, that "the fee of my estates shall not vest in any of my beneficiaries until the period of payment has arrived." Dec. 21, 1911. Seeing that the testator's widow enjoyed the liferent of his whole undivided estate, and that, as regards the eight shares of residue, liferents were created in favour of the testator's children and their spouses, the period of payment could not arrive until (to quote the language of the will), all these liferents of the respective shares had been satisfied. But the testator further expressly directed that the fee of his estate should "not be paid to any of the fiars until they attain the age of twenty-five years." Accordingly, the period of payment of each share of residue is postponed as regards each beneficiary until he has attained the age of twenty-five years, and until all the liferents of the respective shares have come to their natural termination. It was argued, with what seems to me to be perverse ingenuity, that the phrase "period of payment" does not mean what it says, but that the date when each fiar attains the age of twenty-five is the "period of payment" within the meaning of this will, although admittedly the issue of the testator's children had no right to demand payment until all the liferents of the respective shares had expired, and although they could not accelerate payment by procuring a renunciation of the liferents forming a burden on their respective shares. The argument of the learned counsel proceeded upon an assumption which is absolutely erroneous, viz. :—that the testator directed payment to be made upon the respective beneficiaries attaining the age of twenty-five ; whereas he merely declared that payment should not be made until they attained that age. Counsel also cited the Second Division case of M'Kay's Trustees v. Gray,¹ but I cannot regard that decision as an authority, seeing that no argument was (so far as appears from the report) offered in favour of what seems to me to have been the natural meaning of the will. The Judges were asked to elect between the views that vesting took place at the beneficiary's majority, or alternatively, at the death of the widow. It does not appear to have been argued that the period of payment could not arrive without the concurrence of both events. In a later case—*M'Ewan's Trustees v. Macdonald's Trustees*²—the same Division decided that the period of payment, and consequently of vesting, did not arrive until the death of the surviving spouse. It was unnecessary to decide whether vesting was still further postponed. There is a later decision of the same Division—*Gray's Trustees v. Gray*³—which was not cited at the debate, in which the "period of payment" was held to depend upon the concurrence of both events, viz., the lapse of the widow's liferent and the majority of the beneficiary. I have dealt with these authorities as being more or less in point ; but, after all, the present case, like all others of its kind, must be decided upon the best construction one can put upon the language of the particular instrument under consideration. So viewing the matter I think that the proper answer to the eighth query is that vesting was postponed until the occurrence of all the events therein mentioned. The ninth query must be answered in the affirmative, and the tenth in the negative.

THE COURT answered the second and ninth questions of law in the affirmative ; the first, third, and tenth questions in the Marriage-Contract—Antenuptial contract—Provisions in lieu of legitim—Power to revoke—Reserved power—Repugnancy.

A father by his marriage-contract settled on the children of the marriage or of any future marriage, equally or as he might appoint, the whole estate (subject to an annuity and certain liferents) then belonging to him or which might belong to him at his death, in satisfaction of their legitim, but reserved power to revoke or vary the provisions in their favour.

Held that this reservation was not repugnant to the other provisions of the deed but was valid and effectual, and that the reserved power had been duly exercised by the father in his testamentary settlement, by which (after providing for certain annuities and a legacy) he bequeathed his whole estate to the children of the marriage in liferent and to their issue in fee.

Fowler's Trustees v. Fowler, (1898) 25 R. 1034, followed.

Opinion reserved as to the validity of the clause excluding legitim, if the reserved power had been exercised so as to disinherit any of the children.

2D DIVISION.

GEORGE SIMPSON, wine and spirit merchant, Edinburgh, died on 11th November 1896, survived by his wife and five children.

By his antenuptial marriage-contract, executed in 1862, Mr Simpson bound himself and his heirs and executors to pay to his widow an annuity of £50 a year, so long as she remained his widow, and assigned to her for her liferent use allanarly the whole furniture belonging to him at his death; and undertook to dispoine a heritable subject to his sister Mary in liferent allanarly. The deed then provided:—"And for a provision to the children of the said George Simpson, he, under burden of his own liferent, hereby dispoines, assigns, conveys, and makes over from him, his heirs and successors, to and in favour of the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, and of any other marriage which he, the said George Simpson, may contract, but that always in the terms, upon the conditions, and under the burdens and reservations hereinafter expressed, all and whole the whole heritable and moveable estate, other than that now settled or to be settled on his sister Mary as aforesaid, now belonging or that shall pertain and belong to him, the said George Simpson, at the time of his death, including his whole household furniture and other plenishing, which furniture and plenishing is to be liferented by his widow as aforesaid; together with the vouchers and instructions and writs and evidents thereof: Reserving to the said George Simpson power at any time during his life, and even on deathbed, to increase the provisions in favour of his widow, and to allocate and distribute the residue of his said whole means and estate among his said whole children in such proportions or shares, and under such conditions as he shall think proper"; and failing such allocation, the provision was to be divided equally among his children and the issue of predeceasing children. It was declared that the provisions in favour of the widow were to be in full satisfaction of her legal rights, and that the provisions in favour of the children "shall be and are to be accepted of by them as in full satisfaction of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, portion natural, executry, and every other thing which they could ask, claim, or demand by and through the decease of the said George Simpson their father."

Simpson's
Trustees v.
Taylor.

The intended wife, on the other hand, disposed to her children and their heirs the whole estate to which she should succeed through the death of her mother; and it was provided that execution for implementation of the provisions in favour of the wife and children should pass at the instance of certain persons. Mr Simpson appointed these persons to be his sole executors, and conferred on them sundry powers regarding the management of the estate. Following upon these clauses, and preceding the clause of consent to registration of the deed and the testing-clause, there occurred the following clause:—"And the said George Simpson reserves his own liferent and power to revoke, alter, or vary these presents in so far as regards the provisions to his children as aforesaid: And he dispenses with the delivery hereof."

On 1st March 1892 Mr Simpson executed a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees. By this settlement he directed his trustees to implement the marriage-contract provisions in favour of his wife, and, in addition, to pay her an annuity of £350 so long as she remained his widow and to allow her the liferent use of his dwelling-house. After provisions for the payment of the income of a sum of £1000 to his sister-in-law and for the conveyance of certain heritable subjects to his second son, he directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his children in liferent and their issue in fee. The settlement also contained this declaration:—"Declaring that in consequence of my estate having very materially increased since the date of my marriage, it is my desire and intention that the foregoing provisions in favour of my said children shall come in place of and supersede the provisions conferred on them under the foresaid antenuptial contract of marriage, . . . and that the provisions hereinbefore mentioned shall be in full of all they can ask or claim by or through my decease." It was further provided that in the event of any of the children successfully challenging this deed, that child's share was to be restricted to £1000, the balance of the share accreting to the other children.

A question having arisen on Mr Simpson's death as to his power to revoke the provisions to the children in the marriage-contract, a special case was presented on 2nd March 1911, to which the trustees under his trust-disposition and settlement were the first parties; his widow the second party; his three daughters the third parties; his only son surviving at the date of the case the fourth party; his sister-in-law the fifth party; and his grandchildren the sixth parties.

The questions of law were, inter alia:—" (1) Was the reservation by George Simpson of power to revoke, alter, or vary the provisions to his children in the marriage-contract a valid and effectual reserva-

Dec. 21, 1911. Simpson's Trustees v. Taylor. tion by him? (2) If the first question is answered in the affirmative, was the power to revoke, alter, or vary validly exercised by the trust-disposition and settlement?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 28th and 29th November 1911.

Argued for the first, second, fifth, and sixth parties;—In the marriage-contract Mr Simpson explicitly reserved the power to revoke the children's provisions. That reservation was valid and effectual,¹ and the reserved power had been exercised in the trust-disposition and settlement. There was no ground for maintaining that the reservation was repugnant to the nature of a marriage-contract. As to the discharge of legitim in the marriage-contract, it was still an open question whether the discharge of legitim might not be effectual even if no substitutionary provision were made for the children.² But the weight of authority was in favour of the view that, even in such circumstances, the discharge would be valid.³ The clause of reservation could not be construed as limited to giving effect to the power to increase the widow's annuity and to apportion the children's shares. That was not its natural meaning, and was quite inconsistent with the use of the word "revoke."

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The power of revocation reserved in the marriage-contract, if it were to be construed in the manner contended for by the other parties, was repugnant to the nature of the deed in which it appeared. The deed professed to belong to a class of contracts of which the characteristic feature was their irrevocability. The provision in question was presumably contractual, for provisions to wives and children were always presumed to be contractual, and legitim was carefully discharged. A discharge of legitim was not, however, effectual unless a substitutionary provision were assured to the children⁴; and the explicit declaration that legitim was excluded would go for nothing if the contract were held to be revocable by the father. The fact that the children of a second marriage were admitted to participate in the provision in the marriage-contract in no way detracted from the contractual nature of that deed,⁵ for the marriage-contract did no more than explicitly confer on the father a power in regard to his second family which he would have had at common law.⁶ If the other parties' construction of the clause of revocation were sound, then all the careful contractual provisions of the marriage-contract would be nullified. But benedicta est expositio quando res redimitur a destructione; and if there was any possible construction which would tend to support the contract, that construction ought to be adopted.⁷ Now, the clause in question contained in the first place a reservation of the father's liferent. That was a repetition of an earlier provision in the deed. It was possible and probable then that the power to Dec. 21, 1911.

 "revoke, alter, or vary" the provisions to the children might also be repetitive. And in the earlier part of the deed there was a provision ^{Simpson's} which satisfied these words, viz., the power to the father to increase ^{Trustees v.} the wife's annuity—which would pro tanto be a revocation or alteration of the children's provisions—and the power to apportion their shares among the children. Finally, the words "as aforesaid" at the end of the clause were to be construed as qualifying the verbs in the clause; and, so construed, it became plain that no power which was not given in the earlier part of the contract was thereby reserved. The case of *Fowler's Trustees*¹ did not apply here, for there the power which led to the revocation was one of the trust purposes under the contract.

At advising on 21st December 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The late George Simpson, wine and spirit merchant, died on 11th November 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1892. In 1862 he had entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage with Miss Catherine Forbes, by whom, and by five children of their marriage, he was survived. By that contract, after binding himself and his heirs and executors to pay an annuity to his wife, if she survived him, and to settle a small heritable subject upon his sister in liferent, Mr Simpson, for a provision to his children, under burden of his own liferent, disposed and conveyed from him, his heirs and successors, to and in favour of the children to be procreated of the marriage, and of any other marriage he might contract, but always in the terms, upon the conditions, and under the burdens and reservations thereafter expressed, the whole heritable and moveable estate (with the unimportant exception of the property to be settled upon his sister) then belonging to him, or which should belong to him at the time of his death, reserving power to himself to allocate and distribute the residue of his whole means and estate among his said whole children, in such proportions or shares, and under such conditions, as he should think proper; and it was stipulated that the provisions in favour of his children should be, and were to be, accepted by them as in full satisfaction of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, portion natural, executry, and every other thing they could claim or demand by and through his decease. There is no need to discuss—though a good deal was said about it in the argument at our Bar—whether, as matter of general policy, it is wise and prudent, or the reverse, for a contracting party to tie up irrevocably, on the occasion of his marriage, his whole present and future fortune and estate. The thing is not uncommonly done, and is certainly not illegal, nor (if proper phraseology is used) ineffectual. By the contract under consideration the intending wife, for the causes above summarised and on the other part, made certain provisions; and it was agreed that execution for implement of the provisions in favour of her and the children should pass at the instance of persons named, who were also appointed to be Mr Simpson's sole executors. Various powers of an ordinary character were then conferred on these persons; and at the very end of the document there occurred this singular clause, "And the said George Simpson reserves his own liferent and power Dec. 21, 1911. to revoke, alter, or vary these presents in so far as regards the provisions to his children as aforesaid."

Simpson's
Trustees v.
Taylor.

Lord Dundas.

The main question for our decision is whether Mr Simpson's estate was irrevocably destined by the marriage-contract as a provision for his children, or whether, looking to the terms of the clause just quoted, he is entitled to alter that provision by a subsequent testamentary settlement. It was contended by counsel for some of the parties to the case that a power to revoke, alter, or vary the provision made for the children in the antenuptial contract of marriage was wholly invalid, and must be held pro non scripto, as repugnant to the nature of the contract. The clause is certainly a very unusual one to find place in a marriage-contract; and it occurs oddly as regards sequence and collocation; but I am not prepared to treat it in the way suggested. Its language is not, to my mind, at all ambiguous, and I cannot accept the argument that it was intended merely as a superfluous echo or repetition of the power to allocate and distribute, already reserved by Mr Simpson. We cannot, I think, deny all legal effect to the clause. The case of Fowler's Trustees,¹ to which we were referred, seems to support this view; for literal effect was there given to a clause in an antenuptial contract of marriage which provided that the trustees should be bound at any time during the subsistence of the marriage to pay over to the lady, on her written demand, the whole or any portion of the trust funds conveyed by her to them; although the legal rights of the children (as counsel informed us from a perusal of the session papers) bore to be expressly discharged in respect of the provision to them by the contract of the ultimate fee of the said trust funds.

If my conclusion on this point is correct, there seems to be no difficulty in regard to the next question, viz., whether Mr Simpson intended to exercise, and did effectually exercise by his trust-settlement, the power reserved to him by the clause in his marriage-contract above quoted. The settlement begins with a universal conveyance to trustees of the truster's whole means and estate. The sixth purpose, which I need not quote, deals with the residue, and in brief, amounts to a direction to the trustees to hold it for payment of the revenue equally to and among his children in liferent alimentary, and the fee to their issue; but with power to make certain advances out of capital to his daughters on marriage, and to his sons for setting them up in business, or otherwise for their advantage. The truster declared "that in consequence of my estate having very materially increased since the date of my marriage, it is my desire and intention that the foregoing provisions in favour of my said children shall come in place of and supersede the provisions conferred on them under the foresaid antenuptial contract of marriage between me and the said Mrs Catherine Paterson Forbes or Simpson, and that the provisions hereinbefore mentioned shall be in full of all they can ask or claim by or through my decease"; and he went on to provide that, in the event of any of his said children successfully challenging the trust-settlement, then, and in that event, in virtue of the powers reserved to him under the marriage-contract, he allocated and restricted the share or shares of such child or children in his estate to the sum of £1000 each, in full of all that they or their issue should be entitled to demand by or through his decease, with corresponding benefit, by way of accretion, to the acquiescing children and their issue. It seems to me to be clear that Mr Simpson intended by his settlement to exercise the power reserved by his marriage-contract to alter or vary the provisions thereby made for his children, and that he has legally and effectually done so. It is unnecessary to consider or decide whether any child or children could have asserted a valid claim to legal rights, notwithstanding the discharge of these by the marriage-contract, if Mr Simpson had by his testamentary settlement totally disinherited one or more of them, or reduced their provision to an amount which the Court considered merely illusory. No such question arises here, and I express no opinion upon the matter.

For the reasons stated, I think we ought to answer the first and second questions in the case in the affirmative. In that view, the remaining questions are superseded, and need not be answered. The third question is only put to us in the event of the first question being answered in the negative; and counsel explained to us that the fourth and fifth questions would arise for decision only if we were to answer the second question in the negative.

LORD SALVESEN.—The leading question in this case arises under the antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between George Simpson and the lady who became his wife and is now his widow. The contract itself is, in its main provisions, not unlike many contracts which were in use to be made at that time, but which, I am glad to think, are not so common now. By this deed Mr Simpson bound himself to provide a free annuity of £50 sterling to his widow, and also assigned to her for her liferent use the furniture and plenishings which might belong to him at his death. To his children he assigned and made over, but under the burdens and reservations thereafter expressed, his whole heritable and moveable estate. The only express reservations were that he should have power at any time during his life, and even on deathbed, to increase the provisions in favour of his widow, and right to apportion his estate amongst his children as he should think proper. In respect of these obligations Mrs Simpson and her children discharged their legal rights. The lady, on the other hand, disposed such property as she might succeed to through the death of her mother to her children, and failing children to her own sister in liferent.

Had these been the only provisions in the antenuptial contract there would have been no difficulty in its interpretation. In consideration of an annuity which was in no way secured and which, although suitable enough in the then circumstances of the husband, might have no relation to the estate which he left at his death, Mrs Simpson discharged absolutely her legal rights as his widow; while the children discharged their legal rights in respect of a provision which gave them no security against their father's misfortunes, and enabled him, if he left estate, to apportion the whole to one or more of them, leaving the others entirely unprovided for. Although, as I have said, such clauses were not uncommon in antenuptial contracts, they really served no object except the somewhat illegitimate one of enabling the husband to exercise such caprice in the division of his estate as would

Dec. 21, 1911. be impossible under our common law. The validity of such a discharge of Simpson's legitim, when contained in an antenuptial contract, has been too long settled Trustees v. to be now challenged; but I cannot say that the so-called principle upon Taylor. which the Courts have proceeded, "that the children cannot object to that Lord Salvesen. contract by which they were brought into existence,"¹ commends itself to my mind. That intending spouses should be able by an antenuptial contract to exclude their children, or some of them, from their legal rights of succession—which they could not do by any other deed, whether executed before or after their birth—is, in my opinion, contrary to sound legal principle; and I cannot but regret that the rule was ever established.

From the point of view of the intending husband such a contract is not less objectionable. It is quite settled law that a provision of the whole means and estate of which he might die possessed to his children deprives him of his testamentary capacity properly so called. If he has tied himself by such a contract he cannot give legacies to any persons or institutions whom he may desire to favour. If his children, or some of them, prove to be incapable of managing their affairs so that they cannot safely be entrusted with money, he cannot restrict them to a liferent. If he leaves only one insane child, that child must inherit the fee of his whole estate. He cannot even bequeath legacies to his grandchildren.² On the other hand, he retains the power of settling practically the whole of his estate on one or more children, leaving the others unprovided for.

These observations have a very direct bearing on the construction of the unusual clause appearing towards the end of the antenuptial contract in question. The clause is expressed as follows:—"And the said George Simpson reserves his own liferent and power to revoke, alter, or vary these presents in so far as regards the provisions to his children as aforesaid." It was argued for the third and fourth parties, who represent the children, that this clause was a mere repetition of the powers which Mr Simpson had expressly reserved, namely, a power to increase his widow's annuity; and so (it was said) in effect to revoke, to the extent to which that power might be exercised, the provisions in favour of his children and the power of apportionment amongst them. I cannot so read the clause. It is true that, so far as concerns his own liferent, that had already been reserved in different language; but I see no reason for limiting the operation of the clause according to its plain meaning on the footing that it cannot have meant what it expressed. How this clause came to be inserted in the marriage-contract is of course purely matter of conjecture; but it seems to me far more likely that Mr Simpson declined to deprive himself of all testamentary capacity than that it was the result merely of bungled conveyancing. At all events, the clause is there and must receive effect according to its terms; for I think it is impossible to read in the words "as aforesaid" before "these presents," as the third parties desire us to do, and so to deprive it of all effect.

The next argument which was submitted to us on behalf of the same parties, and which seems to have been the only one present to their minds when this special case was framed, was that "the reservation of power to revoke, alter, or vary the provisions in favour of the children in the Dec. 21, 1911. marriage-contract was invalid, and must be held pro non scripto, as being Simpson's repugnant to the contract by which the children's right to legitim is Trustees v. expressly discharged." No authority was cited in favour of this proposi- Taylor. tion. It may be that if the power had been so exercised as to deprive the Lord Salvesen. children of all right in their father's succession, the discharge of legitim contained in the contract would not have been effectual. It is still an open question whether legal rights of children in their parent's succession can be discharged by an antenuptial contract between the parents unless some provision is made in their favour, although, if the reason for the rule in the ordinary case is correctly stated in the passage I have quoted from Lord Mackenzie, no such distinction would be tenable. We are not, however, concerned with a case of that kind here, as Mr Simpson made generous provisions for his children, although he also thought fit to leave his sister-in-law an alimentary liferent of £1000. The antenuptial contract would have been a perfectly valid deed though it had contained no provisions in favour of children, and, as framed in this case, it would have operated as a valid testament so long as it was not revoked or altered. Indeed, there are other clauses in the deed which seem to show that Mr Simpson's true intention was merely to regulate his succession and not to come under any contractual obligations to his future wife as to its disposal. Thus the clause by which the whole estate is conveyed to the children is conceived in favour, not only of the children to be procreated of the intended marriage, but also of the children of any other marriage which George Simpson might contract; and there is also an obligation in favour of his own sister with regard to part of his heritable estate which was certainly not contractual. We are, however, not left without guidance as to the law, for in the case of *Fowler's Trustees*¹ it was decided that a clause in a marriage-contract which had the effect of rendering it entirely nugatory was not invalid. That case was much stronger than the present, for it gave the wife an absolute power to recall or annul the trust at pleasure, while the clause in the present case is limited in its operation to the provisions in favour of the children. I have therefore come to the conclusion that we must answer the first and second questions in the affirmative. The other questions, which proceed on the assumption of our taking an opposite view, are, of course, superseded.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions of law in the affirmative.

No. 49.

ARCHIBALD KIRKPATRICK, Appellant.—*Sol.-Gen. Hunter—
J. A. T. Robertson.*Dec. 21, 1911. LOCAL AUTHORITY OF THE BURGH OF MAXWELLTOWN, Respondents.—
*H. P. Macmillan.*Kirkpatrick v.
Town-Council
of Maxwell-
town.Public Health—Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), secs. 15 and 17—Closing order—Dwelling-house—Tenement—“Dangerous or injurious to health”—Procedure—Form of order—Warning to owner.

A local authority, acting under section 17 (2) of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, issued, upon a representation by their medical officer, a closing order with regard to a tenement of dwelling-houses, as being, in the words of the statute, a “dwelling-house . . . in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation.” Held (1) that a tenement of dwelling-houses was a “dwelling-house” in the sense of the Act, and that a closing order was competently issued with regard to a whole tenement generally; (2) that a closing order was competently issued without specifying as between two alternatives, whether the house was “dangerous” or “injurious to health,” these not being alternative grounds for an order, but the second being exegetical of the first; (3) that, the closing order being in a statutory form which did not require a statement of the grounds upon which it was issued, non-disclosure of these grounds in the order did not render it inept; (4) that the closing order was competently issued without previous exercise by the local authority of their statutory powers under section 15 to require remedial works, and without affording to the owner of the house an opportunity of being heard.

Opinion, per curiam, that there was occasion for further consideration by the Local Government Board of the form prescribed by them for closing orders, so as to require local authorities to specify more particularly the defects occasioning the necessity for such an order.

Sheriff—Appeal against closing order under Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), sec. 39 (1) (a)—Refusal of Sheriff to order condescendence and answers—Act of Sederunt, 4th November 1910—Public Health.

An appeal having been taken to the Sheriff from a closing order issued by a local authority under the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, upon a report by their Medical Officer of Health which was communicated to the owner of the house to be closed, the Sheriff refused to order a condescendence and answers, and allowed the appellant a proof.

Held that such an appeal is a summary application and not a summary cause, and accordingly that the Sheriff is judge of the procedure to be followed; and that, as the owner had sufficient notice in the report of the Medical Officer of the case he had to meet, the Sheriff had acted rightly in refusing to order a condescendence.

Process—Sheriff—Order to state a case under the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), sec. 39—Procedure—Public Health.

In an appeal to the Sheriff under the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, against a closing order, the Sheriff, who had allowed a proof, refused to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Session. The appellant thereupon presented a note to the Court under sec. 39 of the Act for an order on the Sheriff to state a case, and appended a list of the questions of law which he desired to have stated.

The Court sustained the competency of the note; but, by consent of parties, without ordering the Sheriff to state a case, answered the questions of law in the note, and remitted to the Sheriff to give effect to these answers.

Kirkpatrick v.
Town-Council
town.

A NOTE was presented by Archibald Kirkpatrick, 5 Terregles Street, Maxwelltown, in which the Court was craved to direct the Sheriff-substitute of Dumfries and Galloway, at Kirkcudbright, to state a case for the opinion of the Court in an appeal by Kirkpatrick against a closing order, dated 24th May 1911, issued by the Local Authority of the Burgh of Maxwelltown under the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909.*

Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

The note stated as follows:—

"The said Archibald Kirkpatrick is the owner of the heritable property situated at 40 and 41 Glasgow Street, Maxwelltown. This property is a tenement consisting of two one-room and kitchen houses on the ground floor, one one-room and kitchen and one two-room and kitchen houses on the upper floor, and, in the roof, there are two attic rooms.

"On 24th May 1911 the Local Authority of the Burgh of Maxwelltown, purporting to proceed in pursuance of subsection (2) of section 17 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, made an order prohibiting the use of the dwelling-houses, Nos. 40 and 41 Glasgow Street aforesaid, for human habitation, until, in their judgment, they are rendered fit for that purpose. Copies of this closing order, and of the relative representation of the medical officer of health, and report by the sanitary inspector are appended hereto.†

* The Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), provides, by sec. 15, that a local authority may give notice to a landlord requiring him to execute specified remedial works to render a house fit for habitation; and further enacts:—

Sec. 17 (1) "It shall be the duty of every local authority" to make an inspection of their district "to ascertain whether any dwelling-house therein is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation" (2) "If, on the representation of the medical officer of health, or of any other officer of the authority, or other information given, any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such a state, it shall be their duty to make an order prohibiting the use of the dwelling-house for human habitation (in this Act referred to as a closing order) until in the judgment of the local authority the dwelling-house is rendered fit for that purpose." (3) (As applied to Scotland by sec. 53 (14) of the Act) "Notice of a closing order shall be forthwith served on every owner of the dwelling-house in respect of which it is made, and any owner aggrieved by the order may appeal to the Sheriff by giving notice of appeal to the Sheriff within fourteen days after the order is served upon him."

Sec. 39 (As applied to Scotland) (1) (a) " . . . The Sheriff may at any stage of the proceedings on appeal, and shall, if so directed by the Court of Session, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court any question of law arising in the course of the appeal."

The proceedings as to appeals in Scotland are regulated by Act of Sederunt, 4th November 1910, which directs that appeals under the Act "shall be by initial writ under the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907," and that "the proceedings thereon shall be as laid down in that statute."

REPRESENTATION OF MEDICAL OFFICER.

" I herewith, in accordance with the provisions of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, sec. 30, and of the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909, sec. 17, represent to the Town-Council of the Burgh of Maxwelltown as Local Authority of the said Burgh, that the tenement of four dwelling-houses at 40 and 41 Glasgow Street, within the said burgh . . . are in a state so dangerous to health as to be unfit for human habitation.

" I have examined these houses in company with the sanitary inspector, and have requested him to send a detailed report, which accompanies this representation.

REPORT BY SANITARY INSPECTOR.

" To the Local Authority of the Burgh of Maxwelltown.

" Gentlemen,—I beg to bring under your notice a property situated at Nos. 40 and 41 Glasgow Street . . . which, in my opinion, is in such a state as to render it unfit for human habitation, and dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates.

" The buildings are of stone and lime, the roof being rendered and slated ; it contains 3 houses with two apartments each, and one of three apartments, also unused garrets. . . .

" In all the houses there is damp, due to ground damp, defective construction, defective roof, and roof-water pipes. None of the walls are lathed, some parts are boarded or lined with wood, and in each house they are

" On 9th June 1911 parties were heard by the Sheriff-substitute. Dec. 21, 1911. At this diet the said Archibald Kirkpatrick pled (1) that the cause should be tried on condescendence and answers, and that an order should be pronounced ordaining such to be lodged ; (2) that all the requirements of the Local Authority for the repair or improvement of the property in question prior to the making of the closing order had been fully implemented by him, that no notice had been received by him of any defects requiring to be remedied, and that in these circumstances the making of the closing order was nimious and oppressive ; (3) that the Local Authority have power to require the execution of such works as they shall specify by notice as being necessary to make houses, such as those in question, in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation, under and in terms of the provisions of section 15 of the said Act of 1909, and that the powers of the Local Authority under the last-mentioned section fell to be exercised before the powers conferred by section 17 of the said Act were put in force ; (4) that the said closing order was inept in respect it specified no grounds for the making thereof, gave the said Archibald Kirkpatrick no opportunity of being heard before the making thereof, and specified no defects which he might have an opportunity of remedying ; (5) that the statutory grounds upon which a closing order may proceed, viz., that a dwelling-house ' is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation ' (section 17), are separate grounds, and that the closing order is inept in respect it fails to specify upon which alternative state of facts it is made ; (6) that the expression ' dwelling-house ' in section 17 of the said Act of 1909, does not mean and include a whole tenement of four dwelling-houses ; and (7) that the closing order is inept in respect that it applies to a whole tenement."

By interlocutor, dated 13th June 1911, the Sheriff-substitute (Napier), without ordering a condescendence and answers, allowed the appellant " a proof of the following statement, namely, that the dwelling-houses, Nos. 40 and 41 Glasgow Street, Maxwelltown, are not in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation, and the defenders a conjunct probation."

On 20th June 1911 the appellant lodged a minute requesting the broken and out of repair. The ceilings are low, about 7 feet 8 inches, and they are out of repair and dirty. The floors are out of repair, also the windows, none of which are hung.

" The garrets are unoccupied and are full of debris, chaff, limestones, and other dirt of various kinds, and the roof is very much out of repair, rain-water coming through, roof light without glass in one half.

" The floors of the entrance passage and the stair landing are out of repair, the sides and roof of the common passage and stair are out of repair, and very dirty.

" The water supply is in the passage for the two down-stair houses, and half way up the stair for the upstairs houses ; both taps have old metal sinks under them, both are out of repair, the one in the passage being a wreck.

" One water-closet accommodates all the inmates, it is badly situated (the tenants having to come out on to the street and through a close, No. 41, in order to reach it), of defective construction, and has no proper floor ; the accommodation is insufficient.

" There is no paving of the back-yard, and no drainage, the water lies thereon, and in wet weather it is a mud hole ; there are three old cellars at the back in a tumble-down and dangerous state."

Dec. 21, 1911. Sheriff-substitute to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Session upon questions of law formulated in the minute. The respondents lodged answers to the minute, and on 30th June the Sheriff-substitute, after hearing parties, refused the appellant's motion to state a case.*

Kirkpatrick v.
Town-Council
town.

The questions of law formulated in the minute for the appellant were as follows:—“(1) Was it competent for the Sheriff-substitute to refuse the motion of the appellant for an order to be made for condescendence and answers to be lodged, and treat the appeal as a summary cause under Rule 41 of the First Schedule of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, regulating procedure, instead of allowing the cause to be proceeded with according to Rule 42 of said Schedule? . . . (3) Was it competent for the respondents to issue a closing order under section 17 (2) of the Housing, &c., Act, 1909, on the representation of their medical officer, as produced in process, and without exercising or exhausting their powers under section 15 of that Act? (4) Was the closing order inept in respect that it failed to disclose with sufficient specification the grounds for making it? (5) Were the respondents entitled to issue a closing order without giving the appellant an opportunity of being heard? (6) Are the statutory grounds (a) that a building is in a dangerous condition, and (b) that a building is in such a condition as to be injurious to health, separate grounds upon which a closing order may be granted under section 17 (2)? (7) Is it competent to grant a closing order upon these grounds, stated alternatively, especially when the representation of the medical officer is, as in the present case, that the dwelling-houses ‘are in a state so dangerous to health as to be unfit for human habitation’? (8) Does the expression ‘dwelling-house’ in section 17 of the 1909 Act mean and include a whole tenement comprising four dwelling-houses? (9) Was the closing order therefore inept in respect that it applied to a whole tenement?”

The respondents lodged answers to the present note, in which they submitted the following observations on the proposed questions:—“(1) This is a question of procedure under the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, on which it is not competent for the Sheriff-substitute to state a case. (3 and 5) These are questions which, on the terms of the statute, do not admit of reasonable doubt. (4) This question is foreclosed in respect that the closing order follows the form prescribed by the order of the Local Government Board for Scotland, of date 11th November 1910. (6, 7, 8) These are general abstract questions as to the meaning of an Act of Parliament which are not in competent form. Moreover, as regards questions 6 and 7, these are foreclosed by the said order of the Local Government Board for Scotland, while question 8, on the terms of the statute and in particular sections 17 (4) and 18 (2) thereof, does not admit of reasonable doubt. (9) This question is merely corollary to question 8.”

“The respondents, however, in the event of the Court being of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute should be directed to state a case on all or any of the questions submitted by the appellant, are willing, with a view to saving time and expense, to consent to the Court

* In his note the Sheriff-substitute held that the stating of a special case was a matter within his discretion, and that, as in his view the order had been regularly made, and the only question was one of fact as to the condition of the houses, this was not an occasion for stating a case.

disposing of all or any of the said questions on the present note and Dec. 21, 1911. answers as on a special case stated by the Sheriff-substitute, seeing that the whole material facts and documents are now before the Court." Kirkpatrick v. Town-Council of Maxwell-town.

The case was heard before the First Division on 21st October 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The closing order was inept inasmuch as it did not specify the ground upon which it was issued, but merely referred to alternative grounds, viz., that the dwelling-houses were dangerous or were injurious to health. Moreover, the remedial powers of the Local Authority, under section 15 of the Act, should have been exhausted, and the appellant should have had an opportunity of being heard before the drastic measure of issuing a closing order was resorted to. In any case, a closing order was not intended by the Act to be issued generally with reference to a tenement of dwelling-houses; it was necessary to issue a separate order for each particular dwelling-house that fell to be closed. If a proof were allowed, it ought to be upon a condescendence and answers. The Sheriff-substitute should be ordained to state a case, unless the questions of law appended to the present note were dealt with by the Court.

Argued for the respondents;—The words "dangerous or injurious to health" did not present alternative grounds for the issue of the closing order, but correctly described, in the language of the Act, a condition which might be described either as dangerous to health or injurious to health. The Act did not deal with houses in a "dangerous" condition structurally; these were dealt with by other statutory provisions.¹ The closing order was in the form prescribed by the Local Government Board, as required by section 41 of the Act; therefore no exception could be taken to any lack of specific statement therein of the grounds upon which it was issued. The Act required a closing order to be served (section 17 (3)) on "every owner of the dwelling-house" forthwith, and notice of an operative order to be served (section 17 (4)) on "every occupying tenant of the dwelling-house." Thus, from the language of the Act a tenement of dwelling-houses was clearly within the meaning of the word "dwelling-house." Prior to the issue of a closing order no steps were required by the Act to be taken for the purpose of having a house made fit for habitation. There was no necessity for the exercise of the remedial powers under section 15, nor for allowing the owner to be heard, prior to the issue of such an order, because anyone aggrieved had his remedy in an appeal to the Sheriff, and the order did not become operative until the appeal was disposed of. The appeal was a summary application to be disposed of by the Sheriff with or without a condescendence and answers as he thought fit.² The details given in the report of the sanitary inspector in the present case disclosed quite clearly the facts upon which parties were to go to proof, and made a condescendence and answers unnecessary.

At advising on 21st December 1911,—

² Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), First Schedule, Rule 41.

Dec. 21, 1911. of Archibald Kirkpatrick, coal-agent, Maxwelltown, against the Local Authority of the Burgh of Maxwelltown, and asks us to ordain the Sheriff-Town-Council substitute to state a case for the opinion of the Court.

Kirkpatrick v.
Town-Council
of Maxwell-

Ld. President.

The matter arises under the provisions of the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909, section 17, which deals with the duty of the Local Authority to close any dwelling-house which is unfit for habitation. I need not read the section to your Lordships, except to call attention to this, that that section puts a duty of initiative upon the Local Authority to inspect their district with a view to ascertaining whether any dwelling-house therein is "in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation." Then it tells them, if they so find it, that it is their duty to make a closing order, and the closing order is then made. Then an appeal to the Sheriff is given and regulated by sections 17 (3) and 39, as altered by the section which applies the Act to Scotland.

The closing order was made in this case, and an appeal was taken to the Sheriff. Now, the Act of Parliament provides by section 39 (as applied to Scotland),—"Provided that the Sheriff may at any stage of the proceedings on appeal, and shall, if so directed by the Court of Session, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court any question of law arising in the course of the appeal." The Sheriff here was asked to state a case for the opinion of the Court, and he refused to state it for a reason which he gave. The present application has therefore been made to the Court to direct the Sheriff to state a case.

No doubt, strictly speaking, the only order we are entitled to make is an order upon the Sheriff to state a case; but as in cases familiar to your Lordships arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act, we have always been in use, if the whole matters are really before us, with the consent of parties, ourselves to determine the question at issue. We were asked to do that here, and I therefore propose that your Lordships should deal with the merits of the case.

Now, the various points that are raised are brought out in a minute for the appellant which he lodged in the process below, and in which he asked the Sheriff-substitute to state a case. The learned Sheriff-substitute held that that was not necessary, and appended a note to his interlocutor, in which he gave his views as to the points on which he was asked to state a case. It is convenient to take the various questions of law as they are put in the minute for the appellant, which your Lordships will find on page 10 of the note. The first question that was asked is this: "Was it competent for the Sheriff-substitute to refuse the motion of the appellant for an order to be made for condescendence and answers to be lodged, and treat the appeal as a summary cause under Rule 41 of the First Schedule of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, regulating procedure, instead of allowing the cause to be proceeded with according to Rule 42 of said Schedule?" As your Lordships know, there was a provision in the statute authorising this Court to frame rules for the carrying out of the procedure under this Act, and accordingly an Act of Sederunt was passed. The only part of it which deals with this matter is a simple provision that in proceedings under these appeals initiation of the proceedings shall be by initial writ, and that thereafter they shall be conducted as laid down by the Sheriff Courts Act.

Now, there is no question that the initiation of the matter having been by Dec. 21, 1911. initial writ, it became not a summary cause but a summary application, and I think the result of that is that the Sheriff was entirely judge of his own procedure. It would have been perfectly competent for him to order condescendence and answers, but I think of that he was the best judge; and I have no doubt in this case he acted perfectly wisely, because we are told that the Local Authority produced and referred to a detailed report by their medical officer which showed the grounds upon which the houses were condemned. Now that detailed report, in the view of the Sheriff—and I think it was a right view—really gave the appellant all that he could have got if a condescendence had been lodged; and accordingly I think, as the case was being conducted as a summary application, the appellant had sufficient notice to enable him, if he still wished to do so, to maintain that the house was not in an insanitary condition. Of course one quite sees that in a case of this sort it would always be fair that a person whose house was to be closed should be told in what respect it was insanitary; but here I think he was told quite clearly by the production of this report. In answer to the first question, therefore, I am of opinion that it was competent for the Sheriff-substitute to refuse the motion for condescendence and answers to be lodged.

Kirkpatrick v.
Town-Council
of Maxwell-

Ld. President.

The second question is not really a question at all, and I do not need to take any notice of it.

The third question is: "Was it competent for the respondents to issue a closing order under section 17 (2) of the Housing, &c., Act, 1909, on the representation of their medical officer, as produced in process, and without exercising or exhausting their powers under section 15 of that Act?" I think it clearly was competent. The powers under section 15 are quite separate from the powers under section 17, and the Local Authority not only may act under section 17, but, as I have already pointed out, they have a duty to do so under that section, if they find that the specified state of affairs exists.

The fourth question is: "Was the closing order inept in respect that it failed to disclose with sufficient specification the grounds for making it?" Now, the closing order is precisely in the form that is issued in Form No. 5 by the Local Government Board for Scotland. By section 41 of the Act it is provided: "The Local Government Board may by order prescribe the form of any notice, advertisement, or other document, to be used in connection with the powers and duties of a local authority or of the board under the Housing Acts, and the forms so prescribed, or forms as near thereto as circumstances admit, shall be used in all cases to which those forms are applicable." Now, the Local Government Board issued forms of which this No. 5 is one, and that is the form that the Local Authority used. In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to hold that the closing order is inept in respect that it did not disclose so-and-so and so-and-so.

But upon this matter I think your Lordships are rather of opinion that it would be well if the Local Government Board considered whether they might not to a certain extent amend the form with that in view. The form that they use is this: "And whereas it appears to the [description of the local authority] on the ['representation of the medical officer of health' or

Dec. 21, 1911. 'representation of the' (specify the officer) or 'on information given' (specify the nature and effect)." Now, that really is an echo of subsection (2) of Kirkpatrick v. Town-Council section 17, which is dealing with these closing orders, and which says this: of Maxwell-town. "If, on the representation of the medical officer of health or of any other officer of the authority, or other information given, any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such a state, it shall be their duty to make an order prohibiting the use of the dwelling-house for human habitation." And therefore I do not at all wonder that the form is in the words I have read. But your Lordships will notice that whereas the addition "specify the nature and effect" is added to the alternative "information given," there is no addition made when the representation is the representation of the medical officer of health or some other officer of the local authority. One can understand why there should be a certain distinction made there, because the medical officer of health or other officer of the Local Authority is a recognised official, whereas "information given" may be information given by quivis ex populo. If you are going to tell an owner that his house is going to be shut up, and that the person who condemns it is a local officer, the owner can ask him for particulars, and say, "Is there anything I can do?" and so on. On the other hand, if you say it is on the information of John Smith, and say no more, that really leaves the owner in doubt as to whether it may not be a piece of pure spite on the part of a neighbour not worthy of attention, and therefore it is necessary that there should be more specification in the nature of the complaint when it is made by an outsider than when it is made by an officer. But we think it is as well that in serving the order there should be some reference added as to what the grounds of defect of the houses consist in. If the order is made in purely bald terms and nothing else is said, the moment an owner objects in an appeal, he is entitled to force from the Local Authority a specification of the grounds on which his house has been closed. It seems rather unnecessary that a man should have to go through the form of appealing in order to elicit the grounds on which his house has been condemned. I have no doubt that the Local Government Board will make such slight alterations in their Form No. 5 as will remove this difficulty for the future.

In the present case we think there was absolutely no injustice done, because, as I have already mentioned, the detailed report of the medical officer was communicated to the owner; and therefore we do not think this case calls for any interference.

The next question is: "Were the respondents entitled to issue a closing order without giving the appellant an opportunity of being heard?" As a matter of law, I think it is quite clear that they were, because the Act of Parliament says nothing about the owner being heard. It puts the responsibility upon the Local Authority, and upon the Local Authority alone. I am quite clear upon this, that Local Authorities may be trusted, before making a closing order, to go to the owner and through one of their officers to speak to him; but strictly on a question of law, I think there is no reason why they should not issue a closing order without any such preliminary warning.

The sixth question is: "Are the statutory grounds (a) that a building is in a dangerous condition, and (b) that a building is in such a condition as to be injurious to health, separate grounds upon which a closing order may be granted?" I am clearly of opinion that they are not separate grounds. I think the second ground is merely exegetical of the first. This Act is not dealing with what you may call structural danger at all. That is dealt with under the Burgh Police Act, and there is not a trace in this Act of the Local Authority having anything to do with structural danger. I think that is quite clear from the Act itself, because if you take subsection (7) of section 17 it says this: "A room habitually used as a sleeping place, the surface of the floor of which is more than three feet below the surface of the part of the street adjoining or nearest to the room, shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be a dwelling-house so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation." That shows, therefore, that the expression is held as applying to sanitary conditions, and sanitary conditions alone.

Ld. President.

That really disposes of the next question, because if these two grounds of objection are the same there is no necessity to state under which alternative a closing order is to be issued, because there is no alternative.

The eighth question is: "Does the expression 'dwelling-house' in section 17 of the 1909 Act mean and include a whole tenement comprising four dwelling-houses?" Upon this matter we were referred to a judgment of Sheriff-substitute Fyfe in a case¹ which is coming next in your Lordships' advisings, but which case is in such a position that we shall not be able to give an opinion on the subject. I only mention this because I wish it to be understood that the matter has been carefully considered. I am of opinion that the expression "dwelling-house" may include a whole tenement, even although that tenement comprises four dwelling-houses. The whole question is one simply of identification. If a closing order names Nos. 58 and 59 of such-and-such a street, that means the whole block of dwelling-houses that are known as Nos. 58 and 59. There is no question that if Nos. 58 and 59 are broken up into a set of flats, in such a closing order you take it upon yourselves to say that each and every dwelling in that tenement is unfit for human habitation and ought to be closed; and if it were the fact that one of them was in a good state, that closing order on appeal would be held to be a bad closing order, because it would close something that ought not to be closed. But to say that a closing order is, on the face of it, bad because it closes Nos. 58 and 59 en bloc, is to say something for which there is no warrant in the statute at all. In the Glasgow case¹ there were over forty houses in the tenement which was closed, but that did not necessitate a separate closing order for each.

I agree with what was said in one of the English cases, that, first of all, decisions under one statute are not to be used in helping you with another; and secondly, that, unless there is something to a contrary effect in the statute, you are to take "dwelling-house" in the ordinary acceptation of the word. Of course you may have a dwelling-house within a dwelling-house, and I do not doubt that a closing order can competently close one dwelling-house within a tenement, if it says so, and I think the whole matter is one of identification. I think that is quite clear from the section I have read about a room three

Dec. 21, 1911. feet below the surface of the street. I do not know how you would particularly describe a dwelling-house in a tenement in Glasgow ; are you to say, Kirkpatrick v. Town-Council of Maxwelltown. “ No. 39 Gallowgate, three stairs up, second room to the back ” ? But it is not necessary for us to give any opinion on that. That is, after all, a detail of administration with which we are not here concerned. But if the Authority is of opinion that the whole tenement is bad, I do not see why it should not say so by using the ordinary words by which a tenement is designated—“ Nos. 58 and 59 so-and-so.” Even if you look at a directory that is the way a tenement is described. I am therefore of opinion on this matter also that the closing order was not inept on any such view.

Ld. President.

I think I have now gone through the whole matters. I do not think it is necessary to do anything more than simply to send back the case to the Sheriff with this expression of opinion, because I have no doubt he will be guided by the opinion we have expressed, and therefore I do not think it is necessary to order him to go through the idle form of stating a case. The application for a case here is obviously in time, because the Sheriff has only pronounced an order for proof, and has not finally disposed of the case.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I also agree, but as I hold a strong view upon the sufficiency of the specification of the grounds in this closing order, I would like to say a few words on that subject. The closing order states simply that whereas it has appeared to the Local Authority that certain dwelling-houses are in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation—“ now therefore, we, the said Local Authority of the Burgh of Maxwelltown, in pursuance of subsection (2) of section 17 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, do by this our order, prohibit the use of the said dwelling-houses for human habitation until in our judgment they are rendered fit for that purpose.” It appears to me to be most unfair to the owner of property that he should have a bald notice of that description thrown at his head, without any indication of what fault the Local Authority are finding, leaving him to ascertain for himself and to make improvements or modifications which, it may be quite possible, are not those that the Local Authority want. Of course, any reasonable authority would give along with the closing order an indication of what they want, and no better indication could be given than the report of the sanitary inspector on which they are here proceeding. Why I take the opportunity of referring to this matter is that in another case that has been before us not only was that report not communicated along with the closing order, but when applied for it was refused. Accordingly, it does seem to me that something is wanted to require the Local Authority to communicate to the owner information as to what they really find fault with. This may possibly involve an alteration in the form, but even without such alteration I think it is a reasonable thing that the Local Authority should give the owner complete specification of the defects complained of, because otherwise the owner is compelled, in order to force from the Local Authority what in some cases they have apparently not chosen to give, to go through the unnecessarily expensive proceeding of applying to the Court, as has been done here. This ought to be avoided.

On the next point which your Lordship referred to, namely, whether the expressions "dangerous or injurious to health" are truly alternative, I was of opinion, at the time the case was discussed, that they were alternative. But on examining the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 70), to which the Act of 1909 is intimately related, I find that the same expression is used in the class of sections beginning with section 30, and in that Act there is no possible question that the expressions are not alternative, but merely cumulative, and I am therefore satisfied that the same intention was in the minds of the Legislature in dealing with the matter under this Act of 1909. I have nothing further to add.

Ld. Johnston.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur. The question upon which I had difficulty was under the fourth head, whether the closing order was inept in respect of failure to disclose with sufficient specification the grounds for making it. That difficulty, however, has been resolved, so far as the decision of this case rests, by the reference to section 41 of the Act, which shows that the responsibility for the form of the order is with the Local Government Board; and the Local Government Board have prescribed a particular form which was followed in the present case. I entirely concur with the observations which have been made as to the desirability of the Local Government Board considering whether it would not be fair to give such notice to the person, against whom the closing order may be made, as would inform him of the specific grounds on which it was made, in cases where the order is made on the representation of the medical officer as well as in cases where it is made on other information.

If a man who is indicted for trial is charged with having committed a statutory offence, it is not sufficient merely to echo the words of the statute; he is entitled to specification as to the way in which he has broken the law. I think in the case of the drastic remedies under these sections the owner of property is entitled to similar consideration. What has just been said with regard to the proper construction to be put upon the word "dwelling-house" under the eighth head of the minute for the appellant makes specification all the more necessary, because the order may deal not with one dwelling-house, but with a great number. I think that emphasises the necessity of specific notice being given as to the way in which the statute has been contravened.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:

—"Sustain the competency of the note: Of consent of parties, answer the questions of law set forth in the minute for the appellant, No. 16 of process, as follows:—Questions Nos. 1, 3, 5, and 7 in the affirmative; Nos. 4 and 6, also Nos. 8 and 9 read together as one question, in the negative: Find it unnecessary to answer question No. 2: With these answers remit to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed as accords, and find it unnecessary to deal further with the crave of the note."

Process—Sheriff—Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 44), sec. 39 (1) (a)—Closing Order—Statement of special case for opinion of Court of Session—Competency of stating case after judgment pronounced by the Sheriff—Public Health.

The Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, allows any person aggrieved by a closing order to appeal to the Sheriff, and enacts (sec. 39) that the Sheriff may "at any stage of the proceedings on appeal" state a special case on a question of law for the opinion of the Court.

Held that such a case must be stated during the progress of the appeal, and cannot be stated after the Sheriff has given judgment.

Steele v. M'Intosh Brothers, (1879) 7 R. 192, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 6th October 1910 a Special Committee of the Corporation of Glasgow, acting as the Local Authority under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, 1890 to 1909, issued a closing order under section 17 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909,* prohibiting the use for human habitation of a dwelling-house at 77 Stewart Street, Glasgow, of which Robert Johnston's trustees were the proprietors.

An appeal against this order having been taken to the Sheriff-substitute in terms of section 17 (3) * of that Act, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), after hearing parties, pronounced an interlocutor on 5th January 1911 quashing the order.

Thereafter at the request of the Local Authority the Sheriff-substitute stated a special case on certain questions of law for the opinion and judgment of the Court under section 39 of the Act.*

The case set forth:—"1. This is a 'special case' asked for under section 39 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909.

"2. In that statute there are no process directions at all as regards the form of such a 'special case.'

"3. Nor are there any directions in the Act of Sederunt of 4th November 1910, which merely directs that the procedure in an appeal under the 1909 statute shall be as laid down in the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907; but, as a 'special case' is not known in Sheriff Court practice, there are, of course, no directions in the Sheriff Court Act, nor in the procedure rules, as regards the form of a special case.

"4. The appellants (Johnston's trustees) maintain that, as I have pronounced final judgment in the appeal process, it is not now competent to state a special case at all under section 39 of the statute. I have reserved this question of competency.

"5. In Scotland the appeal against a closing order is not to an administrative body but to a judicial tribunal (the Sheriff Court). Accordingly, under the Act of Sederunt, the appeal to the Sheriff takes the form of an initial writ under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, and the proceedings are to be as laid down in that statute. It therefore becomes the duty of the Sheriff, in accordance with ordinary procedure in the Sheriff Court, to follow forth the process to the end without interruption.

* Quoted supra, p. 289.

"6. As an appeal against a closing order is a summary application, as defined by section 3 (p) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, it appeared to me to be my imperative duty, under section 50 of that Act, to hear the parties; and to give judgment in writing deciding all questions (including questions of law) arising in the appeal proceedings. . . .

Dec. 21, 1911.
Johnston's
Trustees v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

"13. In the appeal process, as directed by the Act of Sederunt of 4th November 1910, and section 50 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, I heard parties, and thereafter gave judgment in writing by interlocutor and note of 5th January 1911.

"14. The respondents (the Local Authority) thereupon lodged the minute printed in the appendix hereto, craving a special case.

"15. The appellants (Johnston's trustees), after I had heard parties on the Local Authority's minute, lodged the minute printed in the appendix hereto.* The Local Authority objected to the competency of that minute, and I also reserved that question.

"16. The questions of law upon which the Special Committee of the Glasgow Corporation desire the opinion of the Court of Session are:—[His Lordship stated these questions, and also those set forth in the minute for Johnston's trustees; and continued]—

"18. All these questions of law arose in the course of the appeal proceedings.

"This 'special case' is stated by me in terms of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, section 39, proviso (a), under reservation of all objections of competency."

The case was heard before the First Division on 24th October 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—It was incompetent to present a special case after the Sheriff had disposed of the appeal by pronouncing judgment, for the terms of section 39 only permitted such a case to be presented "at any stage of the proceedings on appeal," and not after the proceedings had terminated.¹ This was really an attempt to submit the judgment of the Sheriff to review contrary to the intention of the statute. The jurisdiction with regard to appeals against closing orders conferred by the statute on the Sheriff was a new jurisdiction, and if a further appeal to the Court of Session had been intended it would have been expressly provided for.

Argued for the respondents;—The Sheriff was permitted to state a case on any question of law arising in the course of the proceedings, and that necessarily involved stating a case after the close of the proceedings; for the questions of law involved in the decision might only then emerge for the first time, and parties could not be expected to state ab ante all questions that could possibly arise. If the Sheriff's decision was found to be wrong, the opinion of the Court could be stated in such a way that the Sheriff could give effect to it by varying his decision upon the closing order, such an order and a decision upon it not being in the position of a judgment beyond recall.

* The minute, which bore to be presented under reservation of the appellants' objections to the competency of the proceedings, craved the Sheriff, in the event of his stating a special case, to include in it certain questions for the appellants.

Dec. 21, 1911. At advising on 21st December 1911,—

Johnston's
Trustees v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case a closing order was made by the Local Authority of Glasgow under the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909. An appeal was taken from that closing order to the Sheriff-substitute in terms of the section of the Act to which I shall refer. Upon that appeal, after certain procedure, the learned Sheriff-substitute issued a judgment which, after various sets of findings, finishes with this :—"Therefore quashes the said closing order." That having been done, a minute was lodged for the Special Committee of the Corporation, in which, referring to the judgment which I have just mentioned, the respondents respectfully craved the Sheriff-substitute to state, in the form of a stated case for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session, certain questions of law. To that a minute was put in for the other side in which, under reservation of all pleas as to the competency of the appeal and the form thereof, they ask him to add other questions. And accordingly the Sheriff-substitute did state a special case.

Upon the special case appearing here the competency was at once objected to by the appellants in the Court below—that is to say, the parties against whom the closing order had originally been pronounced—and your Lordships heard counsel on that matter, and did not go into the merits until we should have disposed of the question of the competency.

I am clearly of opinion that the special case here is incompetent, because it is too late.

The section of the Act which deals with closing orders is the 17th. I need not go through it again, because we have just been going through it in the case we have last disposed of¹; but it provides that a local authority on their own initiative shall cause inspections to be made of their district, and if any dwelling-houses are dangerous to health it becomes their duty to issue a closing order. The closing order is to be forthwith served upon the owner, and if the owner is aggrieved by the order he may appeal to the Local Government Board, by giving notice of appeal. The Local Government Board is, by the application section 53, subsection (14), translated into Sheriff in Scotland. Now, that is the appeal given, and the only appeal given. There is no appeal from the Local Government Board or Sheriff to anyone else. But section 39 deals with the procedure under the appeal which is given to the Local Government Board, or in Scotland the Sheriff. Now, that section, as applied to Scotland by section 53, subsection (14), reads thus :—"The procedure on any appeal under this part of this Act, including costs, to the Sheriff shall be such as the Court of Session may by Act of Sederunt determine, and on any such appeal the Sheriff may make such order in the matter as he thinks equitable, and any order so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties Provided that the Sheriff may at any stage of the proceedings on appeal, and shall, if so directed by the High Court," that is, the Court of Session, "state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court any question of law arising in the course of the appeal. . . ." That is the only provision. Your Lordships will observe that it is not a provision for a Dec. 21, 1911. further appeal from the Sheriff, but it is a provision that in the course of the appeal to the Sheriff, the Sheriff may, if he likes, and shall, if directed by the Court of Session, state in the form of a special case a question of law for the opinion of the Court. "For the opinion of the Court" means that the Court will give the Sheriff their opinion on a question of law, and he would not be entitled to disregard it; but it must be given at a time when as yet he has not pronounced a judgment, because if you allow him to go on and pronounce a judgment, then stating a special case would not be giving an opinion for his guidance. He cannot recall his judgment, and there is no provision which allows us to recall it.

Johnston's
Trustees v.
Glasgow
Corporation.
Ld. President.

There are many instances in other statutes of appeal given by way of stated case; the Workmen's Compensation Act is one of which we have daily examples. But in all those statutes there is a provision which gives the appeal. Here there is none. This law is not at all new law. I think it is absolutely decided by authority both in Scotland and in England. In Scotland it is covered by the case of Steele v. M'Intosh Brothers.¹ There it was a question under the Excise Act, 1827 (7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53), and it was this. Section 84 of that statute contains the following proviso:—"Provided always, that it shall be lawful for such Commissioners of Appeal, and Justices of the Peace at such general Quarter Sessions respectively, as aforesaid, at their discretion, to state the facts of any case on which such appeal shall be made specially for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer in England, Scotland, or Ireland, as the same shall have arisen therein respectively." Now, the Lord President in that case goes into this precise question with great particularity, and he points out exactly the distinction I have just pointed out, namely, that there are statutes in which appeal is given by stated case, but that there are others in which nothing is said as to appeal, but there is only provision for opinion. The statute before your Lordships belongs to the latter class, and only makes provision for the Sheriff obtaining the opinion of this Court, to aid him in forming his own final judgment. The words in the Excise Act of 1827 are not precisely the same as in the Housing and Town Planning Act, but the reasoning is precisely applicable. In the English case² the actual words are the same. It was an arbitration between Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, and it arose out of the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 49), where it is provided by section 19, that "any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the Court or a Judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court, any question of law arising in the course of the reference." There again the argument was precisely on the same lines, and the decision was precisely on the same lines, as in the Scotch case.

I think, therefore, both on principle and authority, this application is too late, is incompetent, and cannot be entertained.

Dec. 21, 1911. At advising on 21st December 1911,—

Johnston's
Trustees v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case a closing order was made by the Local Authority of Glasgow under the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909. An appeal was taken from that closing order to the Sheriff-substitute in terms of the section of the Act to which I shall refer. Upon that appeal, after certain procedure, the learned Sheriff-substitute issued a judgment which, after various sets of findings, finishes with this :—"Therefore quashes the said closing order." That having been done, a minute was lodged for the Special Committee of the Corporation, in which, referring to the judgment which I have just mentioned, the respondents respectfully craved the Sheriff-substitute to state, in the form of a stated case for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session, certain questions of law. To that a minute was put in for the other side in which, under reservation of all pleas as to the competency of the appeal and the form thereof, they ask him to add other questions. And accordingly the Sheriff-substitute did state a special case.

Upon the special case appearing here the competency was at once objected to by the appellants in the Court below—that is to say, the parties against whom the closing order had originally been pronounced—and your Lordships heard counsel on that matter, and did not go into the merits until we should have disposed of the question of the competency.

I am clearly of opinion that the special case here is incompetent, because it is too late.

The section of the Act which deals with closing orders is the 17th. I need not go through it again, because we have just been going through it in the case we have last disposed of¹; but it provides that a local authority on their own initiative shall cause inspections to be made of their district, and if any dwelling-houses are dangerous to health it becomes their duty to issue a closing order. The closing order is to be forthwith served upon the owner, and if the owner is aggrieved by the order he may appeal to the Local Government Board, by giving notice of appeal. The Local Government Board is, by the application section 53, subsection (14), translated into Sheriff in Scotland. Now, that is the appeal given, and the only appeal given. There is no appeal from the Local Government Board or Sheriff to anyone else. But section 39 deals with the procedure under the appeal which is given to the Local Government Board, or in Scotland the Sheriff. Now, that section, as applied to Scotland by section 53, subsection (14), reads thus :—"The procedure on any appeal under this part of this Act, including costs, to the Sheriff shall be such as the Court of Session may by Act of Sederunt determine, and on any such appeal the Sheriff may make such order in the matter as he thinks equitable, and any order so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties Provided that the Sheriff may at any stage of the proceedings on appeal, and shall, if so directed by the High Court," that is, the Court of Session, "state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court any question of law arising in the course of the appeal. . . ." That is the only provision. Your Lordships will observe that it is not a provision for a Dec. 21, 1911. further appeal from the Sheriff, but it is a provision that in the course of the appeal to the Sheriff, the Sheriff may, if he likes, and shall, if directed by the Court of Session, state in the form of a special case a question of law for the opinion of the Court. "For the opinion of the Court" means that the Court will give the Sheriff their opinion on a question of law, and he would not be entitled to disregard it; but it must be given at a time when as yet he has not pronounced a judgment, because if you allow him to go on and pronounce a judgment, then stating a special case would not be giving an opinion for his guidance. He cannot recall his judgment, and there is no provision which allows us to recall it.

Ld. President.

There are many instances in other statutes of appeal given by way of stated case; the Workmen's Compensation Act is one of which we have daily examples. But in all those statutes there is a provision which gives the appeal. Here there is none. This law is not at all new law. I think it is absolutely decided by authority both in Scotland and in England. In Scotland it is covered by the case of Steele v. M'Intosh Brothers.¹ There it was a question under the Excise Act, 1827 (7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53), and it was this. Section 84 of that statute contains the following proviso:—"Provided always, that it shall be lawful for such Commissioners of Appeal, and Justices of the Peace at such general Quarter Sessions respectively, as aforesaid, at their discretion, to state the facts of any case on which such appeal shall be made specially for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer in England, Scotland, or Ireland, as the same shall have arisen therein respectively." Now, the Lord President in that case goes into this precise question with great particularity, and he points out exactly the distinction I have just pointed out, namely, that there are statutes in which appeal is given by stated case, but that there are others in which nothing is said as to appeal, but there is only provision for opinion. The statute before your Lordships belongs to the latter class, and only makes provision for the Sheriff obtaining the opinion of this Court, to aid him in forming his own final judgment. The words in the Excise Act of 1827 are not precisely the same as in the Housing and Town Planning Act, but the reasoning is precisely applicable. In the English case² the actual words are the same. It was an arbitration between Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, and it arose out of the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 49), where it is provided by section 19, that "any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the Court or a Judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court, any question of law arising in the course of the reference." There again the argument was precisely on the same lines, and the decision was precisely on the same lines, as in the Scotch case.

I think, therefore, both on principle and authority, this application is too late, is incompetent, and cannot be entertained.

Anderson*,¹ Lord Pearson had occasion to consider a similar question, but he decided it upon the terms of the trust-conveyance, which differed from those which we have here. He expresses no opinion on the point raised in this case, while admitting that the recent conveyancing treatises affirm that a clause framed as is the clause in Mr Wood's trust-conveyance would have the effect of carrying not merely the bare trust title but also the office of trustee to the heir of the last trustee. That this was presumably the intention of the testator in the present case may further be gathered from the fact that the heir-male of John Hastie, who was constituted trustee on his failure, was to be resident in Great Britain and sui juris at the time of John Hastie's death. I am accordingly of opinion that we should answer the third question in the affirmative and the fourth in the negative. [His Lordship then dealt with the question of vesting on which the case is not reported.]

ARTHUR FREDERICK AMMON, Pursuer (Respondent).
JAMES WALKER TOD, Defender (Appellant).—Horne, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

LINDSAY, MELDRUM, & OATTS, AND OTHERS, Minuters.—Lippe—T. D. K. Murray.

Agent and Client—Expenses—Agent-disburser—Action settled by parties pending appeal—Right of agent to be sisted in order to obtain decree for expenses.

In an action in the Sheriff Court the Sheriff pronounced decree against the defender and found him liable to the pursuer in the expenses of the action. While an appeal against this interlocutor was pending in the Court of Session the parties, without the knowledge of the pursuer's agents, came to a compromise, in terms of which the pursuer accepted a sum in full settlement of all his claims of principal and expenses in the action. The defender having moved the Court, in respect of this settlement, to assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action and to find no expenses due to or by either party, the pursuer's agents lodged a minute in which they craved to be sisted as parties to the action in order that decree might be pronounced against the defender in their favour as agents-disbursers for the expenses of the action.

Held by a Court of five Judges (diss. Lord Kinneir) that the agents were entitled to be sisted in terms of their minute.

1ST DIVISION,
with one consulted Judge.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN January 1911 Arthur F. Ammon, an import and export merchant in Manchester, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against James Walker Tod, an agent there, in which decree was pronounced against the defender. The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and while the appeal was pending before the Court Messrs Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts and others lodged a minute in which they craved to be sisted to the cause.

The circumstances of the case, and the procedure that had taken place, were thus narrated by Lord Johnston in his opinion:—

"The pursuer and respondent, Ammon, held an agency for the Positive Lock Washer Company of Newark, New Jersey, U.S.A., as sole export agent for the sale of their Positive Lock Washer, excepting in the United States and Canada. The defender and appellant Tod was in the respondent's service in Manchester, which was the headquarters of his business, and as at 1st June 1906 the respondent engaged him to represent him in Scotland. This engagement continued from year to year, and at 1st February 1909 was current until 1st June of that year. The respondent alleges, the Sheriff-substitute has found, and the Sheriff has affirmed, that behind the back of the respondent the appellant, in the end of 1908, went to America, and there succeeded in filching from him the agency which he held from the American company, and which on 1st February 1909 was withdrawn from the respondent and transferred to the appellant. Concurrently, on 30th January 1909 the appellant intimated to the respondent that he would from that date cease to represent him in Scotland, and terminated their current agreement, which had still four months to run.

"It is not to be wondered at that litigation between the parties immediately ensued. At once the respondent raised against the appellant an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for interdict, accounting, and damages. In this action the Sheriff (Millar) on appeal on 17th March 1910, fully agreeing with his substitute (Fyfe) on the facts, though varying his interlocutor on the point of damages, found it unnecessary, owing to efflux of time, to grant interdict, but decerned against the appellant for £68 in the accounting, and for £100 in name of damages, with expenses.

"Though the merits of the case have not been gone into before us, it is a factor which I cannot exclude from view that both Sheriffs found against the appellant in matter of fact by interlocutors which exhausted the cause in their Court.

"On the 30th March 1910 the defender appealed to this Division, and on 12th May of that year the case was sent to the roll. While the case was in the roll awaiting hearing the appellant came to a settlement with the respondent without the knowledge or consent of Messrs Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts, writers, Glasgow, and Messrs Erskine Dods & Rhind, S.S.C., Edinburgh, who had represented the respondent in Glasgow and Edinburgh respectively. This settlement was not apparently reduced to writing, but its terms are evidenced by those of a receipt dated Manchester 3rd February 1911, granted by the respondent to the appellant, in which the former acknowledged having received from the latter 'the sum of seventy pounds sterling in full settlement of all claims of principal and expenses which I have in the action at my instance at present pending in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, against the said James Walker Tod, and I hereby discharge him of all such claims under said action.'

"In these circumstances, and before the case came on for hearing, the appellant lodged a note craving the Court, in respect of the discharge above referred to, to recall the interlocutor appealed against, to assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action, and to find no expenses due to or by either party. This was quite consistent with the terms of the discharge, and in other circumstances the Court would have nothing to do but to interpose authority to the settlement and grant the crave of the appellant.

"But this application was met by the respondent's agents lodging a Dec. 22, 1911. minute craving that they might be sisted as parties to the action as agents-disbursers, 'in order that a decree may be pronounced against the appellant and defender in their favour as agents-disbursers for the expenses of the action as between agent and client.' This minute was answered by the appellant, and on the face of the minute and answers the question was sharply raised whether the settlement which had taken place on the 3rd February 1911 was not made by the appellant in knowledge of the respondent's insolvency and in fraud of his agents' rights?"

Ammon v.
Tod.

Counsel were first heard on the minute and answers before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Skerrington) on 1st and 2nd March 1911, and on 17th March the case was ordered to be reheard before a Court of five Judges.

The case was reheard before the Lord President, Lord Kinneir, Lord Johnston, Lord Skerrington, and Lord Mackenzie on 19th May 1911.

Argued for the minuters;—It was law well settled by a series of decisions that where an action was compromised without the consent of the agent that agent might be sisted as a party in order to obtain decree for his expenses in three separate cases, viz.—(1) where expenses had actually been found due; (2) where expenses followed as a necessary consequence from an interlocutor that had been pronounced; and (3) where the parties had entered into a compromise for the purpose of defeating the agent's claim.¹ The first of these conditions was present here, and it was not necessary that the interlocutor pronounced should be final in the sense that it was not open to review.² No variation on the rule of law above stated had been introduced by the decisions in *Murray v. Kyd*³ and Macqueen v. Hay.⁴ The ground of decision in both of these cases was that conspiracy had not been relevantly averred, but in neither case was there a finding for expenses. In the former case expenses had been expressly reserved, and the latter had only reached the stage where issues were being adjusted. It was true that certain dicta of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope in the former case and of Lord Wood in the latter indicated that in the opinion of these learned Judges the interlocutor disposing of the case must be final, in the sense that it was not open to review; but these dicta were merely obiter, they went beyond the authority of the decided cases, and were not consistent with the law as recognised in subsequent cases.⁵ In these circumstances it was not necessary to go into the question of fraud and show that the third condition was present. But, assuming such necessity, it was clear from the minute and answers that the compromise here was collusive, because it had been entered into, without regard to the agents' claims, at a time when the pursuer was insolvent. In no event could the parties now be heard on the merits, as these were disposed of by the settlement.

disposing of the merits (finality being interpreted in the sense of its not being open to review), unless the agent could show that there was an element of fraud in the settlement.¹ In all the more recent cases that had been cited for the minuters the interlocutors had been final in the sense of immunity from review. In the earlier cases there was a tendency to put the agent in a more favourable position than that which he occupied under more recent decisions. The interlocutor in the present case did not finally dispose of the merits: it was actually under appeal when the settlement was arrived at. Nor did the settlement amount to any admission by the defender that the decision was right upon the merits, and that the decree would necessarily have become final. Therefore it was open to the agents to succeed only on showing that there was fraud or collusion in this settlement; and their right in that event was not, as was claimed here, to be sisted and to obtain decree de plano, but merely to carry on the case in order to justify the Sheriff's decree if they could, and to show that a finding for expenses would have followed as a necessary consequence. In any case the agents must, in the first instance, prove the fraud which they averred. On principle it was against public policy to place a client in the hands of his agent by allowing the latter to throw obstacles in the way of an independent settlement.

At advising on 22nd December 1911,—

LORD JOHNSTON.—[After the narrative quoted supra—]I do not think that it is necessary to go into the averments on this matter [i.e., that the settlement was made in knowledge of the respondent's insolvency and in fraud of his agents' rights], which could not be accepted without proof, in disposing of the question before us. Nor, in my opinion, is that question affected by the allegation sought to be introduced after the last discussion, to the effect that the respondent was at any rate now in fairly affluent circumstances and able to meet his agents' claims.

That question seems to me to be simply this: Are the agents entitled to be sisted to move for decree for expenses in their names as agents-disbursers, and if they are, in what situation are they to stand? Are they entitled to decree de plano in respect that the litigation as between the principal parties has been brought to an end by a settlement, which was made without their consent and which ignores their claims? Or can the appellant insist that they shall take the place of the respondent as if there had been no settlement with him, and undertake the onus of supporting on the merits the Sheriff's interlocutor against his appeal, on which, as against the agents, he proposes to stand, though he departs from it as against the client? The onus would probably not be a very heavy one, and not inconceivably the appellant's contention might end in a considerably increased claim by the agents against him. But the agents are entitled to resist, on matter of principle, the idea that they are bound to undertake any such onus.

I have come without hesitation to the conclusion that they are not so bound. It would be an almost grotesque situation, that the Court should be

Dec. 22, 1911. obliged—for ex hypothesi there would be no obstacle—to give effect to the minute for the appellant and assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action, and yet have to allow the action to proceed on the merits, with the agents as contradictors, in order to dispose of a question of expenses merely. Such a course would be against the whole tradition and practice of the Court.

Ammon v.
Tod.

Ld. Johnston.

It appears to me, therefore, that either the agents are not entitled to be sisted at all as agents-disbursers, after a settlement has been made between the principal parties to include expenses, or that they are entitled to be sisted and to obtain decree de plano for their expenses against their client's opponent, without having to carry on the litigation on the merits in order to vindicate their claim to expenses.

The leading case on the subject is Hamilton v. Bryson.¹ In this action damages had been found due, but remained to be assessed, and consequently there was no finding for expenses. The parties settled behind the agent's back for a sum to cover damages and expenses, and the agent took similar steps to those taken here. Notwithstanding the settlement, the Court decreed for expenses "to the effect that decret may go out for the amount of the expenses sustained in name of the agent." As the present appellant's contention is, so far as I understand it, based entirely on this, that by the appeal taken by him the case is still in dependence, I take the opportunity in passing to point out that Hamilton's case¹ was also not only in dependence in the Outer House, but was still subject to being reclaimed to the Inner House. In giving judgment Lord Meadowbank points out that up to that date the agent's equitable remedy had only been allowed in cases in which the clients were abiding by the ordinary course of judicial procedure, and an operative decree was going out in favour of one or the other in common course, and that the case before the Court was undoubtedly an extension of such equitable remedy to a case where the parties were departing from the ordinary course of judicial procedure, and settling the case between themselves, so as to avoid the necessity of any operative decree issuing. Lord Meadowbank, in extending the equitable right to the agent in the case before him, sought to place that right on the principle of implied lien. Lord Bannatyne, on the other hand, attributed it to the principle of jus quæsitum to the agent, which his employer could not discharge or disappoint. But I humbly doubt whether the rule can be referred to any particular principle of law. I think that it is enough to say that it is a rule of practice introduced on grounds both of equity and expediency. The important thing is that the equitable right was sustained by the Court at the stage which the case had reached, though individual Judges reserved their opinion as to whether at any stage of the case the agent could prevent a settlement which would result in disappointing his claim.

In *Rox v. Stewart*² Hamilton's case¹ was simply followed, but in *M'Lean v. Auchinvole*³ the rule was made more precise. It was "held that there were three cases in which an agent was entitled to insist in the process, to the effect of getting decree for the expenses in his own name: (1) Where expenses had actually been found due; (2) where they followed as a necessary consequence from the interlocutor previously pronounced; and (3) where the parties had entered into a compromise for the purpose of defeating his claim." The second case figured shows, I think, that the rule is an equitable and expedient one merely, and that it can hardly be reduced to a definite governing principle of law. It is expedient that a litigant, possibly of slender means, should be able to get his case taken up by an agent, and it is equitable that the agent should be able to look to a return for his risk and labour with some security. But there is a counter consideration. It is not expedient to encourage litigation or to prevent the timeous adjustment of differences, or equitable to give the agent such security for his remuneration unless his efforts have reached a point at which they may fairly be said to have materially influenced the result of the adversary's surrender. Hence the rider on the more general proposition that when expenses have not actually been found due, at least they must have followed as a necessary consequence of what had actually been done.

³ 3 S. 190.

Dec. 22, 1911.

Ammon v.
Tod.

Ld. Johnston.

The next case was Fergusson v. Richardson.¹ The circumstances are intricate, but the decision certainly carries the application of the rule quite as far as is sought here.

Subsequent cases have, I think, involved questions merely of the application of the rule of M'Lean's case.² Thus in *Murray v. Kidd*³ the agent was not allowed to sist himself because, though an interlocutor had been pronounced repelling the defences, expenses had been specially reserved. Without further litigation it could not be determined what the result in the matter of expenses would be. The case is, however, important, for whereas in the previous cases there was no hint of the agent being sisted that he might go on with the litigation in order to gain a judgment on the merits and so obtain a finding for expenses, but only of his being sisted to move for expenses in his own name, it was assumed that the former would have been necessary, and this was the reason why the agent's motion was refused. For the reason why expenses were reserved was that, though the defences were repelled, this only led to an accounting, and the real merits of the case lay in the accounting. But the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope), whose opinion evinces marked hostility to the rule, states what I think is the key to the decision of the present question, viz:—"The rule being fixed, it becomes a matter for stipulation in the compromise, when the parties know of the rule."

But there is one other case of importance, Cornwall v. Walker,⁴ where Lord President Inglis takes the opportunity of correcting the expression used in M'Lean's case,² viz., "followed as a necessary consequence." His Lordship says that a finding of expenses "never is a necessary result or consequence—it is always in the discretion of the Court, and depends more or less upon how the litigation has been carried on. The true rule is that the agent is entitled to sist himself and prosecute the case to obtain a finding of expenses in his favour, when such a finding of expenses is the legitimate consequence of what has been already done."

Such being the state of the authorities, I admit without hesitation that

Dec. 22, 1911. were this case in the position that further litigation was necessary in order to reach a point at which it could be said that an award of expenses would legitimately follow, the agents could not be heard to ask to sist themselves in order to carry the litigation to that point. But that is not the position here. The litigation has been carried to a point at which not only would an award of expenses legitimately follow, but it has actually been pronounced. That an appeal or a reclaiming note has been lodged does not alter that fact. The parties to the action enter on a compromise in the knowledge that an interlocutor finding on the merits and awarding expenses is standing. They compromise in order to get rid of both in favour of their own private arrangement, and in doing so they make it impossible that the action should go on to decide the merits of the appeal or reclaiming note. It would be against the whole catena of decisions, which has created and defined the agent's equitable right, that they should be so allowed thus to cut the ground from below his feet, where by his exertions he has brought the litigation to a point at which the rights of parties have been judicially, though it may be not finally, ascertained.

Ammon v.
Tod.

Ld. Johnston.

The true doctrine, in my opinion, is, that when litigants approach a compromise, the party who finds himself obliged to buy a discharge from claims must be held to know his opponent's agent's right, and must be held to contract with his opponent subject to that right. The limitation of that right admits of no continued litigation on the merits. Nor can a re-opening of the case on the merits with the agent be allowed in order to avoid his claim for expenses, when it has been closed with the client.

LORD KINNEAR.—I regret that I am unable to agree with the opinion just delivered, and the more so because I understand that your Lordships concur in it. But as I am unable to assent to the judgment proposed, I think it necessary to state my grounds, although I shall do so as shortly as possible.

I am inclined to agree with Lord Johnston that the authorities, so far as they go, are in favour of the view which he proposes that your Lordships should take ; but then I agree with him also in thinking that there is no principle of law to be extracted from those authorities which ought to determine the right now in dispute. I think these cases might be followed if it were not necessary to go any further than the decisions have already gone. But since there is, as I hold, and I think Lord Johnston holds also, no principle to support the decisions, I cannot see any reason why we should follow out those decisions to a logical consequence beyond what is definitely fixed.

Looking at the question as it is now raised, I of course concede, what is perfectly familiar doctrine, that when one of two parties to a cause has obtained a decree for expenses his agent is entitled to be sisted in order that he may obtain the decree in his own name. In the ordinary case there is no necessity for sisting as matter of practice, because counsel for the successful party moving for decree of expenses moves at the same time that the decree should go out in name of the agent-disburser and not in that of the client himself, and that is allowed as a matter of course. But that can only happen when it is already fixed and determined, not only that the party has a right to expenses, but that he has a right to the operative decree Dec. 22, 1911. for enforcing payment of these expenses; and therefore that practice does ^{Ammon v.} not appear to give the agent a right to come in to the exclusion of his client ^{Tod.} so long as it is still uncertain whether there is an absolute right to expenses ^{Lord Kinnear.} vested in his client or not.

I venture to say that there is no principle to support the claim now made, but I by no means say that there is no principle in law to support the agent's claim to recover the expenses in his own name in the ordinary case, and I think it is admitted on all hands that he is entitled to his decree, because that is a right which arises, not as against his client's opponent, but as against his client himself, upon the contract of agency. I agree with a remark which Lord Johnston made, that it is not exactly what has been called the agent's hypothec; it is not a right of retention (which I think a somewhat more apt expression in the language of our law). It is not a right of retention, because there is nothing actually in the agent's hands which he would be otherwise required to make over to his client; but it is a right arising out of the contract of agency, which has been pushed further than retention, to give him an effective security upon moneys which it is assumed belong to his client. It must arise out of the contract of agency if it be a right at all, and it must therefore be a right against the client, because the agent has no contractual relation whatever with his client's opponents. Therefore it seems to me to be clear that the condition of the agent's right to obtain decree against his client's opponent for a payment of money must be that the client has a fixed and absolute right to compel such payment. The agent may be entitled to enforce the claim for his own benefit because he has an effective security over a fund which he has recovered for his client in performance of his contract of agency. But the security cannot attach until it is fixed that the fund belongs to the client.

The client's right here depends upon a judgment of the Sheriff Court, which is brought before this Court by appeal, and we cannot assume that the judgment is right without hearing the appeal on its merits. We are told that the merits are no longer before us, because the parties who are domini litis have agreed upon a compromise, and that would be a perfectly satisfactory result, if the compromise were to receive effect. But the agent says he is entitled to disregard the compromise without allowing the question which it settled to be re-opened. I could have understood his position, although I think there is no sound principle to support it, if he had maintained that the compromise should be set aside altogether, and claimed to take his client's place as dominus litis and to carry on the litigation for his own benefit. But what he proposes is that your Lordships should affirm the judgment appealed against without hearing the appeal, so that decree should go out against the defender for the whole amount found due, notwithstanding that he has already paid a sum which his opponent has agreed to accept as sufficient. This appears to me an extravagant stretch of any right of security which can possibly arise out of the contract of agency. But it is said to be out of the question to allow the whole action upon the merits to be tried at the instance of the agent in order that the question of expenses might be settled so as to give him a Dec. 22, 1911. security which he has not yet got. Lord Johnston has said that your Lordships reject that idea, and I agree that that is out of the question. But it is equally out of the question that your Lordships should assume that the judgment under appeal is good without having heard the appellant upon the merits of his appeal. I concede that it is extremely likely that two consecutive judgments by the learned Sheriffs below may be right, but the Court of Appeal is not entitled to affirm them, any more than to reverse them, without hearing parties. I am not, therefore, prepared to hold against the appellant that the judgment is good, unless he consents to his appeal being dismissed, in which case there would be no difficulty. But his consent to the dismissal of the appeal is dependent upon the compromise receiving effect; and that is the reverse of a consent to the decree now proposed.

Lord Kinnear.

I confess that I am not sorry that my opinion on this subject can have no practical weight in the case, because I concede that there are authorities against it. I think the principle is against the authorities, and therefore I must express my dissent.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with Lord Johnston, and I do so for the reason that I think the matter is settled by the authorities.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with Lord Johnston.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Were the question open I confess I should agree with Lord Kinnear; but I look on the matter as absolutely settled by authority, and I cannot bring myself to the view that in doing what we propose to do to-day we are going any further than the case of Cheyne v. Cheyne.¹ I do not wish to go over the ground again, but I think the progress of the authorities may be very shortly stated. I take first the case of M'Lean & Macdonald v. Auchinvole.² That resulted in the expression of three propositions, that is to say, that an agent was entitled to insist on getting decree in his own name for expenses—first, where expenses had actually been found due; second, where expenses would have followed as a necessary consequence from the interlocutor pronounced; and third, where the parties had entered into a compromise for the purpose of defeating his claim,—the third case being where the process had not gone the length of expenses being found due. These three propositions the Court laid down in what was a carefully considered judgment.

The next stage was reached in the case of Murray v. Kyd,³ and the immediately succeeding case of Macqueen v. Hay,⁴ and there is no doubt that the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope to a great extent went back on M'Lean's case.² Now, if the authorities had remained in that state I should have thought the question to be open, but I think the end came when the effect of both of these sets of cases was considered by this Division of the Court in the case of Cornwall v. Walker,⁵ and I think that case was a considered judgment to the effect that the Court would abide by the view of M'Lean's case.² Lord President Inglis begins his judgment by saying that in cases where expenses have been found due before the compromise there is no difficulty whatever; so, putting aside the question whether a certain interlocutor takes along with it as a necessary consequence a finding of expenses—a question which does not arise here—that seems to me to settle the matter, but for the point that has been raised by Lord Kinnear.

Dec. 22, 1911.

Ammon v.

Tod.

Ld. President.

Lord Kinnear thinks that we are going further than we have gone before, because the interlocutor in this case is not final in the sense of not having yet become immune by the lapse of time against some process of review. I am unable to take this view, because I consider the point to have been already decided in the series of cases of which *M'Lean's*¹ was the first. There are two senses of the word "final." This case is here on an interlocutor which is final in the sense that it is final on the merits, but is not final in the sense of review. In the cases to which I have just referred there is no question that the interlocutors were final in the first sense, that is to say, on the merits. If that is so, I think it settles the question, for I cannot conceive of the main question that is before us arising after an interlocutor has been pronounced that is final in the second sense; there is then nothing to compromise. If a person has an interlocutor deciding a case on the merits, and then allows the appealing days or reclaiming days to run out, he has no quid pro quo, and in all of these cases there must, of necessity, be a quid pro quo. As long as appeal is open one party may say, "True it is that you have got your judgment in the Court below, but I am going to take you to the Court above, and you may lose what you have got," and the other party may then say that he will compromise. In the other case there is nothing to compromise with.

If the matter had been open I think one might, on principle, come to a perfectly different result, because I think it is very difficult to see why an agent should get anything more than what is his client's money, and expenses that have been decerned for do not become the client's money until the other party has surrendered them. But as the matter is not open I agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sist the minuters Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts as parties to the cause, to the effect and extent of finding them entitled to the expenses found due by the defender and appellant in the Sheriff Court, and find them entitled to these expenses accordingly (under the reservation that upon the appellant making payment to the said Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts of the said expenses he shall be entitled to receive from the said Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts an assignation of their right to recover the same from the pursuer and respondent); and also sist the said minuters Lindsay, Meldrum, & Oatts and Erskine Dods & Rhind to the effect and extent of finding the said minuters entitled to the expenses of the minute of sist . . . and procedure thereon in this Court: Find the said minuters entitled to these expenses accordingly: Allow accounts of the said expenses to be lodged, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and to report: Dismiss the appeal, and find the pursuer and respondent liable to

Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF STIRLING, Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—W. J. Robertson.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF DUNBLANE AND LECROPT, Defenders (Appellants).—Blackburn, K.C.—Wm. Mitchell.

Poor—Lunatic pauper—Capacity to acquire settlement—Proof of insanity —Effect of subsequent certificate of insanity.

In an action between two parish councils to determine which was liable to support a female pauper, who had been confined in a lunatic asylum on a certificate of insanity granted in 1908, the question depended upon whether, during the three years between 1903 (when she attained puberty) and 1906, she was mentally capable of acquiring a settlement in the parish in which she then resided.

Held that, in determining the question of the pauper's mental capacity during these years, the certificate of insanity subsequently granted raised no legal presumption of incapacity at the earlier period, but was merely one among other items of evidence to be taken into consideration.

Evidence of mental incapacity which was held sufficient to establish that a pauper was incapable of acquiring a residential settlement.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Poor—Pauper lunatic—Action to determine liability for pauper lunatic—Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 78.

Held that sec. 78 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857 (which contains a clause making the Sheriff's decision final), only applies to the summary recovery of outlays with regard to pauper lunatics where there is no dispute as to the parties liable to reimburse these, and does not apply to actions brought to determine the liability of parishes inter se for the support of pauper lunatics, and accordingly does not prevent an appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session in such actions.

EXTRA DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF STIRLING brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, at Dunblane, against the Parish Council of the Parish of Dunblane and Lecropt for repayment of various sums, amounting in all to £54, expended by the pursuers on the maintenance of a pauper named Marjory Faichney, from and after 18th March 1908, and for declarator that in future the defenders were liable for her support.

Marjory Faichney was born in the parish of Dunblane in 1891. She attained puberty in 1903, when she was residing in the parish of Stirling, and she continued to reside there until 1908, when she was certified as insane, and removed to Larbert Asylum. The settlement of her father, who died in 1902, was in Dunblane parish.

The pursuers, the Parish of Stirling, averred that Marjory Faichney was incapable, owing to her mental condition, of acquiring a settlement by residence in their parish after attaining puberty, and accordingly that Dunblane, as the parish of her birth or of her father's settlement, was liable for her support. The defenders averred that she had acquired a settlement by residence in Stirling. Dec. 22, 1911.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence will be found set forth in the Sheriff-substitute's note, infra. Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

On 1st March 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) That the action relates to the parish by which, as parish of settlement, Marjory Faichney, mentioned in the proof, is liable to be supported, and that it is not in dispute that the pursuers' parish of Stirling or the defenders' parish of Dunblane and Lecropt is the parish of her settlement; (2) that she is the daughter of William Faichney, labourer, Dunblane; (3) that she was born in 1891, and attained puberty in May 1903, at which time she was living with her mother in Stirling; (4) that her father died in 1902 in Stirling, but having a residential settlement, which he had never lost, in Dunblane; (5) that, at all events from very early youth, she has never been of normal intelligence, and that in 1908 she was certified to be insane; (6) that she is now a certified lunatic in Larbert Asylum under certificate of lunacy granted at said time; (7) that the Parish Council of Stirling in this action seek from the Parish Council of Dunblane reimbursement of sums paid for her support, and declarator that Dunblane, not Stirling, is liable in future for her support, maintaining that she never could or did acquire a settlement, and that Dunblane, as the parish of birth or the parish of her father's settlement, is the parish of her settlement; (8) that Dunblane contends that she was able to acquire and did acquire a residential settlement in Stirling, by residence for three years after the time of attaining puberty in 1903, during which years she was maintained without recourse to common begging or to parochial relief; (9) that she is not an idiot, but that her case is one of strong body, but of undeveloped mind and of much imbecility; (10) that there had been no pronounced change in her state prior to said certification, and that she might with the same justification have been certified insane at any time after attaining puberty; therefore finds (a) that she is a lunatic, and (b) was incapable of acquiring a settlement: Finds further in fact (11) that it is not established that the parish of Stirling has admitted that her settlement is in that parish, or (12) that the parish of Stirling has so acted as to deprive the parish of Dunblane of any evidence or to prejudice the position of that parish; therefore finds that her settlement is not in Stirling, but is in the defenders' parish of Dunblane; repels the defences, and grants decree of declarator and reimbursement as concluded for." *

* "NOTE.—The state of this young woman appears to be as follows:—She has been weak in mind from very early youth, and probably from birth. She was sent to school when she came to school age, but never made any real progress, though she learned to read a very few small short words and to write a very little, apparently by copying what was written for her. As she grew into a big girl, she did not associate with young people of her own age, but played with little children. She could distinguish between certain coins, such as a penny or a shilling, but she could not distinguish between such coins as a florin and a half-crown. At her home with her married sister she was very passionate without reason. She could wash a few dishes under supervision, but could not be trusted alone to go through the washing of the few dishes after a meal at which the family of three persons had been present. She could not be trusted to Dec. 22, 1911. The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 17th November 1911.

Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council. The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The appeal was incompetent under section 78 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857,* which applied to the present action, watch a pot on the fire, nor did she learn the time properly on the clock. Though fond of playing with children, she could not be trusted to 'mind' a baby for any length of time alone lest she should drop the baby when carrying it about. She was of dirty habits in her person, though she could manage as to the calls of nature without guidance. She could go a simple message at times, but could not be trusted with more than one message.

"In youth Marjory Faichney did not have the advantage of the special care and skilful training which can now be afforded for very feeble-minded children. It is quite possible that if early taken into such care she could have learned more than she did. An ordinary industrial school could not have taken her. It appears that since she has been placed in Larbert Asylum as a young woman she has, though very slowly, learned a certain amount more. She can now write her name if asked, and, if in a humour to do it, can sing over, or at least say over, a piece of a hymn or a song, can sew some simple sewing, and can knit and knows coins, and how many pennies go to sixpence, and can do a little simple addition. Some days, it is thought, she is more willing or more able than others to concentrate such mind as she possesses upon the questions put to her, and she may feel more friendly to some people than to others. It does not seem possible to find that she has ever had delusions—though in conversation with Dr Skinner she maintained wrongly that 'General' Booth of the Salvation Army was in Stirling at a particular time when he was not. But then he has been sometimes in Stirling, and she was often at Salvation Army meetings, and this may be just a stupid mistake—obstinately adhered to. Physically the girl is fairly well grown and strong. She was at one time sent away to a Salvation Army 'Home' in Dundee, with the idea that this

Sec. 78. "If the parish of the settlement of any such pauper lunatic cannot be ascertained, and if the lunatic has no means of defraying the expense of his maintenance, nor any relations who can be made liable for the same, the expenses attending the taking and sending such lunatic, and of his maintenance in the district asylum, shall be defrayed by the parish in and from which he was taken and sent, but with recourse, nevertheless, to such parish, at any time when it shall appear that such expenses are legally chargeable to any other party or parish, against such party or parish, and who or which shall be liable also in interest and expenses; and the Sheriff of the county in which the parish defraying such expenses in the first instance is situated shall certify under his hand the amount of such expenses; and such certificate shall be final and conclusive as to such amount, and shall not be subject to review by any process whatsoever under any proceeding instituted for recovery of the same, and the party entitled to recover such expenses shall proceed as accords of law against the party or the parish liable for the same, by summary process before the Sheriff of the county within which such party resides, or in which such parish is situated; and the judgment of such Sheriff shall be final: Provided always that the parish of settlement shall not in any case be liable in repayment of the expenses incurred in relation to any lunatic as aforesaid, unless written notice shall have been given by the parish or party disbursing the same to the parochial board of the parish of settlement, and shall then only be liable for the expenses incurred subsequent to such notice, and for the year preceding."

and enacted that the judgment of the Sheriff was to be final.¹ The fact that the case before the Sheriff had proceeded on the lines of an ordinary action did not take it out of the application of that section. The contention that it was now too late to state the objection was unsound.²

Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

Argued for the appellants ;—The appeal was competent, the action being an ordinary Sheriff Court action, and relating to a matter to which section 78 of the Act of 1857 had no application. Section 78 had no bearing upon the general question of the liability of parishes inter se for the support of lunatics. It merely provided a shorthand method of ascertaining certain expenses incurred in certain particular circumstances, and of recovering the amount so ascertained by a summary process, where the liability for the expenses was not disputed. The present was quite a different process, being an ordinary action with declaratory conclusions, which would determine a question would save her from the 'sexual dangers' which her sad state made very evident (these dangers have something to do with her being certified a lunatic), and with the idea that with firm control and work to do, she could be taught to do a maid-servant's work. But though the experience was very short, it was negative of her powers so far as it went, and the matron of the 'Home' did not consider her a case of sufficient intelligence to be hopeful, and handed her over to the poor law authorities because she was suffering from a skin disease (impetigo). This disease assailed her because of a low state of health at the time, and of the dirty habits contracted before she went to the 'Home.'

"On the evidence the Sheriff-substitute considers that this young woman has always been unable to earn her own living, and that she has always been unable to do more than a little simple house-work under close supervision. She is not an idiot. She is of small and undeveloped intelligence requiring the guidance and management and aid of others to enable her to have any decent life. She might never have been certified lunatic had the means, and perhaps the wisdom, of those around her enabled them to give to her the special care she needs. She has been getting that for more than two years now—but under a lunacy certificate. [The Sheriff then referred to the authorities on the question of capacity to acquire a settlement—which will be found cited in the argument in this report—and continued]—

"One must take this question from the point of view that lunacy is a fact (Cathcart case, 8 F. 870). Thus a person not certified at the time to which the inquiry relates, or never certified at all, may have been a lunatic and so incapable of acquiring a settlement by residence in a parish. Then there is the case of one who can be certified as having at some particular date become lunatic.

"In this case Stirling's contention is that there has been no deterioration making Marjory Faichney liable to be certified in 1908, though not sooner, but, on the contrary, that she could have been certified before the alleged qualifying residence began or at any time during it. In the examination of the evidence it is to be noticed that there are sundry medical certificates relating to the girl's state which do not affirm lunacy at all. As to this certain of the doctors artlessly say, 'Oh, yes, but then these were only certificates for getting her into the poorhouse.' It is also to be noticed that when an asylum was thought to be the best place of care it was not at all an easy matter to grant a certificate. Thus Dr Murray, medical officer for

Even, however, if the respondents were right in their contention that section 78 applied, and that there was no appeal, it could not avail them, because in that event the whole proceedings initiated by them in the Sheriff Court were inept and incompetent. They had not obtained the certificate which was required under section 78, and the action was not, as the section required it to be, a summary process,¹ but was in fact an ordinary action with a declaratory conclusion and condescendence.

Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that the objections which have been stated to the competency of this appeal are altogether untenable. The action before us is not founded on, and has nothing to do with, section 78 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857. That section does not deal with and in no way

Stirling (pursuer), says, 'I was requested by the inspector to watch the case and report progress. It was a case of this sort that I had to make a dozen or more visits to find out her mental condition . . . the difficulty was whether she had become insane or whether she was just an imbecile. I concluded that she was imbecile. I had seen her six or seven times before she was certified' (in 1908). The 'statement of facts indicating insanity observed by myself' in this certificate is certainly far from convincing. That also may explain Dr Carswell's answer.

"In March 1907, when those in charge of the Salvation Army Home at Dundee found that Marjory Faichney was not to be a success with them, and was suffering from impetigo caused by dirty habits, she had been examined by Dr Buist of Dundee ere admission to the poorhouse. The Sheriff-substitute is satisfied that he is a man of experience in mental cases, and gave careful, albeit brief, examination to the matter. He, in answer to the question 'Is applicant . . . lunatic, insane, idiot, or of unsound mind?' certified 'No.' She was in Dundee Poorhouse Infirmary for about a month, and was apparently so little suspected to be insane, that she was never so much as taken to the observation ward. Dundee, of course, gave information to Stirling and Dunblane. The former wrote to Dundee regarding her state thus, 'She is unfit to work, and has never been sent to employment being mentally deficient, . . . and has never been foris-familiated by being self-supporting.' At the beginning of the following month, after the girl had been returned to Stirling and to her sister's house there, Dr A. C. Buist of Dunblane, who had known her as a child, saw her there and certified her as 'well-developed physically and in good bodily health. Mentally she is weak, but the weakness is not of such extent as to prevent her from doing ordinary unskilled labour. If allowed to remain idle she will most probably deteriorate in mind and morals.'

"In the spring of 1908, after Dr Murray had made up his mind to certify Faichney to be a person 'of unsound mind,' it was resolved to obtain the sanction of the Board of Lunacy to board her out. The application bears that she is 'occasionally violent or noisy, that she is not of uncleanly habits or offensive to decency, nor dangerous to others day or night, and that she is capable of helping the proposed guardian a little in household or other work,' and the medical certificate bears that 'she does not require either for her own welfare or the safety of the public to be placed in an asylum.' Sanction having been got, an attempt was made to board her out at Causewayhead near Stirling. She would not stay, but returned to her sister's house. Then after some months authority was obtained to put her in the lunatic wards of Linlithgow poorhouse, but the governor of that poorhouse affects the common law rights and liabilities of parishes inter se for the support of pauper lunatics. It provides a shorthand method for ascertaining expenses in a special case, and recovering the amount so ascertained by a summary process. A consideration of section 78, read along with the immediately preceding sections, makes this perfectly clear. Section 76 provides for the recovery from the parish of settlement of "all the expenses attending the taking and sending a pauper lunatic to any district asylum in or from any parish which is not the parish of the settlement of such lunatic." Section 77 then proceeds to provide for the recovery of the expense incurred by any superintendent of any asylum in relation to the examinareturned her without a day's delay because she was suffering again from a skin disease which made her unsafe for the other patients. Then it was, in September 1908, that the inspector of Stirling, after, of course, a petition setting forth that she was a proper person for treatment in an asylum for the insane, and producing medical certificates to that effect, obtained warrant of the Sheriff to send her to Larbert Asylum, the asylum where Stirling lunatic paupers are boarded. It cannot be disputed by anyone that to treat her at Larbert is one very good and humane way of treating her, though the well-known specialist, Dr Yellowlees, thinks that the case was not bad enough for an asylum, and that he would not have certified her, 'but some people would have certified her.' There is strong medical opinion from others that she was wisely certified, and that the asylum is the proper place for her.

"At all events certified she is—and it is not a question for the Court what is the best way of treating a particular lunatic. The motive certainly was the difficulty of otherwise disposing of the pauper. The effect in law of the certifying of the pauper, together with the strong medical evidence that she might have been certified at a far earlier date (including the time when she was twelve years old), is this, viz., the certification is proof that the girl was insane at its date. The certification is also an important piece of evidence that she was insane at an earlier date if the proof shows, as it is here held to show, that the mental condition has been practically the same from a period long anterior to the certification. The case is one of an undeveloped intellect, in which no definite change can be pointed to, but on the contrary in which the condition is shown not to have changed, and, indeed, in which no change could have taken place. The Sheriff-substitute holds on the facts as a whole that the imbecility, which at the time of certification was great enough to warrant the certificates, has existed all along and would have warranted earlier certification.

"So far as matter of law is involved in this opinion, the Sheriff-substitute refers to the opinion of Lord Skerrington in the case of Inverkip v. Nairn, Scots Law Times for 1909, p. 99; aff. 47 S. L. R., p. 54, 26th October 1909.

"That case is the more in point because Lord Skerrington would have thought, apart from the certification, that the case of the Inverkip pauper was ruled by the decisions in such cases as Cassels (12 R. 1155). That is just what the Sheriff-substitute would say of Marjory Faichney. He cannot express himself as wholly satisfied with the state of matters, because it is evident that the differentiation of one person from another in much the same mental condition is made a question not so much for the Court as for varying medical opinion as to what may be the best way to treat the case. But this Inverkip case seems entirely in point.

"It is thought, therefore, that the Sheriff-substitute must pronounce this pauper to have been lunatic and incapable of acquiring a residential settlement during the period within which Dunblane contends that such a settlement was acquired. . . ."

Dec. 22, 1911. tion, removal, and maintenance of any lunatic, and then follows section 78, which provides:—"If the parish of the settlement of any such pauper lunatic cannot be ascertained . . . the expenses attending the taking and sending such lunatic, and of his maintenance in the district asylum, shall be defrayed by the parish in and from which he was taken and sent, but with recourse, nevertheless, to such parish at any time when it shall appear that such expenses are legally chargeable to any other party or parish, against such party or parish . . ."; and then there follow provisions for the ascertainment and recovery of these expenses which amount to this, that the Sheriff of the county defraying the expenses in the first instance is to certify their amount; that his certificate is to be final; and that any proceedings necessary for recovery are to be summary in their character, and that the Sheriff's judgment is to be final.

Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.
Lord Kinneear.

Accordingly, what is provided for is a summary method for recovering expenses from a parish whose liability for these expenses is apparent, and where the only questions are whether the expenses have in fact been defrayed by the party claiming recourse and, if they have, what is the amount? It is a condition precedent to the summary process that the expenses are legally chargeable to some other parish or party. So long as there is a dispute between two parties which is the party truly liable, section 78 does not come into operation, and the question of legal liability falls to be determined by the ordinary forms of process. If the action had been rested on section 78 the whole procedure which has taken place in the Sheriff Court would have been incompetent, because the requirements of the statute both as to the certificate which is to be the basis of the summary process prescribed, and as to the summary character of that process, have been completely disregarded. But the pursuers do not found their case upon that section; and I find nothing in the section to prevent them from raising an action in ordinary form to determine whether their parish or another is liable to maintain a particular pauper.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think section 78 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857, was intended to apply to the decision of questions of liability between parishes. It seems to me ancillary to section 77, which provides that the expenses incurred by any superintendent of an asylum, or other party, for the examination, removal, and maintenance of a pauper lunatic, shall be defrayed by the parish of settlement of the lunatic, and that the superintendent, or other party, disbursing such expenses shall be entitled to recover them from those liable to defray the same. That section deals with expenses disbursed by an individual. Section 78 deals with the case where the parish of settlement of the lunatic cannot be ascertained, and provides that in such cases the expenses shall be defrayed by the parish from which the pauper lunatic was taken. The Sheriff of the county, in which the parish defraying such expenses is situated, shall certify the amount thereof. Then the party (not the party or parish) entitled to recover such expenses shall proceed against the parish liable by summary process before the Sheriff, and the judgment of the Sheriff shall be final. That is simply a shorthand method for getting repayment of the expenses incurred under section 77. It therefore seems to me that the whole question of ulterior liability is left to be determined by the ordinary processes of law.

Dec. 22, 1911.
Stirling
Parish Council
v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

The Court having repelled the objection to the competency of the appeal, the case was then heard on the merits.

Argued for the appellants;—The pauper had acquired a residential settlement in Stirling. She had admittedly resided there for the necessary period without recourse to public charity (and that, it had been held, was equivalent to “maintaining” herself¹); and the only question, accordingly, in the case was whether during the period of her residence she was, looking to her mental condition, capable of acquiring a residential settlement for the purposes of the poor-law. In the circumstances here that question fell to be answered in the affirmative. All that the law required was that the pauper should be mentally capable of exercising some degree of option or volition,² and the law assumed that such capacity existed in every person (not confined in an asylum) who was not positively insane or completely imbecile and idiotic.³ The pauper in the present case was, as the evidence showed, very far removed from either of these conditions. The pursuers, however, based their case chiefly on the certificate of 1908. That certificate had no importance except as an item of evidence, which might or might not throw light on her mental condition at the earlier period. In itself a certificate was not necessarily evidence that the certified person was incapable of exercising the necessary volition. That was a fact which required to be substantively established by evidence.⁴ It was true that a certified person was rarely capable of exercising volition and so acquiring a settlement, because certified persons were generally confined in asylums, and were thus, like prisoners in prison, deprived of the power of exercising such volition as they had.⁵ It was the confinement, however, and not the certificate which produced this result. It followed, accordingly, that mere proof that the pauper at the earlier period was in the same mental condition as at the date of her certification did not necessarily prove that at the earlier period she was incapable of acquiring a settlement, because at the later period it was not her mental condition but her confinement which made her incapable. The Inverkip case⁶ made no addition to, or alteration on, the previously established law. It was certainly no authority for the extravagant proposition that a certificate of insanity granted in 1908 drew back to 1903 provided it was supported by some evidence of incapacity at the earlier period. Upon the whole matter the evidence

v. Dunblane
Parish
Council.

Argued for the respondents;—The pauper had not acquired a residential settlement in Stirling, inasmuch as she had not during her period of residence there been in a mental condition in which she was capable of acquiring it. A survey of the cases disclosed the fact that the law recognised two tests of capacity, which were not, perhaps, entirely consistent with each other, but the poor-law was not conspicuous for its consistency. The first of these tests was the test adopted by the appellants, viz., whether the pauper was possessed of some power of volition or option. That test was not the one appropriate to the present case, but even were it to be applied the evidence showed that the pauper, during the period in question, was not possessed of the necessary power of volition. The other test, which, being clear and definite, was always to be applied where possible, was whether the pauper was certified or certifiable under the Lunacy Acts.² Here the pauper was certified in 1908. At that date, accordingly, it followed ipso facto that she was incapable of acquiring a settlement. It was proved by the evidence that her condition between 1903 and 1906 was precisely the same as her condition in 1908, ergo between 1903 and 1906 she was also incapable of acquiring a settlement. This method of reasoning had been recognised by the Court in the undernoted cases.³ The appellants' argument that it was not the certificate but the confinement that followed upon it which was of importance had already been stated in Cathcart,⁴ and inferentially rejected. The pauper's intelligence in the present case was lower than that of many persons who had been found incapable of acquiring a settlement.

At advising on 22nd December 1911,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuers in this case are the Parish Council of Stirling, and the defenders are the Parish Council of Dunblane and Lecropt. The question is whether or not the defenders are liable to relieve the pursuers of the maintenance of Marjory Faichney, who is (and has been since 1908) a pauper inmate of Larbert Asylum. Marjory Faichney was born on 12th May 1891, and therefore attained the age of puberty on 12th May 1903. Her father died in 1902, having a settlement in the defenders' parish, though he had for some years prior to his death resided in Stirling. Her mother died in 1904. After that, the girl continued to live in the same house with her sisters, and (after March 1905) with the eldest of these, who at that time married a man named Thomson. In March 1908 Thomson applied for and got relief from the Stirling Inspector of Poor on Marjory's behalf. On 16th September 1908 the girl was admitted to the Larbert Dec. 22, 1911. Asylum (where she has since remained) upon a petition to the Sheriff Stirling accompanied by proper medical certificates, including an emergency certi- Parish Council cate to the effect that she was of unsound mind and a proper patient to be v. Dunblane placed in an asylum. The question of legal liability depends on whether Parish Council or not Marjory Faichney had prior to 1908 acquired a residential settlement Lord Dundas. in Stirling; and this again depends—the fact of residence being admitted—on whether or not, looking to her mental condition during the three years following on her attainment of puberty, she was capable of acquiring a settlement. The decision of the case depends, to my mind, wholly upon the view to be taken of the facts admitted or proved, but as we had a very full citation of authority at the discussion, it may be well at this stage to say what seems necessary in regard to existing decisions.

The recent case of *Kilmalcolm*¹—to go no further back—decides that, if a person has resided in a parish for the requisite period and has been maintained without recourse to common begging or to parochial relief, mental weakness, short of lunacy or idiocy, will not incapacitate him from acquiring a residential settlement there. Lord Robertson, in the course of his opinion, sketched the development of judicial construction, whereby the literal meaning of the words “maintained himself,” which occur in section 76 of the Poor Law Act, 1845, and are repeated in section 1 of the Act of 1898, has apparently been reduced to one synonymous with “lived,” but observed that “whether the authorised construction of the words ‘maintain himself’ will stand the strain of a condition of insanity” was “a question generically different from that before the House.” The Kilmalcolm case¹ was immediately followed by that of Cathcart,² the decision of which had, as appears from the reports, been delayed pending the judgment of the House of Lords. The Second Division—adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall)—decided that “a person who is in fact insane, although not certified or under restraint, is incapable of acquiring a residential settlement.” It appeared that the pauper had resided in Cathcart parish from 1895 to 1903, and it was only in the latter year that he was certified insane and removed to an asylum, but the evidence showed that he was, during the whole period, in a fit state for certification, and would in fact have been certified as early as 1895 but for his mother’s strong aversion to that course. I observe that the reclaimers’ counsel argued—and the argument bears a very close resemblance to that maintained before us by Mr Blackburn for the present defenders—that “an insane person was not incapacitated from acquiring a settlement by residence unless he was certified to be insane and placed under restraint either in an asylum or in private custody. It was not insanity, or even certified insanity, that prevented de facto residence having the usual effect, but the fact of the residence being not voluntary but compulsory, and under restraint.” I notice also that reference was there made in the argument to, inter alia, an Outer House decision, Cramond,³ where Lord Kincairney said he thought “the cases have come to hold the test to be a certificate of lunacy and admission to a lunatic asylum on such a certificate.” The Second

Dec. 22, 1911. Division, however, emphatically rejected the reclaimers' contentions. The Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion is short and strong, and Lord Stormonth-Darling said,—“In none of the cases has it ever been laid down that a medical certificate of lunacy was indispensable, or that insanity might not be proved as a fact in the case. On the contrary, Lord President Inglis in the case of Cassels v. Somerville and Scott,¹ after stating it as settled by the case of *Melville v. Flockhart*² that a person who was boarded in an asylum could not acquire a settlement in the parish in which the asylum was situated, and by the case of Watt v. Hannah,³ that the same result followed if the person was sent to be boarded under a keeper in respect he was a lunatic, went on to say,—‘The pauper here was not sent to be boarded in Lesmahagow because he was insane, but because, his mind being weak, he was not capable of earning a livelihood like other men in his position. He was not in any sense a lunatic.’ And his Lordship added,—‘It might have been shown that, though he had not been certified a lunatic, he was nevertheless one in fact.’” So much for the case of Cathcart.⁴ A later decision referred to in the discussion at our bar was Inverkip,⁵ to the supposed legal import of which too much was, in my opinion, attempted to be attached. I do not think the decision in the Inverkip case⁵ (to which I was a party) was intended to introduce, or did introduce, any new principle of law or rule of practice; it merely applied the result of prior decisions to the particular facts before the Court. Accordingly, I am not surprised to find that the case has not apparently been thought worthy of a place in the official series of our reports. The gist of the matter was this: the pauper was certified insane and admitted to an asylum in January 1905; but the crucial period in relation to her mental condition was that immediately following her attainment (in November 1899) of the age of puberty. The Court held it proved on the facts that there was practically no change in her condition between the two dates; and as it seemed clear that she was insane at the later date, “the natural and indeed inevitable conclusion” (as Lord Low put it) was “that at the former date she was also insane.” At the same time it was clearly stated, both in the Outer and the Inner House, that the fact of certification in 1905 did not of itself justify an inference of insanity in 1899, and raised no legal presumption to that effect,—a view which, I notice, had already been expressed, mutatis mutandis, by Lord Kincairney in the Cramond case.⁶ I think these views are correct; and that the fact of subsequent certification has not necessarily of itself any special virtue or significance as throwing light on anterior conditions, but is just one of the elements to be taken into account along with the others in a case where it is present. Nor do I consider that (as was suggested to us in the argument) Lord Moncreiff's opinion in the Outer House case of *Glenbucket*⁷ was intended to have, or has, when fairly read in the light of the facts then before him, any other or different import.

It seems, then, to be decided that insanity, for the purposes of a case like the present, does not require to be evidenced by actual certification and confinement, but may be established as a fact by other proof; and that, Dec. 22, 1911. where a certificate exists, it does not of itself necessarily warrant an inference of insanity at a previous period. One must endeavour to apply these rules to the facts of the present case. The learned Sheriff-substitute (who has evidently bestowed much care upon the matter) has decided in favour of the pursuers. He considers, in the first place, and I think rightly, that Marjory Faichney must be taken to have been insane at the date of her admission to the asylum, and to be so still. I do not see that any other conclusion could properly be reached, looking to the fact of her certification and the whole other evidence bearing upon this point. But the Sheriff-substitute also "holds on the facts as a whole that the imbecility, which at the time of certification was great enough to warrant the certificate, has existed all along and would have warranted earlier certification." This is, to my mind, the crucial point in the case; for if the girl must be taken to have been insane in 1908, and if her mental condition from the age of puberty onwards has been practically the same, then, "the natural and indeed inevitable conclusion" (to use once more Lord Low's words in the Inverkip case¹) must be "that at the former date she was also insane." The Sheriff-substitute has summarised the mental condition of this girl at the outset of his note in a manner which both parties admitted to be substantially accurate and exhaustive; and he has considered and dealt with the points (and they are far from unimportant) in the evidence which tend in the defenders' favour. I do not propose to discuss the proof in detail, though I have read it carefully. It is enough to say that I should be very slow to differ from the learned Sheriff-substitute's conclusion upon a question of fact, unless I thought that he had plainly erred, which I certainly am not in this case prepared to affirm. Indeed, I rather think the scale may be considered to be decisively turned against the defenders by a passage in the evidence of their own witness, Dr Yellowlees, whose views are, of course, entitled to great weight in such matters. He agrees that this girl is a congenital imbecile, though (he considers) of a mild type; he states the opinion (based upon some degree of personal knowledge in both instances) that her mental case is worse than that of the Inverkip pauper; and he adds,—"I think her mental condition now is what she was born with." On the whole, therefore, I think we ought not to differ from the Sheriff-substitute's decision; and that we may of new find in fact and in law in terms of his interlocutor, though I do not greatly admire the actual terms in which it is framed. I ought, perhaps, to add that his decision upon the pleas in bar stated for the defenders was not made the subject of appeal in the discussion before us.

In arriving at these conclusions, I have not left out of view that it may well be, indeed I think it is, the fact that the mental condition of Marjory Faichney was and is no worse than that of some of those other afflicted beings who in previous cases have passed muster at the sight of the Court as capable of acquiring a residential settlement. But it would be vain to attempt to regulate our decisions by a method of comparison of the proofs submitted in successive cases; at the best, we can but try to preserve some

Dec. 22, 1911. degree of uniformity of rule and principle. This view has often been expressed by the Court in similar cases, e.g., by Lord Stormonth-Darling in the Kirkintilloch case,¹ where he said that "in all poor-law questions it is of much more importance to preserve uniformity of decision than to make any particular case square exactly with one's own notions of logic or even equity." Even more apposite here are Lord Ardwall's words in the Cathcart case²: "I am conscious that it is not easy to see as a mere question of fact why the pauper in this case should be deemed incapable of acquiring a settlement for himself, and the paupers in the cases of *Kirkintilloch*³ and Glasgow"⁴ (the Kilmalcolm case), "above quoted, should have been deemed capable of acquiring such settlement. But it has been recognised by the Court that some general rules should be laid down in such matters for the guidance of parishes, even though the application of these rules to particular cases may sometimes appear to produce anomalies." I quote this passage, not only because I agree with what Lord Ardwall said, but because it shows that "anomalies" precisely similar to those (such as they are) of the present case—which the Sheriff-substitute and counsel at our bar appear to think originated in the Inverkip case⁵ in 1909—were present to Lord Ardwall's mind in 1905, as raised by the case he was then considering. As already observed, I do not think anything said or decided in the Inverkip case⁵ altered in any way, for better or worse, the law or practice in such matters.

It might perhaps be desirable, from the point of view of expediency, that a definite line should be drawn, for the guidance of practitioners in this somewhat arid and artificial region of the law, between insanity and non-insanity in questions of settlement, by requiring, e.g., the facts of certification and detention as proof of the former, and holding everything short of or different from these facts to be insufficient. Some such rule might probably minimise, or even extirpate, the expensive and regrettable class of litigations, of which the present is the latest example; though it would very likely result in a much greater number of paupers being certified in the future than has been customary in the past. But, if a new departure of the sort is desirable, it would, I apprehend, require to be inaugurated by the Legislature, and not by the Judges of the Court of Session.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

MRS MARY JANE BANNOCHIE OR COATS, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—

No. 54.

Defenders (Respondents).—Chree—Carmont.

Dec. 22, 1911.

Coats v.
Bannochie's
Trustees.

Husband and Wife—Wife's capacity to contract—Assignment of spes successionis—Mandate to wife's father's trustees to retain her share of his estate.

A married woman, with consent of her husband, undertook that any debt due by her husband to her father at the latter's death should "form a debt due" by her and "a deduction from" her share of her father's estate. The agreement was contained in a deed signed by her and delivered to her father.

In an action for legitim brought by her against her father's trustees after his death (when her husband's indebtedness to her father admittedly exceeded her share of legitim), the pursuer pleaded that the agreement was not binding upon her, in respect that it was a personal obligation undertaken by a married woman.

Held that the agreement was binding, in respect that it was more than a personal obligation by the wife, being a mandate to her father's trustees to retain her share of his estate, and was effectual even though the subject dealt with was a spes successionis.

On 12th April 1910 Mrs Mary Jane Bannochie or Coats, wife of 2^D DIVISION. and residing with Thomas Archibald Coats, brought an action against Ld. Ormidale.
George Bennet Mitchell and others, James Bannochie's testamentary trustees, for declarator that, as one of James Bannochie's children, she was entitled to legitim, and for payment of her share thereof. There was also a conclusion for reduction of the after-mentioned holograph writing of the pursuer dated 10th June 1902.

The pursuer averred that her father, James Bannochie, died testate on 29th June 1909, leaving certain moveable estate, out of which she claimed legitim.

The trustees under James Bannochie's will defended the action and lodged a statement of facts in which they averred:—(Stat. 1) "On 10th June 1902 the pursuer executed and delivered to the truster a holograph writing in the following terms:—'I, Mary Bannochie or Coats, wife of and residing with Thomas Archibald Coats, S.S.C., Aberdeen, do hereby undertake and agree that in the event of my said husband being indebted to you, James Bannochie above designed, to any extent at the time of your death, whether by way of obligation to any bank or bill or otherwise on any document held by you, the amount of said indebtedness shall, unless and until liquidated by the said Thomas Archibald Coats, form a debt due by me, and a deduction from my share of your means and estate.

' Adopted as holograph.

' MARY COATS.'

Said writing was executed by the pursuer with consent of her husband, who appended thereto the following docquet:—'I approve and confirm the above.

THOMAS A. COATS.'

The pursuer replied:—(Ans. 1) "Admitted that the said writing was executed by the pursuer, and the said docquet by her husband. They are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained and averred that at the time of signing said writing the pursuer was a married woman, and was accordingly incapable of granting such an obligation as the said writing purports to grant; that she was in ignorance of her legal rights in her father's estate; that she had no independent legal advice, and that she received no consideration in exchange for signing said document. Further, the pursuer understood from her father that her share of his means and estate would be largely in excess of all sums advanced by him to her husband."

The defenders also averred, as was ultimately admitted, that at the date of James Bannochie's death the pursuer's husband was indebted to him in an amount which exceeded her share of legitim.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, as one of the children of the said deceased James Bannochie, being entitled to legitim, and the defenders, as trustees and executors foresaid, being bound to hold just count and reckoning with her therefor, the pursuer is entitled to decree for the amount of said legitim, with interest and expenses as concluded for. (2) The pursuer having been a married woman at the time she executed the said pretended undertaking or agreement, she is not bound thereby, and the same should be set aside as null and void and of no force or effect as excluding the pursuer's claim to legitim. (3) The said pretended undertaking or agreement having been granted by the pursuer in ignorance of her legal rights in her father's estate is not binding on her, and ought to be set aside. (4) The said pretended undertaking or agreement having been granted without any consideration therefor, and for an indefinite amount, is null and void, and ought to be set aside.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders not being due any sum to the pursuer are entitled to absolvitor. (2) The defenders being entitled to set off against the pursuer's legitim the debts due by her husband to the truster at his death, and said debts being in excess of the pursuer's share of legitim, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The pursuer's averments in support of the reductive conclusion of the summons are irrelevant.

On 25th February 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) repelled the second plea in law for the pursuer, and continued the cause for further hearing.*

* "OPINION.—Mr James Bannochie died on 29th June 1909. This is an action at the instance of one of his children—Mrs Coats—against his trustees and executors for payment of legitim. The defenders plead that they are entitled to set off against the pursuer's legitim, the debts due by her husband to her father at the time of his death, and that, as these debts are in excess of the pursuer's share of legitim, they are entitled to absolvitor. The right to set off these debts depends on the nature and effect of a holograph writing, admittedly executed by the pursuer, dated 10th June 1902. It is quoted in the defenders' statement 1. The pursuer maintains that it is a cautionary obligation and nothing else. It is not disputed that if this is so, it is not binding on the pursuer, she being a married woman.

"In my judgment the writing is not a cautionary obligation, except perhaps in the sense that the bond and assignation in security by Mrs Halkett was a cautionary obligation in the case of the Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor, (1891) 18 R. 615, for I think that here, as there, the wife did agree to interpose her personal credit for the purpose of assisting her husband. But she did not do so by becoming cautioner for him. The writing, if not strictly speaking an assignation, is of the nature of an assignation. No doubt the right to claim legitim did not vest in the pursuer until her survivance of her father, and, so regarded, is a mere spes successionis. But it seems to me to be none the less suscep-

On 9th March 1911 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this inter-locutor:—"Repels the third and fourth pleas in law for the pursuer, and in respect it is admitted at the bar that at the date of the death of the truster the debts due by the pursuer's husband to the truster were in excess of the sum of £700 sued for, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." Dec. 22, 1911.
Coats v.
Bannochie's
Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 15th November 1911.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) On a true construction of the writing in question, it constituted a personal obligation undertaken by the pursuer, by which she became cautioner for her husband's debts.¹ Such an obligation by a married woman was not binding upon her.² The leading clause in the document was the pursuer's "agreement" that her husband's debt should "form a debt due" by her. The reference to the pursuer's share of her father's estate was not in form an assignation. Further, a spes successionis was not property,³ and therefore could not fall within the rule by which a wife is entitled to be dealt with prior to the parent's death. It may certainly be satisfied, in whole or in part, by advances made to a child by a parent during his lifetime, and as certainly it cannot be gratuitously defeated by the parent. In any view of the right, the pursuer's legitim was at her own absolute disposal. It was her separate estate and she was, it seems to me, entitled to deal with it in any way she pleased.—Biggart v. City of Glasgow Bank, (1879) 6 R. 470; Burnet v. British Linen Bank, (1888) 25 S. L. R. 356.

"What she did do here, if not to assign it in security, was to give her father a mandate to treat it as a fund of credit for her husband, and to authorise him to debit it with the amount of any advances made by him to her husband. The essence of a cautionary obligation is that the cautioner becomes personally bound along with the principal debtor. Here it may be noted that at the date of the holograph writing there was no principal debtor for there was no principal debt. The wife's transaction with her father constituted an independent and substantive agreement. Moreover, she came under no personal obligation at all—none, at any rate, which the defenders are under any necessity by action or diligence of enforcing against her. If the writing had concluded with the words 'shall form a debt due by me,' there might have been room for the plea that there was a personal obligation of a cautionary nature. But I read these words as entirely separable from, or at most as merely introductory to, what follows. They are not the words on which the defenders found. They ignore them, as I think they are entitled to do, and rest their claim on the words 'shall form a deduction from my share of your means and estate.'

"What the wife did, therefore, was to bind, not herself, but her estate, and that has always been regarded as a vital distinction.—Watson v. Henderson, July 9, 1802, Hume, 208; Harvey & Fawell v. Chessels, Feb. 21, 1791, Bell's Octavo Cases, 255. This appropriation of her future estate might have been unavailing if there had been anyone in the person of a creditor to challenge it or to interfere with its operation.—Bedwells & Yates v. Tod, Dec. 2, 1819, F. C.; Graham & Company v. Raeburn & Verel, (1895) 23 R. 84. But there is no one claiming such a right.

"I shall therefore repel the second plea in law for the pursuer."

had power to deal with her separate estate.¹ The only agreement which it was possible to make with reference to a spes successionis was an "agreement to convey the subject of the expectancy when it shall vest,"² and this was a personal obligation which was not binding on a married woman. (2) If the pursuer's second plea in law was repelled, she was entitled to a proof of her averments in support of her third and fourth pleas.

Argued for the defenders ;—(1) All obligations by a married woman charging or alienating her separate estate were effectual, even where they were accessory to a personal obligation which per se might not be binding.³ The agreement contained in the document of 10th June was in effect an assignation of the pursuer's personal estate in security of her husband's debts, and was binding upon her. Express words of conveyance were not necessary to constitute an assignation.⁴ If in addition the document contained a personal obligation, that was accessory to the assignation and would be disregarded. It was immaterial that the subject-matter of the transaction was a right in expectancy. A spes successionis could be assigned so as to give the assignee a good title to the subject when it came to be vested in the assignor.⁵ A married woman could assign a right in expectancy just as validly as she could assign any portion of her separate estate. (2) There were no relevant averments to support the third and fourth pleas in law for the pursuer. Want of consideration was no ground for reducing the agreement, and there was no statement that her ignorance caused her to sign the deed, or that she was induced to sign by any misrepresentation.

At advising on 22nd December 1911,—

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case we had an interesting argument as to the law applicable to the obligations of a married woman ; but in the end it became clear that parties were not so much at variance with regard to the law as with regard to its application to the document of 10th June 1902, on which the whole defence is founded. Speaking generally, and without attempting a complete statement of the law, it may be taken that a personal obligation granted by a married woman, even with her husband's consent, is not binding upon her unless it is in rem versum of her or relates to her separate estate. On the other hand, a married woman may validly convey or assign her separate estate to pay her husband's debts, and may grant securities over her separate estate to a creditor of her husband for the same purpose, although a personal obligation undertaken by her for behoof of her husband, such as a cautionary obligation, is not enforceable against her even to the extent of her separate estate.

⁵ Trappes v. Meredith, (1871) 10 Macph. 38.

Assuming this to be a correct statement of the law, it remains to be considered how it applies to the writing in question. If that writing is to be read, as the pursuer's counsel argued, as a personal obligation undertaken by the wife along with an implied assignation of her spes successionis in her father's estate in security of her own personal obligation, I should be disposed to sustain her second plea in law. I cannot, however, so read it. I think that it does import a personal obligation upon her, and to that extent it would not be enforceable against any separate estate other than her share of her father's succession. But I think it is something more. Reading out the words which may be held to constitute the personal obligation, the document is, in substance, an undertaking by the pursuer that the amount of her husband's indebtedness, as at the time of her father's death, should form a deduction from her share of his means. Whether that is regarded as an assignation or not, it is, at all events, a mandate to his trustees to retain her share in liquidation of this indebtedness. It requires no personal action against her to make this mandate effectual, because the trustees are already in possession of the funds; and it appears to me to be very much in the same position as a pledge by a lady of her jewels to a creditor of her husband, or a conveyance of her separate estate to such a creditor. Transactions of this kind were held to be unchallengeable by the wife more than two centuries ago, when the law with regard to a married woman's personal obligations was rigidly applied (*Eleis v. Keith*¹; *Marshall v. Ferguson*²). I cannot differentiate this case from these or from the later case of The Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society.³

Lord Salvesen.

Another argument addressed to us on behalf of the pursuer was that the subject assigned, being a spes successionis which is not property, could not be validly conveyed by a married woman; that, in fact, the document conveyed nothing inasmuch as the granter had nothing to convey, and in the words of Lord Rutherford Clark in Reid v. Morrison,⁴ "It becomes effectual by accretion alone. Till then it is nothing but a mere agreement to convey the subject of the expectancy when it shall vest." It was maintained upon these words that the document founded on was, at most, a mere obligation to convey the pursuer's share of her father's estate, and, as such, was of the nature of a personal obligation.

I do not think any such conclusion is to be drawn from the words which I have read. I am not sure that the word "accretion" used by that very eminent Judge was a happy one; but all that it imports is that the conveyance cannot take effect until the subject vests. At any rate I see no warrant for the distinction that is sought to be drawn between an assignation of property in security of a husband's debt and an assignation of a chance that the assignor may become the proprietor of the subject assigned. It being perfectly clear that a spes successionis is assignable, I see no reason for inferring that a married woman is under a greater disability in dealing with her hopes of succession than with the succession itself when it has vested in her. I think, therefore, we must repel the second plea in law for the pursuer.

The third and fourth pleas are based on very meagre averments. The

Dec. 22, 1911. pursuer says that at the time of granting the document of 10th June she was in ignorance of her legal rights in her father's estate; that she had no independent legal advice; and that she received no consideration in exchange for signing the document. Further, she understood from her father that her share of his means and estate would be largely in excess of all sums advanced by him to her husband. In my opinion these averments are irrelevant to support a reduction of the document. There is no statement of what her ignorance consisted in. She does not say that but for this ignorance she would not have signed the document in question; nor is there any statement that she was induced to sign under error induced by misrepresentation; for even if the pursuer's father told her that her share of his means would be in excess of the sums that he had already advanced, that statement may have been perfectly accurate when it was made. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in repelling the third and fourth pleas in law for the pursuer, and also in his conclusion that the defenders fall to be assoilzied.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—
Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Heat apoplexy.

A plumber, who was engaged in laying and jointing iron pipes in the open air on a day of unusual heat and who had to stoop at his work, was taken ill while so employed and died some days afterwards from heat apoplexy.

Held that, even assuming that there had been an "accident," it did not arise "out of" the deceased's employment, as there was no peculiar danger to which he had been exposed by the nature of his employment beyond that to which other persons who had to stoop at outdoor labour on the day in question were exposed.

1ST DIVISION. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Hawick, in which Mrs Mary Blakey sought compensation from Robson, Eckford, & Company, Limited, contractors, Hawick, in respect of the death of her husband, Joseph Blakey, the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie) found that the death of Joseph Blakey was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and at the request of the defenders stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"(1) The deceased Joseph Blakey, a plumber in the employment of the defenders, was engaged along with other workmen in their employment, in July 1911, in laying and jointing iron pipes in a trench cut in a road at Gateshead. . . .

"(2) That said iron pipes were 9 feet long by 5½ inches in diameter, and were jointed with lead. The pipes were laid along the side of the trench, and three lengths requiring two joints were jointed out- side the trench, after which the resultant length of 27 feet of pipe was laid in the trench, and a joint made inside the trench with the pipe already there. The trench was on an average 2 feet 6 inches deep, and as the trench was dug the pipes were put in. This jointing of the pipes was the special employment of the deceased, but he was also employed in laying the pipes in the trench and guiding them into pipes already there.

Dec. 23, 1911.
Blakey v.
Robson,
Eckford, &
Co., Limited.

"(3) The jointing was performed by first plugging the joint with yarn round the inner pipe, then forming a clay mould round the joint, after which molten lead, melted in a chafer and transported in a ladle, was poured in and the clay mould removed, and the lead then staved or hammered into the joint. Each jointing took, in the present case, about fifteen minutes, including the time occupied in going to and from the chafer. About four minutes only were occupied in dealing with the molten lead, of which about 3 lbs was required for each joint. On the day in question the deceased had made about six joints. The process described is the usual mode of jointing pipes. Both when laying and guiding the pipes, and also when jointing them, the deceased was obliged to stoop to a considerable extent over his work.

"(4) That on 26th July 1911, at about 9 A.M., while engaged inside the trench in guiding a length of jointed pipe into another pipe there, the deceased was seized with a sudden attack of illness, but after going to town and taking some stimulant, returned to his work. At or about 11 A.M. that day, while carrying the ladle containing about 3 lbs of molten lead from the chafer to the trench, he had another similar seizure and fell to the ground, after which seizure he left his work. Late that night and early next morning fresh attacks of his illness occurred, and he was sent home to Hawick, when he was found to be suffering from heat apoplexy. He remained there totally incapacitated and under medical treatment till his death on 1st August 1911.

"(5) That the deceased had been engaged at his said employment for about a fortnight before 26th July 1911. Considerable heat prevailed on that date and for some time before and after, and the stooping position in which the deceased was obliged to work caused the heat to have a special effect on him which it did not have on persons working in a more upright position, though he had not made any complaints. The deceased was in a state of impaired vitality at the time, partly owing to over-indulgence in alcohol and partly owing to his having been out of work for about six months before being employed by the defenders. It was not proved that the use of molten lead caused or contributed to the deceased's injury, or had any appreciable effect in aggravating the excessive heat of the sun. It was proved that it melts at a low temperature, gives off little heat, and was used in small quantities on this job.

"(6) That the cause of death was heat apoplexy, and this heat apoplexy was caused by the excessive atmospheric heat on said 26th day of July 1911 acting on his impaired vitality, aggravated by the stooping position in which he was obliged to work.

"On the above facts I found that the death of the said Joseph Blakey was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1)

Dec. 23, 1911. Whether the personal injury to the deceased was caused by 'an accident' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) If the previous question be answered in the affirmative, whether the accident arose out of the deceased's employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

Blakey v.
Robson,
Eckford, &
Co., Limited.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 9th December 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—There had been no accident arising out of the deceased's employment; his death being due to natural causes, including his impaired vitality, and not to exposure to any peculiar danger incidental to his employment.¹ That there were no conditions of artificial or aggravated heat to which the deceased was subjected distinguished the present from the cases of *Ismay, Imrie, & Company v. Williamson*² and *Morgan v. Owners of Steamship "Zenaida."*³ There had been exposure only to such risks as were common to all outdoor labourers who had to stoop at their work, and no mishap or untoward event had occurred.⁴

Argued for the respondent;—The question whether the death of the deceased was due to an accident was a question of fact upon which the Court would not interfere with the decision of the arbitrator. In any event, the arbitrator's finding that, in the circumstances disclosed here, there had been an accident was in harmony with the decisions.⁵ One whose work required continuous stooping under an unusually hot sun was exposed to an exceptional risk of heat apoplexy; thus the accident arose out of the deceased's employment.⁶ The present case was governed by the cases of *Ismay, Imrie, & Company v. Williamson*² and *Morgan v. Owners of Steamship "Zenaida."*³

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is the case of a man who went out, in the course of his ordinary work, on a somewhat hot summer's day in Scotland, and bent over his work during part of the time he was engaged upon it, and consequently got his back heated. Being in a poor state of health he succumbed some days afterwards to an attack of apoplexy. Now, if, in the early days of judicial interpretation of the statutes dealing with workmen's compensation, anyone had stated these facts and argued upon them that the man had met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, I think the Court would have replied by a somewhat surprised negative. And yet I quite admit that upon the decided cases there has been a fairly formidable argument presented in favour of saying that this was an accident arising out of the employment. In the case of *Coe*¹ I pointed out how one decision drove to another, in an observation which was afterwards approved of by more than one of their Lordships in the House of Lords; and I would like to add this, that there is danger of confounding the illustration of the principle with the principle itself.

 Ld. President.

Now, I am very clearly of opinion in this case that there is really no evidence upon which you could say that the man met with an accident arising out of his employment. Various cases were cited to us. I do not propose to go through them all; but I shall mention those on which most reliance is placed, and those to which exception falls to be taken.

I think there is considerable help to be got from the two lightning cases. In one, a rural labourer was struck by lightning. It was held that that was not an accident arising out of his employment, because his employment had not exposed him to any other danger than was common to every inhabitant of the British Islands who was at that moment within the area of the storm. On the other hand, in the other case, a man was employed on a very high scaffold and was struck by lightning, and it was held that he had met with an accident arising out of his employment, because there was scientific testimony to the effect that if a person was placed at a very great height from the ground, he was much more liable to be struck by lightning than people following their avocations on the ground. These are cases of the no doubt unexpected occurrence of a lightning flash; but when we come nearer the accident here—I mean in the quality of the injury—of course the two cases quoted to us were the well-known case of heat-stroke, in the House of Lords,² and then the case, not reported in the regular reports, of *Morgan v. "Zenaida,"*³ where the Court of Appeal held that a man on board the "Zenaida," who died of sunstroke, had met with an accident arising out of his employment. I think both of these cases are very easily distinguishable. In the case of heat-stroke, in the House of Lords, though there was a most emphatic dissent from one of their Lordships, it was held that there had been an accident, because the man had been exposed to the action of heat which brought on heat-stroke, by being obliged in the course of his employment, which was that of a trimmer, to stay in the stokehold. Other people who were not in the stokehold had no risk of that particular danger. The other case of the "Zenaida,"³ I think, may be explained in the same way. There the man was slung upon a scaffold in the tropics against the hull of the ship to do some painting, and there he got sunstroke. I am bound to say, if I agree with that case at all, it is only upon the ground that the peculiar position in which he was placed put him, so to speak, under a burning-glass and exposed him to a greater heat from the necessities of his occupation than other people were exposed to. If that is the true view of the case, and I think I am entitled to take

Ld. President.

But when you come to this case, there is nothing of that sort. The only two things that can be said about this man's employment are, first, that he was in the open air, and therefore was more exposed to the sun than somebody who sat in a cellar; and secondly, that at his work he had to bend. Now, since the days when Adam was expelled from Eden I think every outdoor labourer has had to bend at his work; and I think it would be the very climax of absurdity to say that because a man had to go into the open air, and because he had to stoop, he was exposed to a peculiar danger because of his employment. I think you reach the same result by putting the matter interrogatively. Before any accident has happened, ask yourself the question, To what class of dangers does this man's employment expose him? The answer is very obvious in most cases. Suppose he is a collier; I may say his employment exposes him to the risk of having things falling upon him from the roof, to the danger of tumbling down a shaft, and so on. In short, there is a peculiar class of dangers which exists only for people who go down into mines. I put in debate, I think, the illustration of the sandwichman, who goes about the streets all day and, mercifully for the other pedestrians, is not allowed to go on the pavements; he is exposed on the streets to the danger of being run over by wheeled traffic. But if you had asked this, What are the special dangers incidental to the employment of a plumber, who occasionally has outdoor work? nobody in their senses would have said, "Oh, heat apoplexy"; and when you come to the cause of heat apoplexy you come to the circumstances here, and I should say the causa causans was much more the man's own drinking habits than the sun on that particular day. There was an attempt to base an argument on the Sheriff's use of the words "excessive heat." Excessive heat is no standard. He only says it was in July 1911. We all know that July 1911 was a hot month; but to say that anyone who works, as it has been called, "'Neath the baleful star of Sirius," is necessarily exposed to an excessive or peculiar danger, is a proposition which has no foundation.

On the whole matter I am very clearly of opinion here that there was no ground upon which this workman ought to have been awarded compensation. I think this case is very analogous to the case of Warner v. Couchman,¹ and that one's whole opinion is very well summed up in the words in which the reporter has rubricked that case. It is this: that even assuming that there had been an accident, there was no peculiar danger to which the applicant had been exposed beyond that to which other persons engaged in outdoor work on that day had been exposed, and consequently that the accident had not arisen out of his employment.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, for the reasons which your Lordship has given, and which I do not repeat. I only say in a word that I do not think that this man was exposed by his employment to any special risk to which other people were not liable, provided they happened to be working in the open air on the 26th July 1911. The only special circumstance which the Sheriff's statement of facts adds to that which I have mentioned is that Dec. 23, 1911. the man, owing to his own habits, was in a state of impaired vitality at the time; and accordingly the Sheriff thinks that the danger of working in unusual heat was aggravated by his own physiological condition. But that is not an exceptional circumstance incident to the employment; it is one incident to the person. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

“Answer the questions stated by declaring that the injury to the deceased Joseph Blakey was not an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, arising out of his employment: Therefore reverse the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and remit to him to dismiss the claim.”

Reparation—Negligence—Safety of the public—Railway—Sparks from engine—Improper construction of engine—Negligent use of engine.

Gray v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

A father claimed damages from a railway company in respect of injuries sustained by his six pupil children. He averred that while his children were standing on a railway platform, the driver of the engine of a train, finding it necessary to put on steam while passing the platform, did so carelessly, unnecessarily, and unskillfully, in such volume that large quantities of live cinders and soot were driven from the funnel and fell upon the children, causing the injuries complained of. He also averred that the defenders or their servants were in fault in not having the funnel properly cleaned from time to time, and in not having a cage at the mouth of the funnel, or adopting other means to prevent such an occurrence.

Averments which were held not to disclose a relevant case of improper construction, but to disclose a relevant case of improper use, of the engine.

Minor and Pupil—Process—Reparation—Action of damages by father as tutor and administrator for his pupil children—Necessity for separate conclusions for each child.

Held that a father, suing as administrator-in-law for his pupil children for damages for personal injuries suffered by them, must conclude for a separate sum for each child and not for a lump sum.

On 3rd October 1911, Thomas Gray, a miner at Stirling, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against the Caledonian Railway Company, in which he, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his six pupil children and also as an individual, claimed damages in respect of certain injuries sustained by his children.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

The pursuer's claim was:—“For payment of (1) £100 sterling (a) damages for personal injuries and shock to the system sustained by the pursuer's son, the said John Gray (aged 7 years), on or about

Dec. 23, 1911. the 22nd day of July 1911; and also (b) as damages for shock sustained to their systems by the said Mary Gray (aged 11), Grace Gray (aged 9), Thomas Gray (aged 5), James Gray (aged 4), and Elizabeth Gray (aged 18 months), while they were all waiting, and having each a return ticket purchased from the defenders from Haywood to Stirling, on the platform of their railway station at Carstairs, with the object of returning as passengers therefrom to Stirling, in consequence of an engine attached to a train of the defenders, by which the said John Gray, Mary Gray, Grace Gray, Thomas Gray, James Gray, and Elizabeth Gray, the pursuer's said children, intended to travel, and did travel to Stirling, while the said engine was being drawn up at Carstairs platform, having emitted live cinders and soot from the funnel upon all the pursuer's said pupil children, whereby the said John Gray was severely scalded and burned on the neck, and suffered and still suffers shock to his system, and the said Mary Gray, Grace Gray, Thomas Gray, James Gray, and Elizabeth Gray, also suffered shock to their systems, and still suffer therefrom, all through the fault, negligence, and carelessness of the defenders' servants, for whom they are responsible; and further, (2) £5 sterling, being the value of the clothing belonging to the pursuer worn at the time by the said John Gray, Mary Gray, Grace Gray, Thomas Gray, James Gray, and Elizabeth Gray, his said children, which was, time and place foresaid, destroyed and rendered useless and unwearable, and that also through the fault of the defenders' servants, for whom they are responsible, in allowing said live cinders and soot to be emitted and thrown off from said engine upon the persons of the pursuer's said pupil children while they were waiting on said date on the said platform, with the object before mentioned."

The pursuer averred (Cond. 2) that on 22nd July 1911, his wife, Elizabeth Morrow or Gray, and his six children were on the platform at Carstairs awaiting the arrival of a train which was to convey them to Stirling. "When the engine approached with steam shut off, the driver apparently found that he had not sufficient way on to bring it properly alongside the platform, and in consequence he had to apply steam in order to bring the train to its proper position at the platform, so that the engine was steaming when it passed that portion of the platform where the said Elizabeth Morrow or Gray and her children were standing. As it passed that point the engine was emitting dense smoke and steam, and live cinders and soot from the funnel of said engine fell on several people waiting on the platform, destroying their clothes, and otherwise injuring them." He then narrated that the fall of cinders and soot caused the injuries to his children and to their clothes set forth in the claim.

The averments of fault (Cond. 5) were as follows:—"It was the duty of the engine-driver to prevent the engine emitting live cinders and soot when passing a platform on which he knew there were passengers awaiting said train who might be injured by them, and if he had exercised ordinary care and skill he could have prevented this. He ought to have shut off steam at a point which would have enabled him to control his engine by means of the brakes alone, or at all events which would have enabled him to stop the train at the required point without giving off dense volumes of smoke and steam when passing along said platform. Further, even if it were necessary for him in consequence of his misjudging the distance, or from any other reason, to apply steam while passing along said platform, it was his duty to apply it gradually and in small volume, so as to prevent doing injury to persons on the platform, but on the occasion in question the engine-driver carelessly and unskilfully applied steam suddenly and in large volume, with the result of driving large quantities of soot and live cinders out of the funnel. This would not have happened had steam been applied gradually, and in small volume. Further, it was the duty of the engine-driver, under the defenders' rules for the regulation of their traffic, to so arrange the fire in the engine as to avoid the unnecessary emission of cinders and soot from the engine while passing said station. The emission of live cinders and soot in the circumstances condended on was quite unnecessary, and the engine-driver was in breach of the defenders' own rule, which is intended to ensure the safety and comfort of the public. Further, the defenders or their servants were in fault in not having the funnel properly cleaned from time to time, and in not having a cage at the mouth of the funnel, or adopting other means of preventing live cinders and soot being emitted therefrom in large and dangerous quantities."

The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

On 20th November 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) repelled the plea of irrelevancy and allowed both parties a proof of their averments.*

On 24th November 1911, on the requisition of the pursuer, the case was remitted to the Court of Session.

On 23rd December 1911, on the case appearing in the Single Bills of the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie), the defenders objected that the pursuer had failed to aver a relevant case either of defective construction of the engine or of negligence on the part of the defenders' servants, and referred to the undernoted case.¹

The Lord President intimated that there was a radical defect in the action as laid, in respect that the pursuer claimed damages in a lump sum for the injuries sustained by his six children severally.

Counsel for the pursuer, having intimated that he did not object to the case being remitted back to the Sheriff, was not called upon to reply upon the relevancy.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action which has been remitted from the Sheriff Court at Stirling with a view to having it tried by jury. We have had an argument directed to the question of relevancy. I think the law is perfectly well settled in this class of case. Where injury is done owing to the noxious effect of a machine which is driven upon the company's property, in direct pursuance of statutory duties which make them drive that class of machine, there can be no claim of damages against them for doing what the statute tells them to do; and, accordingly, there can only be a

L.) 35, which lays down the law authoritatively, recognises (after proof) the two spheres of possible negligence which are specified in the averments here, use of appliances and the nature of the appliances themselves. There may be a question how steam brings cinders through with it, but this is matter for proof."

Dec. 23, 1911. claim of damages for injury for burns or anything of that sort, resulting from sparks from an engine, if you can show that there has been negligence on the part of the company. That negligence may be of two kinds. It may either be negligence in having an improperly constructed machine, or it may be negligence in the manner in which a properly constructed machine is used.

Gray v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

I am bound to say that I find no relevant averment of there being improper construction of this engine; and, accordingly, I think that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong when he allowed a proof of the record as it stood. On the other hand, I think there is a relevant, though somewhat vague, averment of improper use of the machine, and I think upon that matter the case could not be turned out of Court without allowing inquiry.

But I do not think that this case could have been sent to a jury. The learned counsel for the pursuer has very properly, I think, made that concession; but the reason of it I need to mention, because there is, I think, an absolute fault in the action as laid which will have to be corrected when it goes back to the Sheriff Court (where I propose to send it), and the fault is this: the claim of the pursuer is a claim as tutor and administrator-in-law for his six pupil children, and he claims, in a lump sum, £100 sterling for injuries and shock sustained by their systems, as he puts it, by soot falling upon them out of this engine, and, in the case of one of them, by a cinder having lodged upon his neck. Well, you cannot, I think, sue as an administrator-in-law for a lump sum for various children. You are bound to particularise what is the sum which you think you ought to recover for each child, because, when recovered, it is not a common sum. The father does not recover for himself, but recovers as administrator-in-law for his children. No doubt the father is entitled to use the money of his children for their upkeep: otherwise, each sum recovered for each child would have to be put, so to speak, in a separate bank account. The action as laid seems therefore to be improperly laid in this matter. If it had been properly laid, it would have been perfectly apparent, I think, to anyone that no child would be receiving more than £50; and consequently it would have been one of those cases which upon value alone, according to the rules we have laid down, would have been appropriate for the Sheriff Court and not for this Court.

Accordingly, I think, upon the whole matter, the action should be re-remitted to the Sheriff with an instruction to him to allow an amendment of the pleading, which shall specify the amount sought to be recovered for each separate child, and also with an instruction to him that there is, in our view, no relevant averment of any improper construction of the engine.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship. I think the liability of the Railway Company in an action of this kind is quite clearly established by the law laid down in the case of the Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co.,¹ and by the previous case of Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand.² And I agree with your Lordship's statement of the law, which is also correctly stated by the Sheriff-substitute. It follows, I think, that there is a relevant Dec. 23, 1911. case upon the negligent driving of the defenders' engine in the particular circumstances here.

Gray v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

But then I agree also that the pursuer cannot be allowed to sue for one lump sum in respect of six separate injuries to six different people. The question of the injury done to each child is a separate and distinct question from the injury done to the other children. And the pursuer makes that clear enough when he says that in one case he is suing for damages for personal injuries done, and in the other cases for damages for shock sustained to the system. Whatever the meaning of that may be, it is clear enough that each child has a separate case for separate injury done to itself; and the fact that the father, as administrator-in-law, is entitled to recover the damages for each of his children does not make the six children into one pursuer. Therefore the separation, which I think the learned counsel admitted to be necessary, will require to be made before the case goes further.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I quite agree, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 20th November 1911: Repel said objections" [i.e., to the relevancy] "except in so far as they relate to the construction of the engine: Find that there is no relevant averment of improper construction of the engine: Quoad ultra remit the case back to the Sheriff for proof, and instruct him to allow the pursuer to amend the record to show the amount sought to be recovered for each child, and to proceed with the cause."

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—
Injury by "accident"—Incapacity due to heart disease.

Spence v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, it was proved that a workman, while engaged in lifting a weight in the course of his employment, felt a pain in the breast followed by palpitation of the heart; that he was found to be suffering from heart disease of long standing, which was bound to manifest itself sooner or later and probably in the way described; and that from that time his condition became gradually worse until, eventually, he became permanently incapacitated for work as a result of the diseased state of his heart. It was not proved that the lifting of the weight had accelerated the progress of the disease.

Held that on the facts stated the arbitrator was entitled to find, as he did, that the workman had failed to prove that his incapacity was due to an "accident" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

Jan. 18, 1912. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between William Spence, miner, Croy, and William Baird & Company, Limited, colliery owners, Glasgow, the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow (Thomson) refused compensation, and at the request of the workman stated a case for appeal.

Spence v.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth:—

“ The case was heard before me and proof led, when the following facts were admitted or proved :—(1) That the appellant was roadman and fireman in respondents' Bedlay pit, Chryston, at a wage of 34s. 10d. a week; that he had been employed there for about a year, and that he had been employed in similar work in coal pits for ten years or thereby immediately preceding; (2) that his ordinary daily duties involved, inter alia, the lifting and moving of loaded hutches from the lye at the back of the haulage wheel on to the rails of the haulage road, which was work requiring considerable physical exertion; (3) that the appellant on the morning of Friday, 20th May 1910, he being then alone, while lifting a derailed loaded hutch from the lye on to the haulage road, felt a sharp pain immediately above the stomach, followed by palpitation of the heart and a shortage of breath; that he lifted no more hutches that day, but remained till the end of the shift performing such light work as fireman as there was to do; that after a rest on the Saturday and Sunday (which were not working days for him) he resumed work on the Monday morning, and while in the act of moving a hutch he again experienced the same sensations as on the Friday; (4) that the appellant, however, adduced no direct evidence to corroborate his own statement that an accident had occurred on the Friday in lifting the hutches, but he consistently, when examined at the time and later by doctors on his own behalf and on behalf of the respondents, repeated his statement as to the sensations which he experienced in lifting the hutch, and his physical condition (to be immediately referred to) makes his statement quite probable; (5) that the appellant on being medically examined was found to be suffering from advanced disease of the mitral valve of the heart, with enlargement of the heart; that this condition was not due to the alleged accident, but was of long standing, although possibly the appellant may not have been aware of the disease; that it was in its nature progressive and was bound to manifest itself sooner or later, and would do so probably in the way in which appellant describes, and might do so even when he was not engaged in active exercise; (6) that the appellant's condition has gradually become worse since 20th May 1910, and he is now permanently incapacitated for work as the result of the diseased condition of the heart; (7) that it is not proved that the lifting of the hutches on 20th May accelerated the progress of the disease.

“ On these facts I found that the appellant, even on the assumption that his statements as to his sensations were proved (as I believed them to be), had not proved that he had sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents, and therefore I dismissed the petition.”

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—“ Was the arbitrator justified on the above facts in finding that the appellant had not proved an ‘ accident ’ within the meaning of the statute ? ”

The appeal was heard before the Second Division on 13th January 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant had sufficiently proved that his incapacity was due to an accident, and the facts did not justify the arbitrator's decision. An incident, such as a strain, was none the less an "accident" because of the fact that, but for pre-existing disease, it would not have resulted in the injury which produced the incapacity.¹ It was proved that, on the 20th May, the appellant was suffering from a "progressive" disease of the heart; that, on that date, and while exerting himself in the course of his employment, he felt certain sensations which were symptomatic of heart disease; and that from that date his condition had become worse. This raised a presumption, which it was for the respondents to displace, that his disease had been aggravated by the exertion, and that he had thus sustained injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The arbitrator had erred by assuming the contrary, as was shown by article 7 of his findings, viz., that the burden was still on the appellant to bring further evidence to show that the lifting of the hutches had accelerated the progress of the disease. There was the necessary fortuitous element in the occurrence which constituted it an accident.² If the findings did not sufficiently bring out the connection between the exertion and the injury which the medical evidence showed to exist, the case should be remitted for further statement, as was done in the case of Borland v. Watson, Gow, & Company, Limited.³
